INTRODUCTION

Regarding the early inhabitants of this country, trustworthy history goes no farther into the past than to the discovery and settlement of the Atlantic region by the Europeans. Conjectures have been formed from the traditions of the Indians, and from relics discovered in ancient mounds and earthworks taken in connection with the course of events narrated in sacred and profane history, that lead to the belief that this country was peopled at a very early period by colonies from Eastern Asia.

Missionaries who met the Dahkotch Indians late in the Sixteenth Century, found them in the country between the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, bordering the Great Lakes, and at war with the Algonquins, and relate that they had a tradition that their ancestors came from the North across a great water, being driven in war from their native country. From this tradition and other similar evidence, it was inferred that their progenitors were once inhabitants of China and Tartary, and from thence found their way to the islands of the Northern Pacific Ocean and thence to the American continent. This theory is rendered plausible by the similarity of language as well as by the physical resemblance of the two peoples. The word slave in Chinese is called "shunko;" and in the Dakota tongue, dog is pronounced "shunka." The theory is that this emigration at first was made up of a civilized people, not as advanced as the civilization of the present day, but possessing and practicing many of the arts of a civilized race—that centuries later these were followed by a people of a fierce and warlike nature, though probably of the same racial family, who were far more numerous than the first immigrants, whom they treated as enemies and drove them from their homes into the more southern climes of Mexico and Central America. It is claimed that Tartary, from whence these immigrants mainly came, had at one time been well advanced in civilization, which would seem to be probable of all the aboriginal peoples of Asia.

In further confirmation of this theory is the old Indian tradition that when the Indian tribes of the Mississippi Valley migrated across the Alleghenies and descended the Atlantic Slope, they found a wilderness abounding in game and fish and wild fruits and flowers, but not inhabited by human beings—and that the Indian nation found there by the early European discoverers were the descendants of those who had migrated from the West.

Accepting with confidence the biblical account of the nativity of the human race and other events connected with the primitive history of mankind, we are led to believe, as the most rational theory, that the Western Hemisphere was first peopled by emigrants from Asia, who were descended from an ancestry that possessed much of what we know of civilization, and who believed in God, whom they designated as the Great Spirit, who possessed the power and the will to punish or reward them according as their deeds might merit. Their faith in a future life is attested by their funeral rites and burial customs. Accepting this theory as best explaining the origin of the first inhabitants of this continent, we must conclude that the western portion of North America was inhabited by human beings some time before the peopling of the eastern portion and the Atlantic Slope.

With regard to the primitive tribes of Southern Dakota, Charlevoix relates that nearly two centuries ago, the Iowas, Omahas, and Ottoes, were in possession of Southern Dakota, and roamed and warred through the regions watered by the Des Moines, Big Sioux, and James, and that these tribes annually assembled in peace around their council fires at the great Red Pipestone Quarry. From here they were gradually driven south and west by the great nation of Dakotas moving down from the north.

The period of this great retrocession of Indian nations, Hennepin informs us, was some time before the Eleventh Century, or over nine hundred years ago. Up to that era the Dakotas had remained as one nation, governed by one tongue, and were called by the French (Nadoues-sioux, meaning enemy), from the latter termination of which word is derived the word "Sioux." But during the great war and flight from the north, they had become disbanded and scattered into separate war parties, and in order to be distinguished from other tribes of the plain they called themselves Lakotahs, meaning the "friend-born" or friendly people. Since that period both history and tradition agree in placing the Dakotas as sovereigns of the vast region of country between the Mississippi and the mountains, and embracing the territory of Dakota.

History of Dakota Territory

CHAPTER I

LOUISIANA—HOW NAMED AND ITS CESSION TO THE UNITED STATES

1803

THE TERRITORY OF LOUISIANA—ITS DISCOVERY BY LASALLE—ITS BOUNDARIES—ITS PURCHASE BY THE UNITED STATES—INCIDENTS LEADING TO THE TREATY OF CESSION.

The Territory of Dakota, with the exception of the portion drained by the Red River of the North and the Mouse River, was a part of the Louisiana Territory, acquired by the United States from France, by purchase, in 1803.

At the close of this country's successful war for independence, waged by the American Colonies against the government of Great Britain, that nation, by the Treaty of Paris, September, 1783, conceded the independence of the Colonies, and transferred to the new nation all its domain and sovereignty lying east of the Mississippi River, south of the Great Lakes and the River St. Lawrence, extending south to the Spanish possessions. These Spanish possessions included Florida and all south of that state's northern boundary line, extended west to the Mississippi River, excepting the Island of New Orleans. West of the Mississippi lay a large portion of the Territory of Louisiana, so named by the intrepid French explorer, LaSalle, in 1682, who had then, as discoverer, taken formal possession of the country drained by the Mississippi and its tributaries, and named it in honor of his king, Louis XIV of France.

Inasmuch as the boundaries of the original Territory of Louisiana do not appear to have been definitely marked by the first claimant or those claiming under that power, for the reason that but a small fraction of the territory had been explored; and because Dakotians must ever be interested in knowing the facts regarding these boundaries, we have copied briefly from a work prepared by the Hon. Binger Hermann, commissioner of the general land office, and published by order of Congress, where the writer unravels the disputed questions, mainly those connected with the possessions of our Government west of the summit of the Rocky Mountains known originally as the Oregon country, in the light of the facts connected with the original discovery and subsequent treaties. First, as to what was claimed by the discoverer:

LaSalle was the first to descend the Mississippi from its navigable northern waters to its mouth, and from the gulf inward again. His discovery was not a mere accident, nor was it left unwritten and in doubt. His journey was undertaken for purposes of discovery, and every important observation was carefully noted and reported by him. He was a man of education and received a patent of nobility. His expeditions were under the authority of the French government, and he early won the confidence and admiration of the French monarch, Louis XIV. The Chevalier Henry de Tonty, Fathers Hennepin and Membré, and other well known explorers were his companions in many expeditions, and a few years before, over much of the same ground, Marquette and Joliet had opened the way among the Indian tribes. The result of his researches was made known in France, and efforts were at once made by the government to colonize the country and extend exploration.

LaSalle, standing with de Tonty, Dautray and other companions on the banks of the most western channel of the Mississippi, about three leagues from its mouth, on April 9, 1682, took possession of the country in the name of Louis XIV, and setting up a column, or, as Doctor Kohl insists, "a cross with arms of the King," buried a plate, unfurled the flag of France, sung a Te Deum, and naming the country "Louisiana," in a loud voice, proclaimed its extent to be "from the mouth of the great river St. Louis, on the eastern side, otherwise called Ohio, Alighin, Sipore, or Chiskagona, and this with the consent of the Chaonanons, Chikachas, and other people dwelling therein with whom we have made alliance, as also along the River Colbert, or Mississippi, and rivers which discharge themselves therein, from its source beyond the Kious or Nadonessious, and this with their consent, and with the consent of the Miotanties, Illinois, Mesigameus, Natchez, Koroas, which are the most considerable nations dwelling therein, with whom also we have made alliance, as far as its mouth at the sea or Gulf of Mexico, and also to the mouth of the River Palms, upon the assurance which we have received from all these nations that we are the first Europeans who have descended or ascended the said River Colbert.

LaSalle also named the Mississippi "Colbert," in honor of his friend and patron, M. Colbert, the colonial minister under Louis XIV, and upon whose report the king conferred upon LaSalle the rank of esquire, with power to acquire knighthood.

Passing over an interval of thirty-five years, in 1717, Bienville was appointed by the French king to be "Governor of Louisiana," and one of his first acts was to select a place for a French colony, which he did by choosing the site of the present City of New Orleans, named in honor of the Duke of Orleans, then regent of France. In 1723 the seat of government was fixed at that place, which contained 300 inhabitants.

Concerning the northern and western boundaries of Louisiana, they were conceded to be the sources of the waters which by various tributaries were drained into the Mississippi. Subsequently and as the result of treaties between France and England in 1713 (the Treaty of Utrecht), a boundary was fixed between the English and French possessions. The commissioners acting under this treaty fixed the "northern boundary of Canada and Louisiana by a line beginning on the Atlantic, at a cape or promontory in 58° 30' north latitude; thence southeasterly to the Lake Mistasin; thence further southeast to the latitude forty-nine degrees north from the equator, and along that line indefinitely."

At the time this treaty was made, France possessed Canada and Louisiana. This was followed by a treaty between the same powers in 1763 (the United States being not then in existence), by which France ceded all the Territory of Louisiana, east of the Mississippi River, to Great Britain.

Now comes the new Government of the United States, which by the terms of the treaty of peace in 1783, which closed the War of the Revolution, succeeds to all the country theretofore claimed by Great Britain, south of the Great Lakes and east of the Mississippi and its sources, extending west to the Lake of the Woods.

Concerning the settlement of this question of the northern boundary, in which Dakotians will feel an interest, ex-President Jefferson, in a letter to Mr. Mellish, the geographer, dated Monticello, December 31, 1816, says:

By the charter of Louis XIV, all the country comprehending the waters which flow into the Mississippi, was made a part of Louisiana. Consequently its northern boundary was the summit of the highlands in which its northern waters rise. But, by the Xth Art. of the Treaty of Utrecht, France and England agreed to appoint commissioners to settle the boundary between their possessions in that quarter, and those commissioners settled it at the forty-ninth degree of latitude. This it was which induced the British commissioners, in settling the boundary with us, to follow the northern water line to the Lake of the Woods, at the latitude forty-ninth degree, and then go off on that parallel. This, then, is the true northern boundary of Louisiana.

The purchase of the Territory of Louisiana by the United States came about without any premeditation on the part of this Government and so unexpectedly that it was not known to President Jefferson, under whose administration it was accomplished, until several weeks had elapsed after the treaty ceding the territory had been signed at the French capital. It was secured by peaceful methods, and the purchase was made because Napoleon was determined to sell, and not that the United States was predisposed to buy. The circumstances leading up to this transaction, and the consummation of it, appear to have been signally approved by Providence, beginning with the tyrannical decree of the Spanish governor at New Orleans, forbidding, in effect, the commerce of the Mississippi by American planters, up to the successful termination of the purchase. Spain, in enacting the role of an oppressor, was fostering the cause of human liberty.

In 1762 France had ceded the Territory of Louisiana to Spain and that nation held it for thirty-eight years, or until the year 1800. At this time the Duke of Parma, a son-in-law of the King of Spain, was desirous of securing for himself the succession to the Grand Duchy of Tuscany, that he might be raised to the dignity of a king, and have his dominion enlarged by the addition of Tuscany. In consideration of France giving assurances for these distinctions and enlarged territory in Italy, Spain agreed to the retrocession of Louisiana. The treaty of retrocession was known as the "Treaty of Ildefonso," and was consummated October 1, 1800. Prior to this time the relations between France and the United States had not been harmonious, due chiefly to the disorderly, unsettled, if not chaotic, condition of the French government. At one time, during the administration of President Adams, 1798, our Government was on the point of declaring war against France, and Washington, said to have been tendered the command of our armies, had accepted and had selected a portion of his staff. It could not, therefore, be agreeable to the United States to have an unfriendly power for so close a neighbor. Spain, however, continued to administer the government of Louisiana, while France owned the soil. In 1802 the Spanish governor of New Orleans took occasion to abrogate the treaty with the United States under which American planters along the Mississippi were given free navigation of that river and also were given the right to deposit their produce at New Orleans preparatory to its shipment by sea to Atlantic ports and to foreign countries. The enforcement of this interdiction and withdrawal of the right of deposit raised such a clamor that President Jefferson appealed to France and succeeded in having the Spanish act annulled; but the event had served to draw the attention of the world to this quarter. Napoleon, who was first consul, in the meantime had become deeply involved in war with Great Britain, then the most powerful maritime nation, and he realized the precarious situation of his American possessions, which he would have been unable to defend had England earnestly endeavored to make conquest of them. This was the situation when in 1803 President Jefferson, desirous of securing control of the Mississippi, instructed the American minister at the French capital, Mr. Livingston, to negotiate for the purchase of the Island of New Orleans and West Florida, and at about the same time dispatched James Monroe as a special envoy, giving him $2,000,000, to assist Livingston in his negotiations. Napoleon was apprised of the earnest desire of the United States to obtain New Orleans, and he had instructed his ministers not only to sell it, but to sell the entire Territory of Louisiana; so that when our representatives made their proposition they were met by the counter proposal of France, to take the whole of Louisiana, New Orleans included. This was altogether unexpected, and no authority had been given them to entertain such a proposition. They were urged to an immediate decision. This desire on the part of Napoleon was not known to the representatives of the United States until the proposition was made. Napoleon, realizing the likelihood of England's ambition, had said to his ministers, Talleyrand of the state and Marbois of the treasury departments:

The English shall not have the Mississippi, which they covet. The conquest of Louisiana would be easy if they only took the trouble to make a despatch there. I have that moment to lose in putting it out of her reach. I think of ceding it to the United States.

They only ask of me one town in Louisiana; but I already consider the colony as entirely lost; and it appears to me that in the hands of this growing power it will be more useful to the policy and even the commerce of France, than if I should attempt to keep it. It is not only New Orleans that I will cede, it is the whole colony without any reservation. To attempt to retain it would be folly. I direct you (Marbois), to negotiate this offer with the envoys of the United States. I will be moderate in consideration of the necessity in which I am of making a sale. But keep this to yourself.

The American envoys could not consult the home Government for further instructions. The distance was great and time was precious and weeks would be required in which to obtain instructions from Washington. War was soon to be declared between England and France. Prompt action was necessary. Quickness in action meant the vast domain west of the Mississippi for our republic, as delay in action would mean it for England. Our negotiators read the future with the alternative before them, and they gladly accepted the issue, and soon there was an agreement for the whole of Louisiana. The article of the treaty conveying the territory to the United States reads as follows:

Article I. Whereas, by the article, the third of the treaty concluded at St. Idelfonso, the 9th Vendemaire, an. 9 (1st October, 1800), between the First Consul of the French Republic and his Catholic Majesty, it was agreed as follows: "His Catholic Majesty promises and engages on his part, to cede to the French Republic, six months after the full and entire execution of the conditions and stipulations herein relative to his royal highness, the Duke of Parma, the colony or province of Louisiana, with the same extent that it now has in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it, and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other states." "And whereas, in pursuance of the treaty, and particularly the third article, the French Republic has an incontestible title to the domain and to the possession of the said territory:—The First Consul of the French Republic desiring to give to the United States a strong proof of his friendship, doth hereby cede to the said United States, in the name of the French Republic, forever and in full sovereignty, the said territory, with all its rights and appurtenances, as fully and in the same manner, as they have been acquired by the French Republic, in virtue of the above mentioned treaty concluded with his Catholic Majesty.

As this description was very vague and unsatisfactory as to the definite boundaries and extent of the purchase, our envoys insisted upon a more specific definition. The domain east of the Mississippi had all been determined by various treaties, and the claims of the different nations were generally well known; but the great empire lying west of the Mississippi continued to remain a source of much trouble and uncertainty, as no satisfactory data was offered specifying the boundary, and none could be agreed upon. Marbois expressed to Napoleon the difficulty in reaching a definite conclusion as to boundary, and regretted the obscurity in which so important reference was made; but this did not trouble the conscience of Napoleon, who replied: That "if an obscurity did not already exist, it would, perhaps, be good policy to put one there." Even when questioned as to the eastern boundary, evasive answers were returned. "What are the eastern bounds of Louisiana?" asked Livingston. "I do not know," replied Talleyrand; "you must take it as we received it." "But what did you mean to take?" said Livingston. "I do not know," replied Talleyrand. "Then you mean that we shall construe it our own way?" said Livingston. To which Talleyrand made final reply: "I can give you no direction. You have made a noble bargain for yourselves, and I suppose you will make the most of it."

The date of this treaty was April 30, 1803. The treaties were sent to Washington, as it was Napoleon's desire that ratification should be exchanged at Washington rather than at Paris. The papers arrived at Washington July 14, 1803, and October 17th, following, Congress was convened, and after much discussion and contention as to the constitutional authority of Congress to annex foreign territory to the Union, the treaty was ratified. Even with all this done, our purchase was not secure. Up to this moment Louisiana still remained in the possession and under the government of Spain. There had as yet been no surrender to France under the Treaty of St. Idelfonso, October 1, 1800, and three years had elapsed since then. France was not in the occupancy of the purchase to comply with the treaty negotiated with the Americans. Indeed, when at last the treaty was made known to the Spaniards in Louisiana and even in Spain, protests were received at Washington from both quarters. The Spanish minister served notice on our Government—"that he had orders to warn the Federal Government to suspend the ratification and execution of the treaties of cession of Louisiana, as the French government in securing the province had contracted an engagement with Spain not to retrocede it to any other power. France not having executed that engagement, the treaty of cession was void."

It was thought by many that England had united with Spain to defeat the purchase. The French government had given orders that both transfers of authority should take place at New Orleans at the same time, so as to expedite the surrender to the United States before England could intervene.

Regardless of the Spanish protests, the French charge d'affaires at Washington transmitted instructions to the representative at New Orleans for the transfer. The representative reached there on the 23d of November, 1803. A conference followed between the French and Spanish officials, and it was agreed to make the change. The Spanish troops and militia were arrayed in solemn procession, and in presence of those assembled the commissioners representing France and Spain proclaimed the missions they were charged to execute. The French commissioner presented to the Spanish commissioner the order of the King of Spain for the delivery of the province, dated more than one year previous, and with this was also presented the direction of Napoleon to receive possession in the name of France. The Spanish governor then surrendered the keys of the city, and thereupon the authority of Spain was withdrawn and the Spanish colors lowered as the flag of France was unfurled amid the booming of artillery. The authority of France continued for the brief period of twenty days, and then the last change was to occur, when the Stars and Stripes were to wave over the great empire west of the Mississippi and the Island of New Orleans. On December 20, 1803, the American troops marched into the metropolis and the French prefect announced:

In conformity with the treaty, I put the United States in possession of Louisiana and its dependencies. The citizens and inhabitants who wish to remain here and obey the laws, are from this moment exonerated from the oath of fidelity to the French Republic.

Thereupon the American governor, addressing the concourse present, said:

The cession secures to you and to your descendants the inheritance of liberty, perpetual laws, and magistrates whom you will elect yourselves.

As the French colors came down, and the Stars and Stripes of the American Republic went up, the trumpets sounded, the troops saluted, and cheerful voices with loud huzzahs gave exultant welcome to the grandest and greatest of the young republic's triumphs, which "ranked in historical importance next to the Declaration of Independence and the adoption of the Constitution."

The summit of the Rocky Mountains, as Jefferson held, was accepted to be the northwestern boundary of the Louisiana Purchase, and our country's claim to the domain west of the Rockies was based on other claims which were well founded. The forty-ninth parallel has come down to us as the northern boundary west of the Lake of the Woods, though for nearly fifty years it was a matter of international dispute, and gave rise to a protracted controversy between the United States and Great Britain concerning that portion west of the summit of the mountains, known in early days as the "Oregon country," which from about 1820 to 1846 threatened to terminate in an armed conflict. Great Britain claimed all of that country north of the forty-second parallel, while the United States, disputing Britain's pretensions, insisted upon her right to all the domain as far north as 54° 40' north latitude. The dispute was finally amicably settled by compromise, and the forty-ninth degree was fixed as the northern boundary of the possessions of the United States.

The United States came into possession of this magnificent domain of Louisiana at a cost of 60,000,000 francs in national bonds bearing 6 per cent interest, and in addition assumed the payment of debts owing by France to American merchants, amounting to about twenty million more. On this basis the treaty was consummated, the amount paid reduced to the United States dollar standard, allowing 5½ francs to the dollar, being $15,000,000. In the light of subsequent history, must we not conclude that in this transaction Providence signally favored our country? When intelligence of the treaty reached the President and the people of this country, it was regarded with many misgivings and regrets, except in the Southwest, where the farmers were so vitally interested; and for a time the heads of Jefferson and the leaders of his party rested uneasily for fear that public opinion would be set against them and the Federalists restored to control at the national election in 1804. But as time passed the measure grew in public esteem and greatly strengthened the party in power.

The reader is probably familiar with the extent of the territory so acquired, from the Mississippi west to the summits of the Rocky Mountains, and from the Gulf of Mexico to the international boundary on the north, embracing an area of 875,025 square miles in extent and containing 560,016,000 acres, according to the official figures of the general land office of the United States. It embraced, as shown on our Government maps of today, nearly the entire State of South Dakota, three-fourths of North Dakota, nearly all of Minnesota west of the Mississippi River; all of Montana and Wyoming lying east of the main range of the Rocky Mountains; one-third of Colorado; all of Kansas save the southwest corner south of the Arkansas River; all of the states of Missouri, Iowa, Nebraska and Arkansas; practically all of Oklahoma, including the Indian Territory, and a large part of the State of Louisiana; in extent about one-fourth less than the original thirteen states; and larger than Great Britain, France, Spain, Germany, Italy and Portugal combined. Dakota Territory embraced one of the choicest portions of this grand domain, and after a half century of intelligent practical experience and development, we feel justified in claiming that it enclosed within its boundaries natural resources as varied, as useful, and as necessary to mankind as any area of Mother Earth of equal extent in any portion of the globe. A law was enacted by Congress, that was approved by President Jefferson in March, 1804, giving to the newly acquired country a stable form of government. The lower portion of the land was named the Territory of New Orleans, and the upper portion was named the Territory of Louisiana. Dakota Territory is a part of Louisiana.

LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION

THOMAS JEFFERSON'S EFFORTS TO SECURE THE EXPLORATION OF THE MISSOURI VALLEY—FIRST EXPLORATION PLANNED FROM EASTERN RUSSIA—SECOND ATTEMPT THWARTED BY THE FRENCH—THIRD EFFORT UNDER LEWIS AND CLARK SUCCESSFUL—JEFFERSON'S MESSAGE URGING AN EXPEDITION—CONGRESS FAVORS—LEWIS AND CLARK ON THE WAY—ENTER THE FUTURE DAKOTA, AUGUST 21, 1804—MINERAL POISON IN THE WATER—ELK AND BUFFALO—THE VERMILLION VALLEY AND SPIRIT MOUND.

Thomas Jefferson, the third President of the United States, would seem to have been the first of American statesmen whose interest was aroused regarding the nature and resources of that portion of our country west of the Mississippi River. Even before the formation of the Federal Government he had been party to an agreement in Paris whereby John Ledyard, a famous traveler and explorer, was to make a trip through Russia to Kamschatka by land, thence across the Behring Sea to the Alaskan coast in some Russian vessel engaged in the American Pacific fur trade, of which there were quite a number, thence down into the latitude of the Missouri, and thence to the United States. Ledyard started on this journey with the consent of the Russian government, and reached within 200 miles of Kamschatka, where he was obliged to halt for the winter. In the meantime the Russian empress had concluded to prevent the enterprise, and as he was preparing to resume his journey in the spring, he was arrested and taken to Poland. This ended the enterprise.

"In 1782," using the language of Jefferson, "I proposed to the American Philosophical Society that we should set on foot a subscription to engage some competent person to explore that region in the opposite direction—that is, by ascending the Missouri River, crossing the stony mountains and descending the nearest river to the Pacific. Captain Lewis warmly solicited me to obtain for him the execution of that project. I told him it was proposed that the person engaged should be attended by a single companion only to avoid exciting alarm among the Indians. This did not deter him; but Mr. Andre Michaux, a professed botanist, offering his services, they were accepted. He received his instructions, and when he had reached Kentucky in the prosecution of his journey, he was overtaken by an order from the minister of France, then at Philadelphia, to relinquish the expedition, and to pursue elsewhere the botanical enquiries of the government; and thus failed the second attempt for exploring that region."

In 1803 the act for establishing trading houses among the Indians being about to expire, some modifications of it were recommended to Congress by a confidential message of January 18th and an extension of its views to the Indians on the Missouri. Congress approved the proposition and voted a sum of money for carrying it into execution.

The portion of the message referred to by the President is the following, the preceding portion of the document being taken up with recommendations regarding the Indians east of the Mississippi, among whom the Government had established public or Government trading houses in order to stop the nefarious plundering of the Indians by private traders whose extortions had occasioned much trouble.

While the extension of the public commerce among the Indian tribes may deprive, of that source of profit, such of our citizens as are engaged in it, it might be worthy the attention of Congress in their care of individual as well as of the general interest to point, in another direction, the enterprise of those citizens, as profitably for themselves and more usefully for the public. The River Missouri and the Indians inhabiting it are not as well known as is rendered desirable by their connection with the Mississippi, and consequently with us. It is however understood that the country on that river is inhabited by numerous tribes who furnish great supplies of furs and peltry to the trade of another nation, carried on in a high latitude through an infinite number of portages and lakes shut up by ice through a long season. The commerce on that line could bear no competition with that of the Missouri, traversing a moderate climate, offering, according to the best accounts, a continued navigation from its source, and possibly with a single portage from the western ocean, and finding to the more southern latitude a choice of channels, through the Illinois or Wabash, the lakes and Hudson, through the Ohio and Susquehanna, or Potomac or James rivers. An intelligent officer with ten or twelve chosen men, fit for the enterprise and willing to undertake it, taken from our forts where they may be spared without inconvenience, might explore the whole line, even to the western ocean, have conferences with the natives on the subject of commercial intercourse, get admission among them for our traders as others are admitted, agree on a convenient deposit for an interchange of articles, and return with the information required, in the course of two summers. Their arms and accoutrements, some instruments of observation, and light and cheap presents for the Indians would be all the apparatus they could carry, and with an expectation of a soldier's portion of land on their return, would constitute the whole expense. Their pay would be going on whether here or there. While other civilized countries have encountered great expense to enlarge the boundaries of knowledge, by undertaking voyages of discovery, and for other literary purposes, in various parts and directions, our nation seems to owe to the same objects, as well as its own interests, to explore this, the only line of easy communication across the continent, and so directly traversing our own part of it. The interests of commerce place the principal object within the constitutional powers of Congress; and that it should incidentally advance the geographical knowledge of our own continent, cannot but be an additional gratification. The nation claiming the territory, regarding this as a literary pursuit, which it is in the habit of permitting within its dominions, would not be disposed to view it with jealousy, even if the expiring state of its interests there did not render it a matter of indifference.

The appropriation of $2,500 "for the purpose of extending the external commerce of the United States," while understood and considered by the executive as giving the legislative sanction, would cover the undertaking from notice and prevent the obstructions which interested individuals might otherwise previously prepare in its way.

THO. JEFFERSON.

This message was transmitted to Congress several months before the Louisiana treaty was made with France.

The enterprise having obtained the sanction of Congress, the President immediately made choice of Capt. Meriwether Lewis to command the expedition, basing his action and confidence on his intimate personal acquaintance with the man and officer, regarding whom the President gave the following unqualified indorsement:

Captain Lewis, who had then been near two years with me as private secretary, immediately renewed his solicitations to have the direction of this party. I had now had opportunities of knowing him intimately. Of courage undaunted, possessing a firmness and determination of purpose which nothing but impossibilities could divert from its direction; careful as a father of those committed to his charge, yet steady in the maintenance of discipline; intimate with the Indian character, customs and principles; habituated to the hunting life; guarded, by exact observation of the vegetables and animals of his own country, against losing time in the description of objects already possessed; honest, disinterested, liberal of sound understanding and a fidelity to truth so scrupulous that whatever he should report would be as certain as if seen by ourselves; with all these qualifications, as if selected and implanted by nature in one body, for this express purpose, I could have no hesitancy in confiding the enterprise to him.

Captain Lewis selected as his associates in the enterprise, William Clark, a lieutenant in the army and a younger brother of Gen. George Rogers Clark, conspicuous in the Continental army during the Revolution. Lieutenant Clark received a commission as captain. The plans for the exploration of Louisiana contemplated a voyage up the Missouri River, which was to be explored to its source, thence to cross the mountains and go on by any practical river route to the Pacific. Information was to be gathered regarding the character of the country, its inhabitants, rivers, soil, climate, geography, woods and animals. Captain Lewis left Washington July 5, 1803, and proceeded to Pittsburgh, thence by the Ohio and Mississippi to St. Louis. The soldiers for the expedition were taken from military posts on the Ohio. At Louisville, Kentucky, he was joined by Capt. William Clark, his associate, and they proceeded to St. Louis, where they arrived in December. Here the expedition was organized with as little delay as possible, intending to ascend the Missouri to the highest practicable point they could reach before the channel closed and there establish winter quarters. But the Spanish commander of the province, not having received an official account of the transfer to the United States, was obliged by the general policy of his government to forbid the passage of the expedition through Spanish territory. The expedition then encamped at the mouth of Wood River on the eastern bank of the Mississippi and opposite the mouth of the Missouri, where the winter passed in instructing the men and preparing for the journey.

WILLIAM CLARK

Including the leaders, the party was made up of nine young Kentuckians enlisted for the expedition, fourteen soldiers of the regular army, who had volunteered, two French boatmen, and an interpreter and hunter, and a black servant belonging to Captain Clark, named York. (Their names are given in a subsequent chapter.) Their fleet of boats numbered three, the first a keel boat fifty-five feet long, drawing three feet of water, carrying one large square sail and twenty-two oars. A deck of ten feet in the bow and stern formed a forecastle and cabin, while the middle was covered by lockers which might be raised so as to form a breastwork in case of attack. This was accompanied by two pirogues, or open boats, one of six and the other of seven oars. Two horses were led along the banks of the river for the purpose of bringing in game or hunting. In addition to the force above described, a corporal, six soldiers and nine watermen were taken to accompany the expedition as far as Mandan Village to assist in carrying stores and in case of necessity to repel an attack. A large quantity of Indian goods, besides the necessary outfit of the party, were included in the cargo. The expedition entered the mouth of the Missouri on the 14th day of May, 1804, and proceeded without serious mishap until nearing the present boundary between Iowa or Nebraska and South Dakota. At a council held with the Indians a few days before reaching this point, the explorers first mention meeting with three Yankton-Avan Indians, who were on a visit to the Mahas, and from whom some information is gleaned regarding the disposition of the Dakotah Indians.

We have thought proper to introduce that portion of the journal which describes the passage of the expedition through Dakota as it appears in the published record, beginning with the death of Sergeant Floyd, the first and only fatality that occurred during this memorable journey:

On the 20th of August the party had been holding a council with the Ottobas a few miles below (Sioux City), and that morning, after passing two islands on the north, came to one on that side of the river under some bluffs, the first near the river since we left the Ayauwa village. Here we had the misfortune to lose one of our sergeants, Charles Floyd. He had been seized with a bilious colic the day before, and all the care and attention possible was bestowed upon him, but failed to give him relief. A little before his death he said to Captain Clark, "I am going to leave you"; and his strength failing, he added, "I want you to write me a letter," and died composedly, justifying the high opinion that had been formed of him. He was buried on top of the bluff with the honors due to a brave soldier, and the place of his interment marked by a cedar post on which his name and the day of his death were inscribed. About a mile beyond this place, to which we gave his name, is a small river about thirty yards wide on the north, which we called Floyd's River, where we encamped.

The narrative then gives the entrance of the expedition into the region to become known as Dakota, on the 21st of August, 1804:

The breeze from the southeast carried us by a small willow creek (Perry Creek) on the north, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles above Floyd's River. Here began a range of bluffs which continued till near the mouth of the great Sioux River, three miles beyond Floyd's. This river comes in from the north and is about one hundred yards wide. Mr. Durion, our Sioux interpreter, who is well acquainted with it, says it is navigable upwards of two hundred miles to the falls, and even beyond them; that its sources are near those of the Peters. He also says that below the falls a creek falls in from the eastward, after passing through cliffs of red rock. Of this the Indians make their pipes, and the necessity for procuring that article has introduced a sort of law of nations, by which the banks of the creek are sacred, and even tribes at war meet without hostility at these quarries, which possess a right of asylum. Thus we find among savages certain privileges deemed sacred, by which the rigors of their merciless system of warfare are mitigated. A sense of common danger, where stronger ties are wanting, gives all the binding force of more solemn obligations. The importance of preserving the known and settled rules of warfare among civilized nations, in all their integrity, become strikingly evident, since even savages with their few precarious wants cannot exist in a state of peace or war where this faith is once violated. At $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles we came to two willow islands, beyond which are several sand-bars; and at twelve miles a spot where the Mahas (Omahas) once had a village, now no longer existing. We encamped on the south, having come $24\frac{3}{4}$ miles. The country through which we passed has the same uniform appearance ever since we left the River Platte; rich, low grounds near the river, succeeded by undulating prairies with timber near the waters. Some wolves were seen on the sand beaches to the south; we also procured an excellent fruit, resembling the red currant, growing on a shrub like the privet, and about the height of a wild plum. On the 22d, about three miles distant, we joined the men who had been sent from the Mahas village and who brought us two deer. The bluffs, which reach the river at this place on the south, contain alum, copperas, cobalt, which had the appearance of soft isinglass, pyrites and sandstone, the two first very pure. Above the bluff comes in a small creek on the south, called Rolage Creek. Seven miles above is another cliff on the same side, of alum rock of a dark brown color, containing in its crevices great quantities of cobalt, cemented shells and red earth. From this the river bends to the eastward and approaches the Sioux River within three or four miles. We sailed the greater part of the day and made nineteen miles to our camp on the north side. The sand-bars are, as usual, numerous, and also considerable traces of elk, none of which are yet seen. Captain Lewis, in proving the quality of some of the substance in the first cliff, was considerably injured by the fumes and taste of the cobalt, and took some strong medicine to relieve him from its effects. The appearance of these mineral substances enables us to account for disorders of the stomach with which the party had been affected since we left the River Sioux. We had been in the habit of dipping up the water in the river inadvertently and making use of it till, on examination, the sickness was thought to proceed from a scum covering the surface of the water along the southern shore, and which, as we now discovered, proceeded from these bluffs. The men had been ordered, before we reached the bluffs, to agitate the water so as to disperse the scum, and take the water, not at the surface, but at some depth.

The consequence was that these disorders ceased; the biles, too, which had afflicted the men, were not observed beyond the Sioux River.

In order to supply the place of Sergeant Floyd, we permitted the men to name three persons; and Patrick Gass, having the greatest number of votes, was made a sergeant.

On the following day we set out early, and at four miles came to a small run between cliffs of yellow and blue earth; the wind, however, soon changed, and blew so hard from the west that we proceeded very slowly, the fine sand from the bar being driven in such clouds that we could scarcely see. Three and a quarter miles beyond this run we came to a willow island and a sand island opposite, and we camped on the south side at $10\frac{1}{4}$ miles. On the north side is an extensive and delightful prairie, which we called Buffalo Prairie, from our having there killed the first buffalo. Two elk swam the river today and were fired at, but escaped; a deer was killed from the boat; one beaver was killed and several prairie wolves were seen.

It began to rain last night and continued this morning, the 24th. We proceeded, however, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles to the commencement of a bluff of blue clay, about one hundred and eighty or one hundred and ninety feet on the south side; it seems to have been lately on fire, and even now the ground is so warm that we cannot keep our hands in it at any depth; there are strong appearances of coal, and also great quantities of cobalt, or a crystallized substance resembling it. There is a fruit now ripe resembling a currant, except that it is double the size and grows on a bush like a privet, the size of a damson and of a delicious flavor; its Indian name means rabbit-berries. We then passed, at the distance of about seven miles, the mouth of a creek on the north side, called by an Indian name, meaning Whitestone River (Vermillion River). The beautiful prairie of yesterday has changed into one of greater height, and very smooth and extensive. We encamped on the south side at $10\frac{1}{4}$ miles, and found ourselves much annoyed by the mosquitoes.

SPIRIT MOUNT, CLAY COUNTY
Lewis and Clark monuments

The next morning, September 25th, Captains Lewis and Clark, with ten men, went to see an object deemed very extraordinary among all the neighboring Indians. They dropped down to the mouth of Whitestone River (Vermillion), about thirty yards wide, where they left the boat, and at the distance of 200 yards ascended a rising ground, from which a plain extended itself as far as the eye could discern. After making four miles, they crossed the creek where it is twenty-three yards wide and waters an extensive valley. The heat was so oppressive that we were obliged to send back our dog to the creek, as he was unable to bear the fatigue; and it was not till after four hours' march that we reached the object of our visit. This was a large mound in the midst of the plain about north twenty degrees west from the mouth of Whitestone River, from which it is nine miles distant. The base of the mound is a regular parallelogram, the longest side being about three hundred yards, the shortest sixty or seventy; from the longest side it rises with a steep ascent from the north and south to the height of sixty or seventy feet, leaving on the top a level plain of twelve feet in breadth and ninety in length. The north and south extremities are connected by two oval borders, which serve as new bases, and divide the whole side into three steep but regular gradations from the plain.

The only thing characteristic in this hill is its extreme symmetry, and this, together with its being totally detached from the other hills, which are at the distance of eight or nine miles, would create a belief that it was artificial; but as the earth and the loose pebbles that compose it are arranged precisely like the steep grounds on the borders of the creek, we concluded from this similarity of texture that it might be natural.

But the Indians have made it a great article of their superstition; it is called the Mound of Little People, or Little Spirits, and they believe that it is the abode of little devils in the human form, of about eighteen inches high, and with remarkably large heads; they are armed with sharp arrows, with which they are very skillful, and are always on the watch to kill those who should have the hardihood to approach their residence. The tradition is that many have suffered from these little evil spirits, and, among others, three Waha Indians fell a sacrifice to them a few years since. This has inspired all the neighboring nations—Sioux, Wahas and Ottoes—with such terror that no consideration could tempt them to visit the hill. We saw none of the wicked little spirits, nor any place for them except some small holes scattered on the top. We were happy enough to have escaped their vengeance, though we remained some time on the mound to enjoy the delightful prospect of the plain, which spreads itself out till the eye rests upon the northwest hills at a great distance, and those of the northeast still farther off, enlivened by large herds of buffaloes feeding at a distance. The soil of these plains is exceedingly fine; there is, however, no timber, except on the Missouri, all the wood of the Whitestone River not being sufficient to cover thickly one hundred acres. The plain country which surrounds this mound has contributed not a little to its bad reputation; the wind driving from every direction over the level ground obliges the insects to seek shelter on its leeward side, or be driven against it by the wind.

The excessive heat and thirst forced us from the hill, about 1 o'clock, to the nearest water, which we found in the creek at three miles distance, and remained an hour and a half. We then went down the creek through a lowland about one mile in width, and crossed it three times, to the spot where we first reached it in the morning. Here we gathered some delicious plums, grapes and blue currants, and afterwards arrived at the mouth of the river about sunset. To this place the course from the mound is south twenty degrees, east nine miles. We there resumed our periogue, and on reaching our encampment of last night set the prairies on fire to warn the Sioux of our approach.

In the meantime the boat under Sergeant Pryor had proceeded during the afternoon one mile to a bluff of blue clay on the south, and after passing a sand bar and two sand islands, fixed their camp at the distance of six miles on the south. We had killed a duck and several birds; in the boat they had caught some large catfish.

We rejoined the boat at 9 o'clock on Sunday the 26th, before she set out, and then passing by an island and under a cliff on the south, nearly two miles in extent and composed of white and blue earth, encamped at nine miles distance on a sand-bar toward the north. Opposite to this, on the south, is a small creek called Petit Arc, or Little Bow, and a short distance above it an old village of the same name. This village, of which nothing remains but the mound of earth about four feet high surrounding it, was built by a Waha chief named Little Bow, who, being displeased with Black Bird (the principal chief), the late king, seceded with 200 followers and settled at this spot which is now abandoned, as the two villages have reunited since the death of Black Bird. We have great quantities of grapes, and plums of three kinds—two of a yellow color and distinguished by one of the species being longer than the other, and a third round and red; all have an excellent flavor, particularly those of a yellow kind.

CHAPTER III

AT THE MOUTH OF JAMES RIVER—YANKTON INDIANS SEND FRIENDLY GREETINGS—AT THE FUTURE CAPITAL OF DAKOTA—FOUR DAYS COUNCIL WITH THE YANKTONS—AMERICAN FLAG UNFURLED—ADMIRABLE SPEECHES—A NEVER-SURRENDER INDIAN BAND—STRIKE-THE-REE THE FIRST—CENSUS—CALUMET BLUFF—FORTIFICATIONS AT BON HOMME ISLAND IN RUINS—PRINCE MADOC AND THE MANDAN INDIANS.

August 27th (nearing Yankton). The morning star appears much larger than usual. A gentle breeze from the southeast carried us by some large sand-bars on both sides and in the middle of the river to a cliff on the south side at $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles distant; this bluff is of white clay or chalk, under which is much stone, like lime, incrusting with a clear substance supposed to be cobalt, and some dark ore. About this bluff we set the prairie on fire to invite the Sioux. After $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles we had passed several other sand-bars, and soon reached the mouth of a river called by the French Jacques (James River), or Yankton, from the tribe which inhabits its banks. It is about ninety yards wide at the confluence; the country which it waters is rich prairie, with little timber; it becomes deeper and wider above its mouth, and may be navigated a great distance, as its sources rise near those of St. Peter's of the Mississippi and the Red River of Lake Winnipeg. As we came to the mouth of the river an Indian swam to the boat, and on our landing we were met by two others, who informed us that a large body of Sioux were encamped near us. They accompanied three of our men, with an invitation to meet us at a spot above on the river; the third Indian remained with us.

He is a Maha boy, and says that his nation has gone to the Pawnees to make peace with them. At fourteen miles we encamped on a sand-bar to the north ($1\frac{1}{2}$ miles above the James). The air was cool, the evening pleasant, the wind from the southeast and light. The river has fallen gradually, and is now low.

On Tuesday, the 28th of August, we passed, with a stiff breeze from the south, several sand-bars. On the south is a prairie which rises gradually from the water to the height of a bluff which is, at four miles distance, of a whitish color and about seventy or eighty feet high. Farther on is another bluff of a brownish color, on the north side; and at the distance of $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles is the beginning of Calumet Bluff, on the south side (ten miles from the James), under which we formed our camp, in a beautiful plain, to await the arrival of the Sioux. At the first bluff the young Indian left us and joined his camp.

Before reaching Calumet Bluff, one of the periogues ran upon a log in the river and was rendered unfit for service, so that all our loading was put into the second periogue. On both sides of the river are fine prairies with cottonwood, and near the bluff there is more timber at the points and valleys than we have been accustomed to see.

August 29th, on Wednesday, we had a violent storm of wind and rain last evening, and were engaged during the day in repairing the periogue and other necessary occupations, when at 4 o'clock in the afternoon Sergeant Pryor and his party arrived on the opposite side attended by five chiefs and about seventy men and boys. We sent a boat for them and they joined us, as did also Mr. Durion, the son of our interpreter, who happened to be trading with the Sioux at this time. He returned with Sergeant Pryor to the Indians, with a present of tobacco, corn and a few kettles, and told them we would speak to their chiefs in the morning. Sergeant Pryor reported that on reaching their village, which is at twelve miles distance from our camp, he was met by a party with a buffalo robe on which they desired to carry their visitors, an honor which they declined, informing the Indians that they were not the commanders of the boat. As a great mark of respect they were then presented with a fat dog already cooked, of which they partook heartily and found it well flavored.

The camps (lodges) of the Sioux are of conical form, covered with buffalo robes, painted with various figures and colors, with an aperture in the top for the smoke to pass through. The lodges contain from ten to fifteen persons, and the interior arrangement is compact and handsome, each lodge having a place for cooking detached from it.

On Thursday, the 30th, the fog was so thick that we could not see the Indian camp on the opposite side; but it cleared off about 8 o'clock. We prepared a speech and some presents, and then sent for the chiefs and warriors, whom we received at 12 o'clock under a large oak tree, near to which the flag of the United States was flying. Captain Lewis delivered a speech, with the usual advice and counsel for their future conduct. We then acknowledged their chiefs by giving to the grand chief a flag, a medal, a certificate with a string of wampum, to which we added a chief's coat that is a richly laced uniform of the United States Artillery Corps, and a cocked hat and red feather. One second chief and three inferior ones were made or recognized by medals and a suitable present of tobacco and articles of clothing. We then smoked the pipe of peace, and the chiefs retired to a bower formed of bushes by their young men, where they divided among each other the presents, and smoked and ate, and held a council on the answer which they were to make us tomorrow. The young people exercised their bows and arrows in shooting at marks for beads, which we distributed to the best marksmen; and in the evening the whole party danced to a late hour, and in the course of their amusement we threw among them some knives, tobacco, bells, tops and binding, with which they were much pleased. Their musical instruments were the drum and a sort of little bag made of buffalo hide dressed white, with small shot or pebbles in it, and a bunch of hair tied to it. This produces a sort of rattling music, with which the party was annoyed by four musicians during the council this morning.

On the morning of the 31st, after breakfast, the chiefs met and sat down in a row, with pipes of peace highly ornamented, and all pointed toward the seats intended for Captains Lewis and Clark. When they arrived and were seated, the grand chief, whose Indian name, Weucha, is in English Shake Hand, and in French is called Le Libérateur (the deliverer), rose and spoke at some length, approving what we had said and promising to follow our advice.

"I see before me," said he, "my great father's two sons. You see me and the rest of our chiefs and warriors. We are very poor. We have neither powder nor ball, nor knives, and our women and children at the village have no clothes. I wish that, as my brothers have given me a flag, and a medal, they would give something to those poor people or let them stop and trade with the first boat that comes up the river. I will bring chiefs of the Pawnees and Mahas together and make peace between them; but it is better that I should do it than my great father's sons, for they will listen to me more readily. I will also take some chiefs to your country in the spring; but before that time I cannot leave home. I went formerly to the English and they gave me a medal and some clothes; when I went to the Spanish they gave me a medal, but nothing to keep it from my skin; but now you give me a medal and clothes. But still we are poor, and I wish, brothers, you would give us something for our squaws."

When he sat down, Mahtoree, or White Crane, arose: "I have listened," said he, "to what our father's words were yesterday, and I am glad today to see how you have dressed our old chief. I am a young man and do not wish to take much; my fathers have made me a chief; I had much sense before, but now I think I have more than ever. What the old chief has declared I will confirm, and do whatever he and you please; but I wish that you would take pity on us, for we are very poor."

Another chief called Pau-nau-ne-ah-pah-be (Strike-the-Ree) then said: "I am a young man and know but little. I cannot speak well, but I have listened to what you have told the old chief and will do whatever you agree."

The same sentiments were then repeated by Awea Wechache. We were surprised at finding that the first of these titles means, "Struck by the Pawnees," and was occasioned by some blow which the chief received in battle from one of the Pawnee tribe. The second is, in English, "Half Man," which seems a singular name for a warrior, till it was explained to have its origin probably in the modesty of the chief, who, on being told of his exploits, would say: "I am no warrior; I am only half a man." The other chiefs spoke very little, but after they had finished, one of the warriors delivered a speech in which he declared he would support them. They promised to make peace with the Ottoes and Missouris, the only nations with whom they are at war. All these harangues concluded by describing the distress of the nation; they begged us to have pity on them; to send them traders; that they wanted powder and ball, and seemed anxious that we should supply them with some of the great father's milk, the name by which they distinguish ardent spirits.

We then gave some tobacco to each of the chiefs, and a certificate to two of the warriors who attended the chief. We prevailed on Mr. Durion to remain here, and accompany as many of the Sioux chiefs as he could collect down to the seat of government. We also gave his son a flag, some clothes, and provisions, with directions to bring about a peace between the surrounding tribes, and to convey some of their chiefs to see the President. In the evening they left us and encamped on the opposite bank, accompanied by the two Durions.

During the evening and night we had much rain and observed that the river raised a little. The Indians who have just left us are the Yanktons, a tribe of the great nation of Sioux. These Yanktons are about two hundred men in number, and inhabit the Jacques, Des Moines, and Sioux rivers. In person they are stout, well proportioned, and have a certain air of dignity and boldness. In their dress they differ nothing from the other bands of the nation whom we saw and will describe afterwards; they are fond of decorations, and use eagle and porcupine quills and feathers. Some of them wear a kind of necklace of white beads, called chickah, three inches long and closely strung together around their necks.

They have only a few fowling pieces, being generally armed with bows and arrows, in which, however, they do not appear to be as expert as the more northern Indians. What struck us most was an institution peculiar to them, and to the Kito Indians farther to the westward, from whom it is said to have been copied. It is an association of the most active and brave young men, who are bound to each other by attachment, secured by a vow never to retreat before any danger, or give way to their enemies. In war they go forward without sheltering themselves behind trees, or aiding their natural valor by any artifice. This punctilious determination not to be turned from their course became heroic or ridiculous a short time since, when the Yanktons were crossing the Missouri on the ice. A hole lay immediately in their course which might easily have been avoided by going round. This the foremost of the band disdained to do, but went straight forward and was lost. The others would have followed his example, but were forcibly prevented by the rest of the tribe. These young men sit, and encamp, and dance together, distinct from the rest of the nation; they are generally about thirty or thirty-five years old; and such is the deference paid to courage that their seats in council are superior to those of the chiefs, and their persons more respected. But, as may be supposed, such indiscreet bravery will soon diminish the number of those who practice it, so that the band is now reduced to four warriors, who were among our visitors. These were the remains of twenty-two who composed their society not long ago; but in a battle with the Kito Indians of the Black Mountains eighteen of them were killed, and these four were dragged from the field by their companions.

While these Indians remained with us we made very minute inquiries in relation to their situation and numbers, and trade and manners. This we did very satisfactorily by means of two different interpreters, and from their accounts joined to our interviews with other bands of the same nation, and much intelligence acquired since, we were enabled to understand with some accuracy the condition of the Sioux, hitherto so little known.

The Sioux, or Dacota Indians, originally settled on the Mississippi, and called, by Carver, Madowesians, are now subdivided into tribes as follows:

First, the Yanktons. This tribe inhabits the Sioux, Des Moines and Jacques rivers, and numbers about two hundred warriors.

Second, the Tetons of the burnt woods. This tribe numbers about three hundred men, who rove on both sides of the Missouri, the White, and the Teton rivers.

Third, the Tetons Okaudaudas, a tribe consisting of about one hundred and fifty men, who inhabit both sides of the Missouri River below the Cheyenne River.

Fourth, Tetons Minna Kennozzo, a nation inhabiting both sides of the Missouri River, above the Cheyenne River, and containing about two hundred and fifty men.

Fifth, Tetons Saone. These inhabit both sides of the Missouri River below the Warre-conne River, and consist of about three hundred men.

Sixth, Yanktons of the Plains, or Big Devils, who rove on the heads of the Sioux, Jacques and Red rivers; the most numerous of all the tribes and number about five hundred men.

Seventh, Wahpatone, a nation residing on the St. Peter's, just above the mouth of that river, and numbering 200 men.

Eighth, Minda-war-carton, or proper Dacota or Sioux Indians. These possess the original seat of the Sioux and are properly so denominated. They rove on both sides of the Mississippi about the Falls of St. Anthony, and consist of 300 men.

Ninth, the Wahpakoota, or Leaf Beds. This nation inhabits both sides of the River St. Peter's below Yellowwood River, amounting to about one hundred and fifty men.

Tenth, Sistasoone. This nation numbers 200 men and reside at the head of the St. Peter's. Of these several tribes more particular notice will be taken hereafter.

A slight digression here seems to be necessary because of some divergent accounts regarding the place where this council was held.

The language of the Lewis and Clark journal regarding this camp is this: "At the distance of $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (from the last camp $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles above the mouth of James River) is the beginning of Calumet Bluff, under which we formed our camp, on the south." This would bring the second camping place above the James ten miles from its mouth. The encampment near the mouth of the James was in section 19, town 93, range 54, as since surveyed. The next camp (estimated) was not far from the present township line dividing ranges 55 and 56 west, which is only a few feet west of Broadway, Yankton, and nearly opposite the old Village of Green Island, Nebraska, which was swept away in the flood of 1881. It is impossible to locate Calumet Bluff, or the beginning of it, at Green Island, or within any reasonable distance of that place. The insuperable difficulty is to make the natural conditions on the south side correspond with the description of the country on that shore as given by the editor of Lewis and Clark's journal, while no such difficulty exists with regard to the north side. The editor of the journal admits that there may be discrepancies between the original notes and his transcription. The notes had already passed through two hands in preparation for publication. None of these transcribers or editors were members of the expedition party. Captain Lewis died five years before the journal was finally edited and ready for publication, and could not have revised the work of the editors.

The camp of the Yankton Indians was not far from the mouth of the James River, and the journal says the Indians had come twelve miles from their camp to the place of this grand council. The journal does not state on which side of the James the Yanktons had their camp, and this distance of twelve miles, owing to their being obliged to follow the bends of the river, would just about bring them to within a half mile of the foot of Broadway. We disdain any purpose to deny the integrity of the journal, but there is no way to harmonize its statement with regard to this council ground, assuming that the south side of the river was meant, unless we move the council ground to the north side, or remove Calumet Bluff from the north to the south side. Then, again, why should the Yankton Indians, a powerful representative of the great Dahkotchah nation, whose good will and friendship was so much desired by the Government, have been compelled to cross the great river to a country not their own to hold this council when they could offer superior camping facilities, with far less inconvenience, in their own country?

It may be asked why, if the camp was on the north side of the river, a boat was sent to transfer Sergeant Pryor across? The boat, however, is not mentioned when the Indians were sent for; but presuming that the camp had been formed under Calumet Bluff on the north side, and on the south side of the Calumet Bluff, which is a reasonable interpretation of the language, the camp would not have been easily accessible by land. There was no trail down the bluff in this vicinity. The journal says the river ran near the bluffs on both sides. It would seem that the Indians coming up from their camp on the James reached the high bank of the Missouri in the neighborhood of the foot of Locust Street, Yankton, where the camp down in the valley could be distinctly seen and the Indians could also be observed from the camp. It is not at all unlikely that the approach to the camp, along the Yankton shore, was beset with sand bars and water holes, and may have been entirely under water, and that Lewis and Clark had formed their camp with the purpose of taking advantage of the protection afforded by nature in these and other favorable surroundings. As the Indians could not descend the bluff and make their way to the camp along the shore, a boat was sent down to the first landing place for them. The locality of the camp might be regarded as of less importance but for the first council that was here held under the sanction of the Government and the protection of the flag. This was the first formal council held between the representatives of the United States and the native inhabitants of this territory, and the first occasion when the Stars and Stripes, our national emblem, was displayed as a token of sovereignty upon the soil of Dakota.

The Indians were fine specimens of physical manhood. The chiefs, and a number of his warriors, wore a suit of buckskin curiously wrought with beads of a variety of colors, while the head chief wore, in addition, a coronet of eagle's feathers continuing down the back almost to his feet.

Captain Lewis was particularly impressed with the frank demeanor and disingenuous manners of the savages, and he seems to have been greatly gratified at meeting with such courtesies as they, in their primitive etiquette, extended him and his crew. Their conical tepees were a subject of close investigation and greatly admired. These were made of dressed buffalo and elk skins, painted or stained white and crimson, presenting a most pleasing and fanciful appearance. Inside, the principal ones, were partially carpeted with robes and an occasional beaver and fox skin could be seen. Probably the Indians had desired to make their appearance and display of regal order, and were not exhibiting to the white people their ordinary domestic life or every day apparel, which, however, only serves to prove that they possessed a certain barbaric culture.

that we look for almost in vain amongst our American Indians after a century's intercourse with white people.

The council was the occasion for the distribution of many medals and presents to the chiefs and braves who were in attendance and they were given to understand that these gifts were from the Great Father at Washington, who, though he could not be present in person, was with them in these gifts and wished to assure them that the welfare of his Indian children was a matter in which he felt the warmest interest. Some of these Jeffersonian medals were in possession of the Yankton Indians more than a half century later.

The language of the Lewis and Clark journal in leaving Yankton September 1st betrays the error of presuming that their camp at Yankton had been on the south side. First, the journal of the 28th says they made their camp at the beginning of the Calumet Bluff on the south.

As no such bluff existed on that side a camp could not be made under it; but such a bluff did exist and still exists on the north side and extends for several miles up the river, and when the expedition left its Yankton Camp on Saturday, September 1st, the journal says: "We proceeded this morning and passed the Calumet bluffs. These are composed of a yellowish-red and brownish clay as hard as chalk which it much resembles, and are 170 to 180 feet high." This description could not have been given unless Mr. Lewis made a personal examination. These are the same Calumet bluffs or chalk rock bluffs that extend from Yankton to the Cement works, and under the beginning of these the expedition's journal states that they made their camp. There is nothing even remotely resembling them on the south side.

Mr. M. K. Armstrong, author of the history of Dakota published in 1866, was well informed in such matters, and had frequent occasion during his pioneer residence in Yankton, beginning in 1859, to converse with the old Yankton Indians then residing here, many of whom, including the chief, "Strike the Ree," remembered the occasion of Lewis and Clark's visit. A published statement made at the time by Mr. Armstrong regarding the location of Lewis and Clark's camps, says:

It is difficult to determine the exact locality of their encampment at that time, but from all the information that can be gained from their journal and other authentic sources, we are of the belief that it must have been at the Oak Point and Bluff on the premises of J. S. Frohn, adjoining the townsite. It could hardly have been at the Billido Bluffs, four miles above, or at Smooty Bear's camp, nine miles from here, for in descending the river in 1806 they encamped on a sandbar opposite Calumet Bluff, on the night of the 1st of September, and passed the mouth of James River at 8 o'clock next morning, having traveled by river about ten miles from the bluff.

It will be observed that the sojourn of the explorers at the Yankton Camp covered a period of four days, a longer time than was given to any other locality until the party went into winter quarters.

Monday, September 1, 1804. We proceeded this morning and passed the Calumet Bluffs, these are composed of a yellowish-red and brownish clay as hard as chalk, which it much resembles, and are 170 to 180 feet high. At this place the hills on each side come to the surface of the river, those on the south some higher than those on the north. Opposite the bluff is a large island (Ambrose Island) covered with timber, above which the high bluffs continued over the river on the north side called White Bear Cliff, an animal of that name being said to live in the holes in it, which are numerous and apparently deep. At six miles we passed a large bluff, which covered with a forest of cedars. We made fifteen miles to a bluff on the north side, at the lower point of a large island called Bon Homme or Good-hope Island.

The country on both sides has the same character of prairies, with no timber, with occasional bushes, and a few trees of elm and oak. Our hunters had killed an elk and a moose the night before on a grassy plain. The following day we went three miles to the lower point of a large island on the south side, and passed the head of Bon Homme Island, which is a grassy and well timbered. After this the wind became so violent that we kept the mouth of the river on the north side, under a high bluff of yellow clay about one hundred yards long for a night. Our hunters supplied us with four elk, and we had grapes and plums on the banks; we also saw the beargrass and rue on the sides of the bluffs. At this place there are highlands on both sides of the river, which become more level at some distance back, and contain but few streams of water. On the southern bank, during this day, the grounds have not been so elevated. Captain Clark crossed the river to examine the remains of the fortification we had first passed. This interesting object is on the south side of the Missouri opposite the upper extremity of Bon Homme Island, and in a low, level plain, the hills being three miles from the river. It begins by a wall composed of earth, rising immediately from the bank of the river, and running in a direct course S. 76: W. ninety-six yards; the base of this wall or mound is seventy-five feet and its height about eight. It then diverges in a course S. 84: W. and continues at the same height and depth to the distance of fifty-three yards, the angle being formed by a sloping descent; at the junction of these two is the appearance of a hornwork of the same height with the first angle; the same wall then pursues a course at 69: W. for 300 yards; near its western extremity is an opening or gateway at right angles to the wall and projecting inwards; this gateway is defended by two nearly semi-circular walls placed before it, lower than the large walls, and from the gateway there seems to have been a covered way communicating with the interval between these two walls; westward of the gate the wall becomes much larger, being about one hundred and five feet at its base and twelve feet high; at the end of this high ground the wall extends for fifty-six yards on a course at 32: W.; it then turns to N. 32: W. for seventy-three yards; these two walls seem to have had a double or covered way; they are from 10 to 15 feet 8 inches in height, and from 75 to 150 feet in width at the base, the descent inwards being step, while outwards it forms a sort of glacis. At the distance of seventy-three yards the wall ends abruptly at a large hollow place much lower than the general level of the plain, and from which is some indication of a covered way to the water.

The space between them is occupied by several mounds scattered promiscuously through the gorge, in the center of which is a deep, round hole. From the extremity of the last wall, in a course N. 32: W. is a distance of ninety-six yards over the low ground, where the wall recommences and crosses the plain over in a course N. 81: W. for 1,830 yards to the bank of the Missouri. In this course its height is about eight feet, till it enters, at the distance of 533 yards, a deep circular pond of seventy-three yards diameter; after which it gradually lowers towards the river; it touches the river at a muddy bar, that bears every mark of being an encroachment of the water, for a considerable distance, and a little above the junction is a small circular redoubt.

Along the bank of the river and at 1,100 yards distance, in a straight line from this wall, is a second, about six feet high and of considerable width; it rises abruptly from the banks of the Missouri, at a point where the river bends, and goes straight forward, forming an acute angle with the last wall until it enters the river again not far from the mounds just described, towards which it is obviously tending. At the bend the Missouri is 500 yards wide; the ground at the opposite side highlands, or low hills on the bank; and where the river passes between this front and Bon Homme Island, all the distance from the bend, it is constantly washing the banks into the streams, a large sand bank being already taken from the shore near the wall. During the whole course of this wall or glacis, it is covered with trees, among which are many large cotton trees that are two to three feet in diameter. Immediately opposite the citadel, or the part most strongly fortified on Bon Homme Island, is a small work in a circular form, with a wall surrounding it about six feet in height. The young willows along the water joined to the general appearance of the two shores induce a belief that the bank of the island is encroaching, and the Missouri indemnifies itself by washing away the base of the fortification.

The citadel contains about twenty acres, but the parts between the long walls must embrace nearly five hundred acres. These are the first remains of the kind which we have had an opportunity of examining; but our French interpreter assures us that there are great numbers of them on the Platte, the Kansas, the Jacques, etc., and some of our party say that they observed two of these fortresses on the Petite Arc (Little Bow) Creek not far from its mouth; that the wall was about six feet high and the sides of the angles 100 yards in length.

This fortification, Lewis concluded, was the ruins of an ancient fort that had been constructed by a fairly intelligent people, who possessed considerable knowledge of the science of military architecture. Durion, the interpreter, who had spent his life with the Indians, was unable to enlighten the captain, but told him that a similar work would be found on the James River; but even the Sioux Indian tribe had no tradition that threw any light upon the matter. Directly across the channel on the island shore was found the disintegrating remains of what appeared to have been a citadel as ancient and probably a contemporary with the fort when constructed and undoubtedly designed for use in connection with the fortification in case of necessity. The citadel was or had been a circular structure, and outside and enclosing it was a stone wall six feet high in places.

[Note by Ed.] The traditional story of the Mandan people forces itself upon the mind in contemplating the description of these works and those at Fort Troupson, constructed apparently for the protection and defense of a partially civilized people against an enemy that was at any time liable to assail them. These Mandans had passed up the Missouri Valley long before,—how long is left to conjecture, but they had constructed and occupied a fortification above Fort Pierre, and had abandoned that, and Lewis found them hundreds of miles farther north. There is a mystery connected with them, which the present generation of Mandans nor that which existed when Captain Lewis met them, were able or willing to unravel. Many of them did not resemble other Indians except partially, while in many striking physical characteristics they are essentially non-Indian. Some had blue eyes, various shades of hair; the absence of high cheek bones, the almost fair complexion of many of them, the knowledge they still possessed of some of the primitive arts, including agriculture, all go to prove that they are a race of people developing into a higher civilization, or in the process of retroceding from a civilized and enlightened race to the barbaric state. It would seem that the latter theory would conform best with the little that is known of this remarkable people. They are the special aversion of the Dakotah Indians who have never omitted an opportunity to wreak their enmity upon them, and in explanation of the fortifications at Bonhomme it would appear to have been built for the purpose of protecting and defending a numerous body of civilized or semi-civilized people against a relentless and powerful enemy. The site had been selected intelligently for the purpose of a permanent abode, and no doubt was occupied and used as the home of a people who practiced agriculture, trapped, hunted, fished, always wary of their red skinned enemy who sometimes may have come in force to assail them, when lodged behind the battlements of their fort they could as successfully resist as the other could assault, and if the dire emergency ever arose when their fortifications were taken, their citadel across the narrow channel afforded a secure place of retreat and an almost absolute defensive structure against any arms their enemy was conversant with. The Mandans courted peace by isolating themselves from all other human beings. They were unlike any other Indian tribe and avoided any fellowship with their race. They had no desire to affiliate with other Indian tribes or other whites. They desired to be let alone, and pass unobserved except as their necessities required them to barter with the traders.

Now that we have indulged in some speculation concerning this strange band of nomadic people we ask the reader's attention to a brief review of the career of this remarkable tribe, and would direct attention to the result, after many centuries of trial, of the intermarriage of whites and Indians. The Mandans would seem to furnish a living illustration of the benefits accruing to the Indian nature by this intermarriage or miscegenation, with the better class of white people, and if the narrative is a true one it furnishes the most interesting evidences that truth is stranger than fiction. The Mandan Indians have been recognized as one of the oldest tribes in North America and their existence and career have been traced back for several centuries, when even before the Columbian era, they were a numerous and peaceful tribe inhabiting a portion of the South Atlantic coast. It is known that connected with them were a number of white men of superior intelligence and of strong religious inclinations. These were supposed to be Welshmen, who, under a leader known as Prince Madoc, visited this continent from Wales in the twelfth century. This party made one successful voyage and a second was undertaken, but no authentic information of the fate of the party was ever obtained, unless this tradition, which has the support of one, or perhaps two, early missionaries, should prove to be well founded. The tradition informs us that these white voyagers and explorers were shipwrecked near the coast peopled by the Mandans, probably Georgia as now known, and the survivors found shelter and subsistence from the Indians, with whom they continued to dwell, and realizing the hopelessness of rescue, finally, and with devout sincerity, concluded to unite their destinies with these strange barbarous people, and with them spend the remainder of their days, taking Indian wives, and adopting Indian customs so far as necessary, and teaching the better customs, methods and religion of the whites to the Indians. This may have been 700 years ago, and somewhat in confirmation of this is the story that a Welsh ship, on a voyage of discovery was lost on the southern Atlantic coast near the close of the twelfth century. In any event these whites or their descendants were seen and conversed with later by missionaries and explorers, and through the medium of their language it was ascertained that these whites were of Welsh extraction. As time passed the Mandans, with all other aboriginal peoples, were crowded back from the coast by the aggressive and increasing forces of civilization, and as the Mandans would abandon a country where one or two generations had been born and lived and died, it would be discovered that they were not like the other Indian nations; that they possessed a knowledge of many arts not common to the children of the forest; that they had erected substantial log buildings for residences, and their cultivated fields were far in advance of any agricultural knowledge possessed and practiced by Indians generally, and occasional instances of the construction of substantial fortifications were encountered. The story goes that there was always a sort of reticence or backwardness on the part of the members of this tribe, when asked a question that concerned their history, as though they knew a tradition of a singular character concerning themselves, but which they did not fully believe and felt that those who pressed them to relate it would brand it as an invention pure and simple.

It is conjectured by some of the missionary writers that they fully realized a radical difference between their nation and other Indian nations, and even after the lapse of centuries their speech disclosed a foreign ingredient that they explained had been imparted by intercourse with a strange people in the remote past. The physiological characteristics of many of them denoted a blended organism. In its migrations west the tribe finally reached the Valley of the Missouri. They seem to have made a settlement at certain points where they have remained a half or a full century, perhaps longer, then would follow a removal and the founding of a new village or fort hundreds of miles away. We believe it was the Mandans who built and occupied the Bon Homme fortifications which excited so much interest in the mind of Captain Lewis, and that he would have found the colony there had his exploration occurred a century or two earlier. They had passed on long anterior to his time, had built and abandoned another century old home, near Fort Thompson, and were beyond the reach of civilization by a half century at least when he formed their acquaintance. In numbers they had become reduced to a fragment of a tribe, still possessing, however, traits of character, customs and an unIndian appearance that placed them in a class by themselves. They are a survival of the fittest, perhaps, of what can be produced by the union of the Anglo Saxon and native American under fairly favorable circumstances, and seem to demonstrate that no advantage has come to either race as a result of their long centuries of experiment.

George Catlin, a famous painter and authority on Indian traditions gathered by himself during years of patient labor among them, from 1850 up, while visiting with the Mandans, came to believe that they had descended from a company of Welsh explorers who landed on the shores of North America about two hundred years before the arrival of Columbus. Of the ten ships which left Northern Wales some time about 1290, in charge of Prince Modoc, no tidings were ever heard, but Catlin was of opinion that they planted a colony in the region of Ohio, coming inland from the southern shore or coast; and after his sojourn with them in their fortified village on the Upper Missouri he had no difficulty in tracing them back, and down the river, and up the Ohio to the immense fortifications of that country. Thus finding constant tracks of these ruins, he became convinced that the Indians, with whom he had passed so much gates, were descended from those ancient builders. In some instances those forts had walls twenty and thirty feet high, with carefully covered passages leading to the water. Again the similarity can be traced in the Mandan canoe, which was an exact counterpart of the "coracle of the Welsh," made of buffalo hides stretched over a frame of willows, and fashioned as round as a tub. Catlin found the Mandans living in a massive stockade, with convenient portholes, on two sides of which their city was fortified by standing back upon the edge of precipices that struck down a rock ledge to the river's brink. Their lodges were circular in form, and from forty to sixty feet in diameter. The Mandans were good farmers and believed in diversity of crops; raising corn, squashes and pumpkins. Their cellars for storing their dried vegetables and corn in winter were dug six or seven feet deep, smaller at the top in a sort of jug like shape, and no matter how severe the winter nothing ever froze. Their homes were clean, comfortable and commodious. (Here is where the Welsh intermixture is revealed.) Many of the women were almost white, with gray, hazel or blue eyes; hair of every shade but auburn, which they delighted to spread out, its long folds reaching to their knees. Many of the Ohio specimens of pottery dug from those archaic fortifications were like the utensils used by the Mandans, who spent much time in moulding pitchers, vases, pots and cups; baking the clay in kilns built in the hill sides; and from those ingenious artisans the fur hunters used to get a beautiful and durable blue glass bead, of their own manufacture, but the process was never revealed by them to the whites.

There is a legend among them that their ancestors once lived under a great body of water that is far to the northeast; but that some of the people came out from their homes beneath the seas, and their glowing accounts led others to leave, also, for the outside country, although some were unable to climb out. From the time of leaving their homes under the deep waters, they wandered over the prairies, suffering much, but always delivered by their Good Angel, through some miraculous interposition, and in time they were led by messengers who went south, "to the fertile land of the buffalo and elk, and people who lived in houses and tilled the ground." But still they journeyed, and at length found themselves in the great valleys along the Missouri River; and there they dwelt and learned many arts. This legend certainly bears indications that give plausibility to the Welsh Colony theory.

Bryant, who was not friendly to the claim that a Welsh Colony had discovered America prior to Columbus, and had become miscegenated with the Mandans, makes mention of the tradition in his "Popular History of the United States," discussing the subject substantially as follows:

The tradition that America was discovered about the year 1170 by a Welsh prince named Madog or Madoc, is still more circumstantial (referring to a prior claim of the Arabs), and attempts to support it have been made from time to time for the last 200 years. Humboldt, in alluding to it, says:

It is not alone the scorn with which national traditions are too often treated, and am of the opinion that with more research, the discovery of facts entirely unknown would throw some light on some historical problems.

This tradition relating to Madoc and his voyage had no doubt some actual basis of fact. The evidence adduced from time to time in support of it has been believed worthy of serious and entertaining, the tradition itself has found a place in historical writings for one reason or each, and all these reasons, it demands brief consideration. It is evident that much of the narrative following was inspired by a desire to prove that the Welsh were entitled to just credit as the pioneers in the discovery of the American continent, and to supersede the claims of Columbus by two and possibly three centuries. But each writer should concern themselves with the Mandan story, although entertaining it as a historical problem.

The story was first related in Caradoc's "History of Wales," published by Dr. David Powell in 1695, and subsequently, however, came down only to 1157, and Humphrey Llwyd (1649-1729) has maintained that the later story of Madoc is a forgery. The story is briefly this: "When Owen Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, was gathered to his fathers, a strife arose among his sons as to the inheritance. Madoc, one of the sons, took no part in the struggle, but gathered a fleet and went to sea in search of adventure. He sailed westward and at length came to an unknown country where the natives differed from any people he had ever seen before, and all things were strangs and new. Seeing that the land was pleasant and fertile, he put on shore and left behind most of those in his ships, and returned to Wales. On his return he set forth the attractive qualities of the new land he had discovered with such good effect that enough of his countrymen to fill ten ships determined to go with him."

The number of these emigrants is not given, and it should be remembered that ships in that day were small affairs compared with modern vessels. Columbus 300 years later, in his first voyage, had three ships and but 120 men. Madoc probably took with him a number of families, intending to found a colony. There is no account of their ever returning to Wales, but it is said "they followed the manners of the land they came to, and used the language they found there."

Passing to the evidence since gathered, that a tribe of Indians, some of whom were of light complexion, and spoke a language differing from the Indian language in part, and resembling the Welsh tongue, who were found within the limits of the American Colonies in the seventeenth century, it is found that among the earliest testimony is a letter to Dr. Thomas Lloyd, of Pennsylvania, and by him transmitted to his brother, Mr. C. H. S. Lloyd, in Wales. The letter was written by Rev. Morgan Jones, a Welsh missionary, and was dated at New York, March 10th, 1685. The letter states that Mr. Jones was sent as chaplain of an expedition from Virginia to Port Royal, S. C., in 1660, where he remained some months; but suffering greatly for food, he and five others started to return to Virginia. On the way they were taken prisoners by a band of Indians and condemned to die. On hearing the sentence, Mr. Jones exclaimed, in the Welsh tongue: "Have I escaped so many dangers, and must I now be knocked on the head like a hog." Immediately he was seized around the waist by a war captain of the Doegs, and assured in the same language that he should not die. He was taken before the Tuscaroras chief with his companions and ransomed. Their deliverers took them to their own village where they were hospitably entertained. For four months Mr. Jones remained among them, conversing with and preaching to them in the Welsh language. The conclusion is that these Indians were descendants of the Welsh colonists under Madoc. Rev. Charles Beatty, a missionary traveling in the Southwest in 1776, met with people who had seen and conversed with these Welsh Indians. A Mr. Benjamin Slutton informed him that he had visited an Indian town west of the Mississippi, where people were not so tawny as other natives and whose language was the Welsh; these people also had a book which they cherished with great care, which Mr. Slutton stated was a Welsh Bible, probably in manuscript. A Mr. Levi Hicks, who had been among the Indians from a youth, told Mr. Beatty that he had visited such a town west of the Great River, where the language spoken was Welsh, and Mr. Beatty's interpreter, Joseph, had been with the natives of the same tribe, whom he was sure spoke the Welsh language, as he understood it partially himself.

In 1785 appeared a narrative that Capt. Isaac Stewart had been taken prisoner by the Indians with a Welshman named David, and they were carried several hundred miles up the Red River where they came to "a nation of Indians remarkably white, and whose hair was mostly of a reddish color." The Welshman found that these people could converse in Welsh. Their story or tradition was that their forefathers came from across the seas and landed on a coast east of the Mississippi, supposed to be Florida. These Indians possessed some rolls of parchment covered with writing in blue ink, which they kept wrapped up in skins with great care.

In a book entitled "An Inquiry Concerning the First Discovery of America by the Europeans," by Williams, it is stated that a Welshman, living on the banks of the Ohio River, in a letter dated October 1, 1778, declared that he had been several times among Indians who spoke the old British or Welsh language, and that a Virginia gentleman with whom he was acquainted, had visited a tribe of Welsh Indians living on the Missouri River, 400 miles above its junction with the Mississippi.

The attention of the reader is called to the fact that the Mandan Indians were in the Missouri Valley at the time mentioned; and further, it should be borne in mind that these Welsh writers make no mention of this name as the tribe which spoke their language; the purpose of the Welsh historians being not to prove what nation these Indians belonged to, but to show that a colony of Welshmen had preceded Columbus to America, and were first discoverers of the new land.)

Further evidence, and the most modern, comes from the famous painter of Indians and Indian scenes, George Catlin, who in the first half of the last century, spent years visiting various tribes. He studied the Mandans particularly, and believed them to be a cross between the Indians and the Welsh, and is inclined to accept the theory that the Mandans are descendants of the Mound Builders, and that the builders of those works were people originating in Madoc's colony. Catlin speaks of the boat used by the Mandans in being like the coracle of the Welsh, and in complexion, in the color of their hair and eyes, they seem to be allied with the whites. Albert Gallatin, secretary of war under Jefferson, states that a chief of the Mandan tribe whom he met at Washington, was of a lighter shade of complexion than other red men, and that he was the only full-blooded Indian he had ever met with blue eyes.

Among the Zuns of New Mexico there are Indians of fair complexion, blue eyes and light hair. Among the New Mexicans is a tradition that long ago some Welsh miners wandered into that country with their wives and children, and that the Zuns killed the men and married the women.

Historians properly make a broad distinction between a tradition and an invention. The latter has no basis of truth whatever, while traditions as a rule have a substantial basis of truth, though often embellished by fancy or distorted and amplified in their repetition from generation to generation.

The theory that has gained some credence in more modern times, that this was not the decaying ruins of an old fort, but due to the natural causes produced by the river in periods of high water, is much more difficult to explain and believe, than the testimony of Captains Lewis and Clark, who were qualified by education and experience to form a sound judgment in a matter of this character. The natural action of the river would not build stone walls six feet high, with stone transported overland for some distance; nor does it lay the foundations for large fortifications with the skill and precision that was required in laying out this abandoned fortress. It is much more irrational, and difficult, to believe that this ruined fort was the result of natural causes, and so skilfully built as to decay, not only Lewis and Clark, experienced and educated military men, but the crew composed of men of ripe experience in the army, who accompanied them, than it is to accept the well grounded opinion of the explorers who came upon the ruins before they had been disturbed by the white pioneers of a half century later, whose opinion, formed after painstaking examination and measurement, pronounced them the ruins of an abandoned extensive fortress that had been constructed by a people who possessed considerable knowledge of the architecture of defensive works and who had built the fortress with the view of protection against powerful foes.

The testimony of the earliest settlers of Bon Homme, while lacking any evidence that they had made a careful examination of the ruins, but had frequently visited and inspected them, was in a general way corroborative of the theory or conclusions of Lewis and Clark.

The journal continues:

The next morning, passed at sunrise three large sandbars and at the distance of ten miles reached a small creek about twelve yards wide coming in from the north above a white bluff; this creek has obtained the name of Plum Creek (Snatch Creek) from the number of that fruit which are in the neighborhood and of delightful quality. Five miles farther we encamped on the south near the edge of a plain; the river is wide and covered with sandbars today. The banks are high and of a whitish color; the timber scarce, but an abundance of grapes. Beavers' houses, too, have been observed in great numbers on the river, but none of that animal themselves.

September 4th, at one mile and a half, we reached a small creek called White Lime Creek, on the south side. Just above this is a cliff covered with cedar trees, and at three miles a creek called White Paint Creek of about thirty yards wide; on the same side and at $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles from White Paint Creek, is the Rapid River, or as it is called by the French, La Riviere Qui Court (Niobrara). This river empties into the Missouri in a course S. W. by W., and is 152 yards wide and 4 feet deep at the confluence. It rises in the Black Mountains and passes through a hilly country with a poor soil. Captain Clark ascended three miles to a beautiful plain on the upper side where the Pawnees once had a village; he found that the river widened above its mouth, and was much divided by sands and islands, which, joined to the rapidity of its current, makes the navigation difficult even for small boats. We camped just above it on the south, having made only eight miles. We saw some deer, a number of geese, and shot a turkey and a duck. The place in which we halted is a fine low ground, with much timber, such as red cedar, honey-locust, oak, arrowwood, elm and coffeenut.

On Wednesday, the 5th, at five miles, we came to Pawnee Island in the middle of the river, and stopped to breakfast at a small creek on the north which has the name of Goat Creek (Choteau Creek) at 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Near the mouth of the creek the beaver had made a dam across so as to form a large pond, in which they built their houses. Above this island the River Poncara (Ponca Creek) falls into the Missouri from the south, and is thirty yards wide at its entrance. Two men whom we had dispatched to the village of the same name returned with the information that they had found it on the lower side of the creek, but as this is the hunting season the town was so completely deserted that they had killed a buffalo in the village itself. This tribe of Poncaras (Poncas), who are said to have once numbered 400 men, are now reduced to about fifty, and have associated for mutual protection with the Mahas (Omahas), who are 200 in number.

These two nations are allied by a similarity of misfortunes; their common enemies, the Sioux and the smallpox, drove them from their towns, which they only visit for purposes of trade. At $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the creek we came to a large island on the south, along which we passed and encamped on the head of it at 4 o'clock. Here we replaced our mast, some bucks and elk were procured today and a black-tailed deer seen near the Poncaras' village.

High wind and rapid current obliged us to use the towline the next day. We made but 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles and encamped on the north after passing high cliffs of soft blue and red-colored stone on the south. We saw some goats and great numbers of buffalo, and the hunters furnished us elk, deer, turkeys, geese, a beaver, and a large catfish was caught. The next day at 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles we reached and encamped at the foot of a round mountain on the south having passed two small islands. This mountain, which is about three hundred feet at the base, forms a cone at the top, resembling a dome at a distance, and seventy feet or more above the high rising highlands. As we descended from this dome we arrived at a spot, on the north side of the hill, nearly four acres in extent and covered with small holes. These are the residence of a little animal called by the French petit chien (little dog), who sit erect on the ground and make a whistling noise, but when alarmed take refuge in their holes. When we were about to bring them out we poured into one of the holes five barrels of water without effect, but we dashed and caught the owner. After digging down another of the holes for six feet, we found, on running a pole into it, that we had not yet dug half way to the bottom, we discovered, however, two rings in the hole, and near it we killed a dark rattlesnake, which had swallowed a small prairie dog; we were also informed, though we never witnessed the fact, that a sort of lizard and a snake live habitually with these animals. The petit chien are justly named, as they resemble a small dog in some particulars, though they have also some points of similarity to the squirrel. The head resembles the squirrel in every respect, except that the ears are shorter, the tail like that of a ground squirrel, the toe-nails are black, the fur is fine and the long hair is gray. [This prairie dog town is a little above Fort Randall, on the opposite side of the river.]

On Sunday, the 9th, at seven miles, we reached a house on the north side, called the Prairie House, where a trader named Trudeau wintered in the year 1796-97; behind this, half a mile higher than usual, appear to the north about eight miles off. (Bijou Hills.) We came by three small islands before reaching this house, and a small creek on the south, and after having reached another at the end of seventeen miles, on which we camped and called it Boat Island. We here saw herds of buffalo, some elk, deer, turkeys, beaver, a squirrel and prairie dogs. We passed two small creeks on Sunday coming in from the north (Pratt Stone). Saw large herds of buffalo on the south, some of them numbering as many as 500. Encamped on the south at 14¼ miles.

On the 10th, at 10½ miles, we reached Cedar Island, two miles long and covered with red cedar. Just below this island on a hill to the south is the backbone of a fish, forty-five feet long, tapering toward the tail, in a perfect state of petrification, fragments of which were collected and sent to Washington. On both sides of the river are high, dark colored bluffs. About a mile and a half from the island on the southern shore we discovered a large and strong impregnated spring of water; and another not so large half way up the hill. Camped on Mud Island, elk and buffalo abundant.

The next day we passed a prairie dog village and a number of islands and camped on the south side at the distance of sixteen miles. In the morning we observed a man riding on horseback down towards the boat, and were much pleased to find it was George Shannon, who left us on the 20th of August to search for the horses which had strayed. After he had found them he attempted to rejoin us, but seeing some other tracks, which must have been of Indians, he mistook them for our own and concluded we were ahead, and had been for sixteen days following the bank of the river above us. During the first four days he exhausted his bullets and was then nearly starved, being obliged to subsist for twelve days on grapes and a rabbit which he killed by making use of a hard piece of stick for a ball. One of his horses gave out and was left behind, the other he kept as a last resource for food. Despairing of overtaking us he was venturing down the river in hopes of meeting some other boat and was on the point of killing his horse when he was so fortunate as to join us. All the following day, the 12th, the water was rapid and shallow and sandbars so numerous that the men were in the water much of the time. Encamped after traveling four miles. High, dark bluffs on the south containing a mixture of slate and coal. Sandbars were very numerous on Thursday; we made twelve miles. Hills on east side are high, separated from the river by a narrow plain. Great quantities of ripe grapes on the north and plenty unripe plums. We encamped on the north, opposite a small willow island; and the next day at two miles we reached a round island on the northern side; at 7½ miles a small creek, and at nine miles encamped near the mouth of a creek on the south. Sandbars numerous. Searched all day for an ancient volcano which we heard at St. Charles was somewhere in this neighborhood, but found nothing even remotely resembling it.

On Saturday, September 15th, we passed the creek near our last night's encampment (Heart Creek) and at two miles reached the mouth of White River coming from the south. We sent a scout and one man to examine it above its mouth. It has a bed of about three hundred yards in the mouth is a sand island and several sandbars. It differs from the Heart and Quicourt in throwing out comparatively little sand. The sergeant went up about twelve miles and found the general course west, the timber elm; they saw pine burrs and some fir and spruce down stream. Met buffalo, wolves, elk deer and barking squirrels. At the mouth of White with the Missouri is in excellent position for a town, the land rising in three gradual ascents, and the neighborhood furnishing more timber than is usual in this country. After passing high dark bluffs on both sides we reached the lower point at a distance of about the south at a distance of six miles. The island bears an abundance of grass and is covered with red cedar. (American Island at Chamberlain.) Encamped at eight miles on the north, opposite a large creek on the south, and early the following morning having reached a convenient spot on the south side at 1¼ miles distant, we encamped near a small creek which we called Cervus. Finding that we could not proceed on the sandbars as fast as we desired while the boat was so heavily loaded, we concluded to wait until we could find an anchor, we intended, our third periogue, but to detain the soldiers until spring, and in the meantime lighten the boat by loading the periogue, which detained us all day. The cold season coming on, a flannel shirt was given to each man and fresh powder.

The following day we remained in camp. Some of the party were employed in examining the surrounding country. A quarter of a mile behind our camp a plain twenty feet high extends for three miles parallel to the river. About a mile back of this plain we found another rise, cut by ravines, in which we found an abundance of plums, finely flavored. Antelope and buffalo are numerous. We do not exaggerate in saying that we saw 3,000 of the latter at a single glance. Made seven miles on the 18th, passed an island a mile in length covered with cedar. Encamped on the south at seven miles. Game abundant.

September 19th we reached at three miles a bluff on the south and at four miles farther the lower point of Prospect Island, about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length; opposite are high bluffs eighty feet above the water; beyond are beautiful plains rising as they recede from the river, and watered by three streams that empty near each other, and are called by the French Les Trois Riviere des Sioux, the Three Sioux Rivers, and as the Sioux generally cross the Missouri at this place, it is called the Sioux Pass of the Three Rivers. These streams have the same right of asylum as Pipestone Creek already mentioned. Two miles further we passed a creek fifteen yards wide; eight miles another twenty yards; three miles beyond a third eighteen yards wide, all on the south. The second we called Elm Creek and the third Night Creek, having reached it late at night. About a mile beyond this we reached a small island on the north side called Lower Island, as it is situated at the commencement of what is known by the name of Grand Detour or Great Bend of the Missouri. Opposite on the south is Prickly Pear Creek. We encamped on the south opposite the upper end of the island, having an excellent day's sailing of $26\frac{1}{4}$ miles. Large herds of buffalo, elk and goats were seen today.

On Thursday, September 20th, finding we had reached the Big Bend, we dispatched two men with our only horse across the neck to hunt there and wait our arrival at the first creek beyond. We then set out to make the circuit on the bend.

At $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles is a sand island; about ten miles beyond a small island with a creek on the north. This is called Solitary Island, being at the extremity of the bend. Eleven miles farther we encamped on a sandbar, having made $27\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Great numbers of buffalo, elk and goats are wandering over these plains. The goats have no beard, are delicately formed and very beautiful. The next morning, between 1 and 2 o'clock, the sergeant on guard alarmed us by crying that the sandbar on which we lay was sinking. We jumped up and found that above and below our camp the sand was undermined and falling in very fast. We had scarcely got into the boats and pushed off when the bank under which they had been lying caved in and would certainly have sunk the two periogues had they remained there. By the time we had reached the opposite shore the ground of our encampment sunk also.

We formed a second camp and at daylight proceeded on to the gorge or throat of the Great Bend and breakfasted. A man whom we had dispatched to step off the distance across the bend found it 200 yards; the distance around is thirty miles. After breakfast we passed through a high prairie on the north and rich cedar lowland and bluff on the south till we reached a willow island below the mouth of a small creek. This creek is called Tyler's River, comes in from the south, and is six miles from the Great Bend. At $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles we encamped on the north at the lower point of an ancient island that is now covered with cottonwood. We here saw some tracks of Indians, but three or four weeks old. This day was warm. The next day our course was through inclined prairies crowded with buffalo. We halted near a high bluff on the south and took a meridian altitude which gave us the latitude of $44^{\circ} 11' 33''$. We then reached a small island on the south at $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; immediately above is another island opposite a small creek fifteen yards wide. The creek and two islands are called the Three Sisters. Next is an island on the north called Cedar Island, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles long and the same distance broad, and derives its name from its timber. On the south side of Cedar Island is a fort built by a Mr. Loisel, who wintered here last year to trade with the Sioux, the remains of whose camps are in great numbers about this place. At sixteen miles we came to on the north at the mouth of a small creek. Large stones made navigation dangerous, and the mosquitoes are numerous. We passed Goat Island, the twenty third, above which is Smoke Creek, as we observed a great smoke to the southwest in approaching it. At ten miles we passed what we called Elk Island, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles long and $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile covered with cottonwood, red currant and grapes. A small creek on the north we called Reuben's Creek, as Reuben Fields, one of our men, was the first who reached it. Above this we encamped for the night at twenty miles distance. In the evening three Sioux boys swam across the river and informed us that two parties of Sioux were encamped on the next river, one consisting of eighty and the other sixty lodges, some distance above. After treating them kindly we sent them back with two carrots of tobacco to their chiefs, whom we invited to a conference in the morning.

On Monday, September 24th, we passed Highwater Creek a little above our encampment. At five miles we reached an island $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles long. Here we were joined by one of our hunters, who, while in pursuit of game, the Indians had stolen his horse, our only one. We soon overtook five Indians on shore. We anchored and told them we were friends and wished to continue so, but were not afraid of any Indians. That some of their young men had stolen the horse which the Great Father had sent for a present to their great chief and that we could not treat with them until it was restored. They said they knew nothing about the horse had been taken it should be given up. At 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles we passed what we called Mam-red Island, about 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, abounding in elk. At 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles we arrived at the mouth of a river in the south and encamped, being joined by the Indians. Two-thirds of the party remained on board, the rest took one pirogue and went to the creek. The five Indians followed us and stayed with the shore guard. One of them, a chief we smoked with him and gave him a present of tobacco. As the tribe of Indians which inhabit this river are called Teton we gave it the name of Teton River (Red River).

September 25th was a fine morning. We raised a flag staff and an awning, under which we assembled at 12 o'clock with all the party parading under arms. The chiefs and warriors from their camp two miles above met us, about fifty or sixty in number, and after smoking we delivered them a speech, but as our Sioux interpreter, Mr. Durion, had been left with the Yanktons, we were obliged to make use of a Frenchman as an interpreter, who could not speak fluently, and we, therefore, curtailed our harangue. We then acknowledged the chiefs by giving to the grand chief a medal, a flag of the United States, a laced uniform coat, a cocked hat and feather, to two other chiefs, a medal and some small presents, and to two warriors of consideration, certificates. The name of the great chief is Untorgasatan, or Black Buffalo, the second, Fortahonga, the Partisan; the third, Fartongawaka, or Buffalo Medicine, the name of his warriors, Wanginggo, the other Matocoequepa or Second Bear. We then took them on board, showed them the boat, the air gun and other curiosities, in which we succeeded too well, for after giving them a quarter of a glass of whiskey, which they seemed to like very much and sucked the bottle, it was with much difficulty we could get rid of them. They at last accompanied Captain Clark on shore in a pirogue with five men; but it seems they had formed a design to stop us, for no sooner had the party landed than three of the Indians seized the cable of the pirogue and one of the soldiers of the chief put his arms around the mast; the second chief, who feigned intoxication, then said we should not go on, that they had not received presents enough. Captain Clark told him we would not be prevented from going on; that we were not squaws but warriors; that we were sent by our Great Father who could in a moment exterminate them.

The chief replied that he, too, had warriors, and was proceeding to offer personal violence to Captain Clark, who immediately drew his sword and made a signal to the boat to prepare for action. The Indians, who surrounded him, drew the arrows from their quivers and bent their bows when the swivel in the boat was pointed towards them, and twelve of our most determined men jumped into the pirogue and joined Captain Clark. This movement made an impression on them, for the grand chief ordered the young men away from the pirogue and they withdrew and held a short council with the warriors. Being unwilling to irritate them, Captain Clark then went forward and offered his hand to the first and second chiefs, who refused to take it. He then turned from them and got into the pirogue, but had not gone more than ten paces when both chiefs and two of the warriors waded in after him and he brought them on board. We then went on for a mile and anchored off a willow island, which, from the circumstances just related, we call Badhumored Island, where we spent the night. Our conduct seemed to have inspired the Indians with fear of us and as we were desirous of cultivating their acquaintance we complied with their wish that we should give them an opportunity of treating us well, and also suffer their squaws and children to see us and our boat, which would be perfectly new to them. Accordingly, after a run of eleven miles, we came to on the south side, where a crowd of men, women and children were waiting to receive us. Captain Lewis went on shore and remained several hours, and observed that their disposition was friendly we resolved to remain during the night where they were preparing for us. Captains Lewis and Clark, who went on shore after the other, were met on landing by ten well dressed young men, who took them to a house built of earth and carried them to a large council house, where they were placed on a dressed buffalo skin by the side of the grand chief. The hall or council room was built in the form of a circle, covered at the top and sides with dressed buffalo skins and raised ten feet. Under this shelter sat about seventy men forming a circle, and in the center where men were placed a Spanish flag and the one we had brought with us. In the center of the hall a great circle of about six feet in diameter in which the men were seated on the ground, and in the center about four hundred pounds of excellent buffalo meat was placed. An old man got up, and after approving what we had done, delivered a speech to the assembly. To this we replied with assurance of friendship and good will, and delivered a harangue to the same effect. The old man then took some of the most delicate parts of the dog which we had brought with us, and held it to the fire, and when it was roasted, he held it up to the heavens, then to the four quarters of the globe, and then to the people, held the pipe and presented it to us. We then smoked the pipe of peace. It consisted of the dog which they had brought with them, and which we had named the Sioux and used on all festivals. To this were added some of the most delicate of buffalo meat dried or smoked and then pounded and mixed with the fat of the dog, which we found good, but we could as well eat fat as we could eat the dog. We ate and smoked for an hour when it became dark; everything was then cleared away for the dance, a large fire being made in the center of the house, giving light and warmth to the ballroom. The orchestra was composed of about ten men who played upon a sort of tambourine formed of skin stretched across a hoop and made a jungling noise with a long stick to which the hoofs of deer and goats were hung; the third instrument was a small skin bag with pebbles in it; these, with five or six young men for the vocal part, made up the band. The women then came forward highly decorated, some with poles in their hands in which were hung the scalps of their enemies; others with guns, spears or different trophies taken in war by their husband, brothers or connections.

Having arranged themselves in two columns, one on each side of the fire, as soon as the music began they danced toward each other till they met in the center, where the rattles were shaken and they all shouted and returned back to their places. They have no step, but shuffle along the ground; nor does the music appear to be anything more than a confusion of noises, distinguished only by hard or gentle blows on the buffalo skins. The song is perfectly extemporaneous. In the pauses of the dance any man of the company comes forward and recites, in a sort of a low, guttural tone, some story or incident, which is either martial or ludicrous, or, as was the case this evening, voluptuous and indecent. This is taken up by the orchestra and dancers in a higher strain, who dance to it. The dances of the men are conducted very nearly the same way and are always separate from the dances of the women. The harmony of this entertainment had nearly been disturbed by one of the musicians, who, thinking he had not received a due share of the tobacco we had distributed, put himself in a passion, broke one of the drums, threw two of them into the fire and left the band. They were taken out of the fire, and a buffalo robe held in one hand and beaten with the other by several of the company supplied the place of the lost tambourine, and no notice was taken of the offensive conduct of the man. We stayed until 12 o'clock at night, then told the chiefs they would be fatigued with their efforts to amuse us and retired accompanied by four chiefs, two of whom spent the night with us aboard.

This tribe is a part of the great Sioux nation called Teton Kandandas and number about two hundred men. They inhabit both sides of the Missouri between the Teton (Bad) River and the Cheyenne. Their persons are ugly, ill made, their legs and arms being too small, cheek bone high, eyes projecting. The females, with the same character of form, are more handsome, and both sexes appear cheerful and sprightly, but we found them cunning and vicious. The men shave the hair off their heads, except a small tuft on the top which they suffer to grow and wear in plaits over their shoulder; to this they are much attached, as the loss of it is the usual sacrifice at the death of near relations.

In full dress the men wear a hawk's feather or calumet feather worked with porcupine quills and fastened to the top of the head. The face and body are generally painted with a mixture of grease and coal. Over the shoulders is a loose robe of buffalo skins dressed white, adorned with porcupine quills loosely fixed so as to make a jungling noise when in motion and painted in uncouth figures not intelligible to us but to them emblematical of military exploits or any other incident. The hair of the robe is worn next the skin in fair weather, but when it rains the hair is put outside. Under this in winter they wear a kind of shirt resembling ours made of skin or cloth and covering the arms and body. Round the middle is fixed a girdle of cloth or procured dressed elk skin about an inch in width and closely tied to the body. To this is attached a piece of cloth, a blanket or skin, about a foot wide which passes between the legs and is tucked under the girdle both before and behind. From the hip to the ankle he is covered with leggings of dressed antelope skins with seams at the sides two inches in width and ornamented by little tufts of hair, the produce of the scalps they have made in war, which are scattered down the legs. The winter moccasins are of dressed buffalo skin, the hair being worn inwards and soled with thick elk parchment. Summer moccasins are of elk skin without the hair. On great occasions the young men drag after them the entire skin of a pole cat fixed to the heel of the moccasins. Another skin of the same animal is tucked in the girdle and serves as a pouch for their tobacco or what the French traders call the bois roule (killikanick); this is the inner bark of a species of red willow which, being dried in the sun or over the fire, is rubbed between the hands and broken into small pieces, and is used alone or mixed with tobacco. The pipe is of red earth, the stem made of ash, about three feet long, and decorated with feathers, hair and porcupine quills. The hair of the women is suffered to grow long and is parted from the forehead across the head, at the back of which it is either collected into a kind of braid or hangs down over the shoulders. Their moccasins and leggings are like those of the men except the latter reach only to the knee, where it is met by a long, loose shift of skin which reaches to the ankles and is fastened over the shoulders by a string, and has no sleeves, but a few pieces of the skin hang a short distance down the arm. The women are fond of dress. Their lodges are in the same form as those of the Yanktons. They consist of about an hundred cabins made of white buffalo hide dressed, with a large area in the center for holding council and dances. They are built round with poles about fifteen or twenty feet high covered with white skins. These lodges may be taken to pieces, packed up and carried with the nation from place to place by dogs, who bear great burdens.

The women are chiefly employed in dressing buffalo skins; they seem perfectly well disposed, but are addicted to stealing anything which they can take without being detected. While on shore we witnessed a quarrel between two squaws which appeared to be a more boisterous when a man came forward, at whose appearance everyone seemed terrified the squaws and without any ceremony whipped them severely. On inquiry into the nature of such summary justice we learned that this man was an officer well known to all the Indians and that his duty is to keep the peace and the whole interior of the village is committed to two or three of these officers, who are named by the chief and remain in power some days, at least until the chief appoints a successor. They seem to be a sort of constable or sentinel, and they are always on the watch to keep tranquility during the day and guarding the camp at night. The short duration of their office is compensated by its authority; his power is supreme and in the suppression of any riot or disturbance no resistance to him is suffered; his person is sacred, and if in the execution of his duty he strikes a chief of the second class he cannot be punished. In general, they accompany the person of the chief, and when ordered to do any duty, however dangerous, it is a point of honor rather to die than to refuse obedience.

When we attempted to stop us yesterday the chief ordered one of these men to take possession of the boat; he immediately put his arms around the mast and no force except the command of his chief could induce him to release his hold.

On Thursday morning we rose early. The two chiefs took off, as a matter of course, and according to their custom, the blanket on which they slept. Captain Lewis went on shore to see a part of the nation that was expected but did not come. He returned with four chiefs, who remained half an hour and left with reluctance, Captain Clark accompanying them to the lodge of the grand chief, where a dance was given. He returned to the boat at 12 o'clock, taking the second chief and leading a warrior aboard. As we came near the boat the man who steered the pirogue brought her broadside against the boat's cable and broke it. We called up all hands to the oars, but our voice alarmed the two Indians; they called out to their companions, who immediately crowded to the shore, but soon returned leaving sixty men near us. The alarm given by the chiefs was said to be that the Mahas had attacked us and they were desirous of assisting us to repel it; but we suspected that they were afraid we meant to set sail and they intended to prevent us from doing so, for in the night the Maha prisoner had told one of our men that we were to be stopped. We, therefore, without giving any intimation of our suspicion, prepared everything for an attack. We were not mistaken in these opinions, for the next morning, September 28th, after failing to find our anchor, it was with great difficulty that we could make the chiefs leave the boat. At length we got rid of all except the great chief, when, just as we were setting out, several of the great chief's soldiers sat on the rope which held the boat to the shore. Irritated at this we got everything ready to fire on them if they persisted, but the great chief said that these were his soldiers and only wanted some tobacco. We threw him a carrot of tobacco and said to him, "You have told us you were a great man and have influence, now show your influence by taking the rope from these men, and we will then go without any further trouble."

This had the desired effect, as it appealed to his pride; he went out and gave the soldiers the tobacco, and, pulling the rope from their hands, delivered it on board, and we then sailed. A short distance up stream we observed the third chief beckoning to us; we stopped, took him aboard and he told us the rope was held by order of the second chief, who was a double faced man. On his return to the nation we sent a speech to the great chief, telling him to make peace with his enemies, and if he persisted in attempting to stop us we were able to defend ourselves. We encamped on a sandbar at six miles above our starting point and early on the 29th set out with fair weather. The Indians followed us and the second chief asked us to take two women to the next station above, which we refused, but gave him a present of tobacco. They followed us along the shore. At 7½ miles we passed a small creek on the south which we called Notimber Creek on account of its bare appearance. We made eleven miles and encamped on the lower part of a willow island, using large stones for an anchor. The next morning the wind was strong and it rained. The country on the north was low prairie covered with timber; on the south, first high, barren hills, then similar to the prairie on the north. We had not gone far when an Indian ran after us and begged to be taken aboard and carried as far as the Ricaras, which we refused. Soon after we anchored on the hills at a distance great numbers of Indians, who came to the river and encamped ahead of us. We anchored a hundred yards from the shore, and, discovering they were Tetons belonging to the band we had just left, we took them by the hand and gave them a present of tobacco; that we had been badly treated by some of the Ricaras and they had waited for them two days below we could not stop here, but referred them to Mr. Durion for our talk and an explanation of our views. They apologized for what had passed, assured us they were friendly and asked us to eat with them, which we refused, but sent the prisoner ashore with the tobacco, which was delivered to one of the chiefs of the band whom we had aboard.

The next morning we started later at the narrow escape of the boat from upsetting and when we landed we found we had lost our gun and went ashore, telling us we would be paid for it. We gave him a blanket, knife and some tobacco and he disappeared. We found a sandbar near the north, having come 20½ miles.

October 1st was cold and windy. At three miles we passed a large island in the middle of the river and two miles beyond a river coming from the southwest about four hundred yards wide, but discharging very little water. It takes its rise in the second range of the Cote Noire, or Black Mountains. It is occasionally called Dog River under a mistaken opinion that its French name was Chien, but its true appellation is Cheyenne and it derives this title from the Cheyenne Indians who lived on the Cheyenne, a branch of the Red River of Lake Winnipeg. The invasion of the Sioux drove them westward; in their progress they halted on the southern side of the Missouri, below the Warrecome, where their ancient fortifications still exist; the same impulses drove them to the heads of the Cheyenne where they now rove, and occasionally visit the Ricaras. They number 300 men. This part of the river has but little timber, the lands are rich. As we proceeded we passed two creeks on the south which are named Sentinel Creek and Lookout Creek. At a distance of sixteen miles we camped on a sandbar. On the opposite shore we saw a house among the willows and a boy to whom we called and brought him on board. He was a young Frenchman in the employ of Mr. Valle, a trader, who was here pursuing his commerce with the Sioux. October 2d Mr. Valle visited us in the morning and sailed with us for two miles. He is one of three French traders who are awaiting the Sioux, who are coming down from the Ricaras to trade. Mr. Valle passed the last winter 300 leagues up the Cheyenne under the Black Mountains. That river he represented as very rapid, liable to sudden swells, the bed and shores formed of coarse gravel and difficult of ascent even by canvas. One hundred leagues from its mouth it divides into two branches, one coming from the north and the other at forty leagues from its junction enters the Black Mountains.

The Cheyennes reside chiefly on the head of the river and steal horses from the Spanish settlements, a plundering excursion which they performed in a month's time. The Black Mountains, Valle represents as very high, covered with great quantities of pine and in some parts the snow remains during the summer. Its animals are goats, white bear, prairie cocks, and a species of animal resembling a small elk with large circular horns. We took a meridian altitude a short distance from Lookout Bend and found the latitude to be $44^{\circ} 19' 36''$. This bend is twenty miles around and two miles across. In the afternoon we heard a shot fired and observed some Indians on a hill. One of them came to the shore and wished us to land, as there were twenty lodges of Yanktons, or Boisbrules, there. We declined, referring them to Mr. Durion. We passed a long island on the north and encamped on a sandbar in the middle of the river, having made twelve miles. We were not able to hunt today. There are so many Indians in the neighborhood we were in constant expectation of being attacked and therefore forced to keep the party together. October 3d, at noon, we landed on a bar to examine our boats and found the mice had been eating the bags of corn and spoiled some of our clothes. At eight miles we encamped on a sandbar and at daylight the next morning started to retrace our sailing three miles, having got into the wrong side of the river, where there was no practicable outlet. The Indians were seen in small numbers. They wanted us to land and seemed willing, had they been more numerous, to molest us. One of them gave three yells and fired a ball ahead of the boat. We took no notice of it and landed for breakfast on the south. An Indian swam across and begged for powder. We gave him only tobacco. We made twelve miles and camped on a bar. A white frost fell and the next

October 6th, the weather was very cold. Passed a large creek from the south, which we named Otter Creek, from seeing several white brants among flocks of colored ones. Camped at a point at a distance of twenty miles. Our game was a deer, prairie wolf and some other. The 6th was a cold morning. At eight miles we came to a willow island on the north, opposite a point of timber, where there were many large stones near the middle of the river which seemed to have been washed from the hills and high plains on both sides or thrown from a distance down the stream. At twelve miles we halted for dinner at a village which we supposed to have belonged to the Ricaras. It is situated in a low plain on the river and consists of eighty lodges in an octagonal form, neatly covered with earth, placed as closely together as possible and picketed round. The skin canoes, mats, buckets and articles of furniture found in the lodges induce us to suppose it had been left in the spring. We found three varieties of squashes growing in the village and killed an elk and saw two wolves. At 14 miles we topped for the night at Otter Creek on the north. Geese, ducks, etc., are abundant.

Sunday, October 7, 1804, was cold and rainy. At two miles we came to the mouth of a river called Sawawana or Park River (Moreau). Its sources are in the first range of the Black Mountains. Shortly after we saw two Teton Indians, who asked us for something to eat, which we gave them. They were going to visit the Ricaras. At eighteen miles we passed Growse Island, where there is an old village. We camped at twenty-two miles. Saw tracks of white and red deer near the River. Next day, the 8th, we halted on the south and took the middle of the river, which is 48° 30' S" north latitude. Here we came to a river on the south called the Ricaras Weetsee pas (Grand River). It rises in the Black Mountains and is 120 yards wide. Two miles above is a small river called Maropa. A mile from the Maropa a number of Ricara Indians came out to see us. We took a Frenchman on board, who accompanied us to camp on the north after sailing twelve miles. Captain Lewis with four of the party visited the Ricara village, which was situated near the center of an island near the southern shore, and contained fifty lodges. The island is three miles long and covered with fields in which the Indians raise corn, beans and potatoes. Several Frenchmen are living with them and particularly a Mr. Gravelines, who had acquired their language, and who returned with Captain Lewis to the boats. On the 9th the wind was so high and cold we could not assemble the Indians in council. We received visits from some of the chiefs and gave them presents. Their names were Kakawissana, or Lighting Crow; Pocasse, or Hay; Pishato, Eagle's Feather. Notwithstanding the high waves two or three squaws rowed to us in little canoes made of a single buffalo skin stretched over a frame of boughs interwoven like a basket. The object which appeared to astonish the Indians was Captain Clark's negro servant, York, a remarkably stout, strong negro. They had never seen a being of that color and therefore flocked around him to examine the extraordinary monster. He told them, by way of amusement, he had once been a wild animal, and caught and trained by his master. He showed them feats of strength that made him more terrible than we wished. The 10th of October was a fine day, and after breakfast we dispatched Mr. Gravelines and Mr. Tabeau, two French traders, to invite the chiefs of the Ricaras to a conference. They assembled at 1 o'clock and after the usual ceremonies we addressed them as we had the Sioux, after which we made them the customary presents. The Ricaras would accept no whiskey nor tobacco, the example of the traders who bring it to them having disgusted them. One of the chiefs remarked that he was surprised their father would present them a liquor which would make them fools. The council being over the chiefs retired to consult on their answer, and the next morning, the 11th, we again met in council at our camp. The grand chief made a short speech of thanks for the advice we had given and promised to follow it, adding that the door was now open and no one dared to shut it, and that we might depart whenever we pleased, alluding to the treatment we had received from the Sioux. They brought us corn, beans and dried squashes, and we gave them a steel mill which pleased them very much. We spent the day with these Indians and the following day counceled with the chief and warriors of the second village, who requested us to take one of their chiefs up to the Mandans and negotiate a peace between the two nations. We then repaired to the third village, where similar ceremonies were had. We explained the magnitude and power of the United States and three chiefs accompanied us aboard the boat, to whom we gave presents of kettles and iron glass. Two of them then left us and the third, Ahketahnasha, accompanied us to the Mandans. We then left these Indians, who were to take leave of us, and after 7½ miles landed on the north side and camped. These Ricaras were originally colonies of the Pawnees and lived below the Mandans but had been depressed by the Sioux until they emigrated to the Mandans in 1797, but a new war ensued between them and the Mandans, and they came down the river to their present location. (Very near the boundary line between North and South Dakota.) These Indians eat corn, beans, pumpkins, watermelons, squashes and a species of tobacco called tobacco. Their commerce is chiefly with the traders, who supply them with articles of clothing, the others which they procure not from their own hunting but in exchange for more than their less civilized neighbors. They express a disposition to keep their arms and all things, but they are well armed with fuses and being much under the influence of the Sioux who enhanced the goods they got from the British for Ricaras and Mandans, they sometimes poisoned and they cannot be depended upon. Mr. Gravelines told us that the Mandan or Jacques River rises about forty miles northeast of this place. The party left us in the morning of the 13th except the chief, his brother and one squaw. We made eighteen miles and encamped on the north near a timbered lone plain. On Sunday, the 14th, we set out in a rain. At five miles we came to a crest on the south which we named Piahato, or Eagle's Feather, in honor of the third chief of the Ricaras. After dinner we stopped on a sandbar and executed the sentence of a court-martial which inflicted corporal punishment on one of the soldiers. This operation affected the Indian chief very sensibly, for he cried aloud during the punishment. We explained the offense and the reason for it. He acknowledged that examples were necessary, and that he himself had given them by punishing with death, but his nation never whipped even children from their birth.

We encamped in a cove on the south, having made twelve miles. On the 15th met a number of Ricara encampments, halted and exchanged presents at different camps. Made ten miles and encamped near the Indians on the north. The squaws left us at this camp. The next morning at seven miles a river came in from the north named Warreconne, or Elk Shed Their Horns. An island here is called Carp Island by Evans, a former trader. As we proceeded there were great numbers of goats on the banks of the river; and we soon after saw large flocks of them in the water; they had gradually been driven into the river by the Indians, who now lined the shore to prevent their escape and were now firing on them, while sometimes boys went into the river and killed them with sticks. We counted fifty-eight which they had killed. We also killed some, then passing the Indians encamped at 14½ miles on the south. The Indians flocked into our camp, made a feast, and we had music and merriment until quite late. On the 17th the wind was strong; we made six miles and stopped to hunt goats. Mr. Gravelines, explaining the abundance of these animals, says they migrate in the spring to the plains east of the Missouri, returning to their haunts in the Black Mountains in the fall. Our latitude today was 46° 23' 57". The next day after sailing three miles we reached the mouth of Cannon Ball River. Its name is derived from the round large stones in the river and in the bluffs above. Its channel is 140 yards wide and it comes in from the south, rising in the Black Mountains. October 18th we made thirteen miles and encamped on a sandbar. Goats, buffalo and elk are seen in great number.

Friday, the 19th. Fine morning. Set sail with southeast wind. The creeks running into the Missouri are all impregnated with salts. In walking along the shore we counted fifty-two herds of buffalo in a single view. Encamped at 17½ miles on the north, opposite to the uppermost of a number of round hills. The chief says the Calumet bird lives in the holes in these hills. On a point of a hill ninety feet above the plain are the remains of an old village; this, our chief tells us, is the remains of an old Mandan village and are the first ruins we have seen of that nation since ascending the Missouri.

The 20th made twelve miles and encamped on the south near a vein of stone coal of inferior quality. Passed the ruins of another Mandan village covering six or eight acres, and great numbers of buffalo and elk; we also wounded a white bear and saw some fresh tracks of those animals which are twice as large as the track of a man. On the 21st, Sunday, it began to snow at daylight and continued till afternoon. We set out early, and soon passed a large lone oak tree about two miles from the river on the north which the Indians hold in great veneration because it has withstood the prairie fires while all the other trees have been destroyed. The Indians ascribe it to extraordinary powers. One of their ceremonies is to make a hole in the skin of their necks, pass a string through it and fasten one end by a knot, the other end is tied to the body of the tree. After remaining so attached for some time they think they become braver. Another Mandan village was passed the following day early, and at 7 o'clock we came to a camp of eleven Teton Sioux, who are almost perfectly naked, having only a piece of skin or cloth around the middle, while we are suffering with cold. They are a war party, going to or returning from the Mandan country. We passed two Mandan villages today and encamped at twelve miles on the south. Beaver are abundant. There are nine of these deserted Mandan villages in a span of twenty miles on either side of the river. The 23rd made thirteen miles to encamp on the south.

Wednesday, October 24th, at four miles, found one of the grand chiefs of the Mandans with five lodges of his people on an island to the north on a hunting excursion. He met his enemy, the Ricara chief, with great ceremony and smoked with him. The grand chief and his brother came on board our boat for a time. We proceeded and camped on the north at seven miles and below the old village of the Mandans. Here four Mandans came down and our Ricara chief returned with them, from which we augur favorably of their pacific views. The 25th was cold. Passed several deserted villages of both Mandans and Ricaras. The river seemed filled with obstructions. Saw Mandan Indians on the banks but could not land. Encamped after making eleven miles. Our Ricara chief joined us here with our Indian companion. On the 26th we set out early, after putting our Ricara chief ashore to join the Mandans, who are in great numbers along the shore. We went on to the camp of the grand chiefs, four miles distant. Here we met Mr. McCracken, one of the Northwest, or Hudson's Bay Company, who arrived with another person nine days before to trade for horses and buffalo robes. We encamped for the night on the south at eleven miles distance, and within a mile of the Mandan village. A crowd of Mandan men, women and children came to see us, and Captain Lewis returned with the principal chief to the village, the others remained at our camp during the evening. At an early hour Saturday, October 27th we moved and anchored off the village. Captain Clark went ashore and after smoking a pipe with the chiefs declined an invitation to eat with them. His refusal gave great offense to the Indians, who considered it disrespectful not to eat when invited, but it was explained that Captain was ill and they were satisfied. We proceeded four miles and encamped on the banks of the river to a village of the Mandanians. We here met with a Frenchman named J. J. Gass, who lives among the Indians as an interpreter and has a wife and children. Here we camped. Sunday, the 28th, we were joined by many of the Minnatarees and Mandanians from above, but the wind was so violent from the south that the lower chiefs could not come up. Finding that we shall have to pass the winter at this place, we made some expeditions, searching for a favorable location for our quarters, but found nothing suitable owing to the scarcity of timber. The following day we held a grand council with the Indians, where speeches and ceremonies similar to those at the Yankton meeting were gone through with and a large number of chiefs recognized with presents. In the evening a fierce prairie fire occurred. So rapid was it that a man and woman were fatally burned before they could reach a place of safety.

Among the rest a boy of the half white breed escaped unhurt in the midst of the flames; his safety was ascribed to the Great Medicine Spirit who had preserved him on account of his being white. But a much more natural cause was the presence of mind of his mother, who, seeing no hopes of carrying off her son, threw him on the ground and covered him with the fresh hide of a buffalo, escaping herself from the flames. As soon as the fire had passed she returned and found him untouched, the skin having prevented the flames from reaching the grass on which he lay.

The winter encampment of Lewis and Clark was in latitude $47^{\circ} 21' 47''$, longitude 101° , very near to the site of the present Town of Washburn, McLean County, North Dakota, and 1700 miles from the mouth of the Missouri of date November 1, 1804. A suitable site was found below the Mandan village for winter quarters with an abundance of timber, elm and cottonwood. The fort was on the north side of the Missouri. The works consisted of two rows of cabins forming an angle where they joined each other, each containing four rooms, fourteen feet square and seven feet high, with plank ceiling, and the roof slanting so as to form a loft above the rooms, the highest part of which was eighteen feet from the ground. The backs of the huts formed a wall of that height. Back of the angle of the plan of the wall was supplied by picketing. Here the command passed the winter of 1804-5, gathering from the Indians and an occasional white trader visitor much valuable information regarding the country. The weather at times was cold enough to gratify an Esquimaux, but their quarters were very comfortable and the health of the garrison remained good, due in great measure to the abundant exercise afforded in various employments and in hunting. A large herd of buffalo and elk strayed into the shelter of the timber near the post during December, affording the explorers the finest hunt they ever engaged, enabling them to plentifully replenish their fresh meat supply and yielding a rich harvest of buffalo robes and skins. The post was named Fort Mandan, as a testimonial of esteem and friendship for the people who showed the whites the most friendly disposition in many ways during their residence among them. There was one extreme cold period during the winter when a spirit thermometer congealed on short exposure, but the men were not seriously disturbed in their out-door employments and suffered only slightly. Three white fur traders representing the Hudson's Bay Company on the Assiniboine, one of whom was a Mr. Hanley, visited the fort and partook of its hospitality on the 16th of December and learned for the first time from Captain Lewis that the United States had purchased the country. The visitors were much surprised and thought England had been very lax in permitting such a prize to be captured by the infant republic, which was looked upon by foreigners generally as an uncertain quantity and a doubtful experiment in government. Christmas and New Years were celebrated at Fort Mandan with services appropriate and in feasts and dances in which the Indians participated.

The expedition left Fort Mandan on Sunday evening, April 7, 1805, at 5 o'clock. It consisted of thirty-two persons, namely: Capt. Meriwether Lewis, Capt. William Clark, Sergt. John Ordway, Sergt. Nathaniel Pryor, Sergt. Patrick Gass (successor to Charles Floyd, who died before the expedition passed the mouth of the Big Sioux), Privates William Brown, John Colter, John Collins, Peter Cruzatte, Robert Frazier, Reuben Fields, Joseph Fields, George Gibson, Silas Goodrich, Hugh Hall, Thomas P. Howard, Baptiste Lapage, Francis Parkes, Hugh McLean, John Potts, John Shields, George Shannon, John B. Thompson, William Werner, Alexander Willard, Richard Winsor, Joseph Whitehouse, Peter Wiser and George Clark, half-breed, York. The interpreters were George Druillard and Toussaint Chaboneau and Chaboneau's Indian wife, Skagaweah, a Snake Indian woman, who had been sold to the Mandan tribe a year before and sold to Chaboneau. She had an infant child with her and was at first taken back to her own people. This Indian woman, because of her acquaintance with the Snake River Indians, whose language she spoke, and her familiarity with the Mandan manners, proved an invaluable aid to the expedition, which might have reached upon a more difficult but for her prudent and timely counsels and guidance. She did not leave her husband for her own people, but continued on to the end of the long journey on the banks of the Pacific. They were well and kindly cared for by Captains Lewis and Clark during the winter and continued with the expedition in the spring of 1806 to her own people, where she had her husband and other members of the Snake tribe, for one of whom she is said to have secured a good marriage. When she came at last to say the final farewell she was overwhelmed with emotion and said that she would not be deserted, but such was her fate, and nothing further was ever known of the brave and dauntless woman.

We shall not attempt to follow the daily incidents of this party further and will conclude with a brief summary of its experiences. While they had much to interest and enjoy they also encountered serious hardships and faced death on numerous occasions. Above the Yellowstone the grizzly bear was encountered. This was regarded as one of the most dangerous and formidable of all the wild animals, and members of the Lewis and Clark party had a number of hair-breadth escapes from its jaws and claws. On one occasion, when Captain Lewis had been exploring a section of the country alone, he met a herd of buffaloe on his return and being desirous of providing for supper shot at one of them, who immediately began to bleed. Captain Lewis, who had forgotten to reload his rifle, was intently watching to see him fall when he beheld a large brown bear who was stealing on him unperceived, and was already within twenty steps. In the first moment of surprise he lifted his rifle, but, remembering that it was not loaded and that he had not time to reload, he felt that there was no safety but in flight. It was in the open level plain, not a bush nor a tree within 300 yards, the bank of the river sloping and not more than three feet high so that there was no possible mode of concealment. Lewis therefore thought of retreating in a quick walk as fast as the bear advanced toward the nearest tree, but as soon as he turned the bear ran, open mouthed, at full speed upon him. Lewis ran about eighty yards, but finding that the animal gained upon him fast, it flashed into his mind that by getting into the water to such a depth that the bear would be obliged to attack him swimming, that there was still some chance of his life; he, therefore, turned short, plunged into the river waist deep and facing about presented his esponton. The bear arrived at the water's edge within twenty feet of him, but as soon as Lewis had himself in the posture of defense the bear seemed frightened, and, wheeling about, retreated as rapidly as he had pursued. From this adventure, which occurred near Medicine River, June 14th, Lewis made up his mind he would never for a moment suffer his rifle to remain unloaded. These bears were monsters in size and very tenacious of life, sometimes requiring as many as ten balls to bring them down.

The expedition continued its journey, tracing the Missouri River to its source and pushing on through the mountains, meeting with many thrilling as well as pleasant adventures; surrounded by savage inhabitants, most of whom had never met a white man and with whom their intercourse was so wisely managed with the aid of Skagaweah that not only no serious difficulties occurred between them, but the assistance of these nations as guides and in supplying food was in trying times most timely and of great importance. Through all the band of heroes struggled, finally reaching their goal—the mouth of the great Columbia River—about the 1st of December, 1805, near the mouth of which, on a tributary stream called Netul, now Lewis and Clark River, they built their winter quarters, naming it Fort Clatsop from a tribe of Indians who had treated the party with great kindness and were uniformly friendly. The winter was industriously passed in explorations by land and water; in studying the character of the native inhabitants, who were numerous and interesting, and in hunting and fishing. Their outdoor employment was seriously hindered by almost continual rains, barely a day and night passing that did not bring its rainfall, and at times the rain would continue for days. It was discovered that these Indians had for a long series of years traded with white men who came in vessels, probably some of them from the north, though the natives, when asked the direction, would point to the southwest. Captain Lewis procured the names of a number of these traders, all of whom voyaged in three and four masted schooners and who came in the spring and fall. These names are Messrs: Haley, Yonens, Tallamen, Calalamet (who had a wooden leg), Swipton, Moore, Machey, Washington, Mesship, Davidson, Jackson, Holch and Skelley, who had one eye only.

On Sunday, March 26, 1806, the expedition set out on its return journey, which was accomplished without the loss of a life, though the party was at times exposed to great perils, and Captain Lewis narrowly escaped death in a skirmish with Indians who had been camping with them over night and had stolen their guns and horses before daylight. In the struggle to recover their effects Lewis was obliged to kill two Indians and another was mortally hit with a knife in the hands of one of the men. The guns and nearly all the horses were recovered. This was the only occasion when such extreme measures were demanded, and it was an occasion when self-preservation unquestionably justified the killing. The expedition made fair progress, each day bringing its interesting if not exciting incidents. About the last of August they passed the future site of Fort Randall. On the 31st they had reached Bon Homme Island, where they met a party of Yankton Indians, who represented about eighty lodges, that were encamped above on Emanuel Creek. Here a halt was made and the Yanktons invited to their camp where they were addressed by Lewis as good and faithful children. A piece of ribbon was tied in the hair of each Indian and some corn was given them and a pair of leggings to the chief. The party spent an hour hunting on the island. The bottom land on the north is described as very rich and so thickly overgrown with pea vines and grass, interwoven with grape vines, that some of the party who attempted to hunt there were compelled to leave it and ascend the plain, where they found the grass nearly as high as their heads. These plains were described as much richer below than above the Quicourt, and the whole country was there very beautiful. After making fifty-two miles they stopped for the night on a sandbar (near Yankton) opposite to the Calumet Bluff, where they had encamped on the 1st of September, 1804, and where their flag staff was still standing. They suffered very much from the mosquitoes. (This encampment was made on Monday evening, September 1, 1896, just two years to a day from the first visit when ascending the river.)

It is reported on what would seem to be good authority that Captain Clark was married to a Nez Perce Indian belle during the outward journey. The nuptial knot was tied according to the Indian custom. His bride accompanied him to the Pacific, remained at Fort Clatsop during the winter and returned with the expedition in the spring to her own people, where the captain concluded to leave his dusky bride until he could arrange otherwise. In due time a son was born, this was in 1807, whom his mother named Tzi-kal-Tzae. When he grew up he called himself "Me-Clark," and could speak English, which had been taught him by his mother. He had sandy hair, which resembled that of the Explorer Clark. This son was killed at the age of seventy years in Bear Paw Mountains on Snake Creek in a battle with General Miles' command. "Me-Clark" was the father of a daughter born about 1855 named Mary Clark, who is now living in Montana. Hon. Joseph Dixon, who represents Montana in Congress, Judge Hiram Knowles and Judge F. H. Moody of Montana are mentioned as authorities for this statement, Dixon having taken the pains to investigate the matter on behalf of Mary Clark. The preparation made to celebrate the centennial anniversary of the Lewis and Clark expedition at Portland in 1905 brought to light this incident, which may appropriately find a place here.

At 8 o'clock the next morning they passed the River Jacques (James) at ten miles and soon after were compelled to land on account of high northeast wind and remained until sunset when they went to a sandbar and camped, twenty-two miles from the encampment of last night. During the day they killed three buffle, four prairie fowl, which were the first they had seen in descending, and two turkeys. The following day, at 11 o'clock, they passed the Redstone (Vermillion) and made sixty miles before night, when they saw two boats and several men on shore. On landing they found a Mr. James Airs of a house at Prairie du Chien, who had come from Mackinaw by way of Prairie du Chien and St. Louis with a license to trade among the Sioux for one year. Most of the night was spent in making inquiries into what had occurred during their absence. After so long an interval the sight of anyone that could give information was delightful and they found Mr. Airs a very friendly and liberal gentleman. They proposed to him to purchase a small quantity of tobacco to be paid for in St.

Louis, when he readily furnished every man of the party with as much as he could use during the remainder of the voyage.

Thursday they left Mr. Airs and after passing the Big Sioux stopped at noon near Floyd's Bluff. On ascending the hill they found that the grave of Floyd had been opened and was now half uncovered. They filled it up and then continued down to their old camp near the Maha villages. On the 6th they met a trading boat belonging to Mr. August Choteau of St. Louis, with several men, on the way to trade with the Yanktons at the River Jacques, and obtained from them a gallon of whiskey and gave each of the party a dram, which was the first spirituous liquor any of them had tasted since the 4th of July, 1805. For tobacco when there was none to be had in the upper river the men cut their long tomahawk pipe stems, which had become saturated with the tobacco juice, into small pieces and chewed it.

The party reached St. Louis in safety on Thursday, September 23d, at 12 o'clock, fired a salute and went ashore, where they received the heartiest and most hospitable welcome from the whole village.

The old French interpreter, Durion, who had been left with the Yanktons on the way up took a number of Yankton chiefs to Washington in the spring of 1805, where they were royally entertained and returned to their homes so favorably impressed that the tribe forever after remained on friendly terms with the whites. Durion had married a Yankton belle and had one son who became quite prominent as an interpreter and trader, and he may have had other children. He lived to a green old age and died here in the Valley of Yankton and was buried according to the Indian custom on a scaffold which was erected on the summit of the bluff near the Sister's Hospital and was a prominent landmark when the whites settled in Yankton. Armstrong indulges in the following sentiment to the memory of the faithful guide:

There he has slumbered on his scaffold tomb
Through fifty years of storm and summer moon;
There let him rest, for first was he to die
Of all the white race beneath Dakota's sky.

Among the first Yankton pioneers it was maintained that the scaffold, with a portion of the skeleton, was visible when they first visited it, but the bones were soon carried away by those who discovered in them something of peculiar value as relics.

Captain Lewis was appointed governor of Louisiana, with his residence at St. Louis, in 1807, and Captain Clark was made general of its militia and agent of the United States for the Indian affairs in Louisiana. Captain Clark engaged in the fur trade in 1808 with Manuel Lisa and Sylvester Labbadie, who was related to the Choteaus by marriage and led an expedition of 150 men up the Missouri, founding Fort Clark at the Arickaras Village below Knife River, and then went on to the forks of the Missouri, built a fort and engaged in trapping with a large force of men. The implacable hostility of the Blackfeet Indians finally drove the whites out of the country, killing thirty of them, and Clark retired from the trade.

Regarding Captain Lewis, President Jefferson furnished a biographical sketch to be published in connection with the journal of the explorations. It was written at Monticello in 1813, and gives a history of the events leading up to the expedition, the letter of instructions to Lewis and closes with the following account of his melancholy death:

Governor Lewis had from early life been subject to hypochondriac affections. It was a constitutional disposition in all the nearer branches of the family of his name and was more immediately inherited by him from his father. They had not, however, been so strong as to give uneasiness to his family. While he lived with me at Washington I observed several times sensible depressions of mind, but tracing their constitutional source I pursued the course by what I had seen in the family. During his western expedition the constant fatigue which that required of all the faculties of body and mind suspended these distressing

After his establishment at St. Louis in sedentary occupation, they returned upon him with troubled vigor and began seriously to alarm his friends. He was in a paroxysm of nervousness, and was so afflicted that it was necessary for him to go to Washington. He arrived at Mr. Claiborne's office where he arrived on the 16th day of September, 1809, with a letter from the governor of Louisiana, Mr. Neely, agent of the United States, and a letter from the governor of Louisiana, Mr. Neely, agent of the United States. He found him extremely indisposed, and was so afflicted that it was necessary for him to go to Washington. The rumors of a war with England, and that he might lose the papers he was bringing on, among which were his public accounts and the journals and papers of his western expedition, were so great, that he was obliged to change his route and to take his course by land through the country. Although he appeared somewhat relieved, Mr. Neely kindly determined to wait for him at the house of the first white inhabitant on his road. He stopped at the house of a Mr. Gruider, who not being at home his wife alarmed at the symptoms of distress, sent her maid to take him up the house and retired to rest herself in an out building. Mr. Neely's servants lodging in another. About 3 o'clock in the night he fell ill, and which plunged his friends into affliction and deprived the country of one of her most valued citizens, whose valor and intelligence would have been now (1813) employed in the service of his country, and in emulating by land the splendid deeds which he had performed on the ocean. It lost, too, to the nation the benefit of receiving from him the full and true history of his sufferings and successes, in endeavoring to extend for them the boundaries of science and to present to their knowledge that vast and fertile country which their sons are destined to fill with art, science, with freedom and happiness.

In this melancholy close of the life of one whom posterity will declare not to have lived in vain, I have only to add that all the facts I have stated are either known to myself or communicated by his family or others for whose truth I have no hesitation to make myself responsible, and I conclude with tendering you the assurance of my respect and consideration.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

In Robinson's History of South Dakota (1904), it is stated that:

The first action of Congress regarding a government for the Territory of Louisiana was to attach it to the Territory of Indiana, of which William Henry Harrison was governor at that time. The following year (1805), Congress created the Territory of Louisiana, with St. Louis as the capital, and the President appointed James Wilkinson, governor; Frederick Bates, secretary; and R. J. Meigs and J. B. C. Lucas, judges. [Capt. Merriwether Lewis was appointed governor in 1807.]

In 1812 Louisiana was admitted as a state with its present boundaries. Congress then created the Territory of Missouri. In 1820 Missouri was admitted into the Union, but no provision was made for a government north of the Missouri and west of the Mississippi until 1834, when the Territory of Michigan was extended to embrace the country west to the Missouri and north to the international boundary. In 1836 Wisconsin Territory was created, which included Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, and Dakota east of the Missouri. In 1838 Iowa was made a territory and included all the territory north of the Missouri to the Canadian River, and all lying between the Mississippi and Missouri. Minnesota was made a territory in 1858, and included all east of the Missouri as far north as White Earth River. That year the Dakota north of the Missouri was called Mandan until 1854, when it was included in the Territory of Nebraska.

LEWIS AND CLARK'S CAMPS IN DAKOTA

It may be interesting to Dakotians generally if it could be known definitely where the various encampments by Lewis and Clark's party were made. A record was kept of the number of miles traversed each day and a brief description of the camps, but there have been such changes in the channel of the river and its banks during the century that has elapsed since the exploration that their record of distances and description will not now guide to all the points mentioned in their journal. Out of a motive of curiosity more than of an expectation of giving the precise location, the writer has endeavored to point out approximately where these various camps were laid between the Big Sioux and the winter camp. This may lead to a closer examination by those now inhabiting the river banks and possibly a line of Lewis and Clark's landmarks may be established, fifty-two or more in number, along the borders of the Missouri. The expedition passed the mouth of the Big Sioux River August 21st. The first camp made after passing this point was on the Nebraska side, about three miles west of McCook, Union County. The second camp was on the Dakota side, in Union County, in town 90, range 49. The third camp was on the Nebraska shore, two or three miles from Elk Point; and the fourth $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles above the mouth of the Vermillion River on the Nebraska side. The fifth night was spent six miles farther upstream, on the south side of the river, probably about opposite section 22, town 92, range 52, Clay County. The sixth camp was in Clay County, near section 21, town 92, range 53. The seventh camp was on a sandbar, near the Yankton County shore, $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles above the mouth of James River. Tuesday, August 28th, the expedition reached a point $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles by river from the camp of the night before, and went into camp for the eighth time "on the south, under Calumet Bluff" (which bluff is on the north side), and here the party remained until Saturday, September 1st, holding a council with the Yankton Indians. September 1st, the ninth camp was on the lower extremity of Bon Homme Island, fifteen miles from the Yankton Camp, and the next night, which was Sunday, the encampment was formed at the head of Bon Homme Island, where Captain Clark spent the day viewing and measuring the old fortification. The eleventh camp was on the Nebraska side, about opposite Springfield, and the twelfth was just above Niobrara River in what was once Todd County, Dakota. The thirteenth camp was also in Todd County, about opposite section 19, town 94, range 62, on the Yankton Reservation. The fourteenth camp was very near Greenwood, on the Yankton Reserve; and the fifteenth in Gregory County, about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles above Greenwood. Sunday, September 9th, the sixteenth camp was made on Boat Island, in Chas. Mix County, seventeen miles above Greenwood. The seventeenth camp was on Mud Island, Charles Mix County, $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles above Boat Island. Camp No. 18 was in Brule County, near section 14, town 101, range 71. No. 19 was in section 21, town 102 range 71; and No. 20 in section 24, town 102, range 72, all in Brule County. At camp twenty the expedition remained a day examining White River Valley. Camp twenty-one was six miles above White River on the north side, in Brule County. Sunday, the 16th of September, camp twenty-two, near Lower Brule Agency, on the west side. Camp twenty-three was on the west side, below Chamberlain; and camp twenty-four was at American Island, opposite Chamberlain. Camp twenty-five was near Crow Creek, Buffalo County. Camp twenty-six was on section 21, town 108, range 93, Hyde County, on a sandbar. Camp twenty-seven in Hughes County, section 4, town 108, range 74. The next camp, twenty-eight, was made Sunday, September 23d, near section 31, town 110 range 76, in Hughes County, and the following night camp twenty-nine was made on a sandbar at the mouth of Bad, or Teton River, because of the threatening attitude and large number of Indians at that point. The following three days were spent with these Indians who were apparently friendly, but who acted as though waiting an opportunity to be otherwise. Camp was changed each night, moving up a mile or two along the bars, or anchoring the boats. A grand council was held. On Friday, the 28th, the expedition left Bad River and moved up about six miles above Pierre to camp thirty-one, near section 6, town 110, range 81. No. 32 was in section 34, town 110, range 81. No. 33 was above and near Fort Sully; and thirty-four was on Devil's Island, Sully County, opposite section 19, town 113, range 80. The expedition had passed the mouth of the Cheyenne River this day, which was the first of October. Camp thirty-five on sandbar near the north line of Sully County. No. 36 on sandbar eight miles from last camp and near latitude $44^{\circ} 19' 36''$, about opposite section 29, town 118, range 79. No. 37 on sandbar near Forest City, Potter County, opposite section 7, town 118, range 78. No. 38 on the northeast shore, two miles below Le Beau, Walworth County, section 26, town 121, range 78. No. 39, passed the mouth of Moreau River on Sunday, October 7th, made twenty-two miles, camped below the mouth of Grand River about four miles, opposite town 124, range 76, Walworth County. Camp forty was above Grand River, which was passed on the 8th, and the altitude taken in latitude $45^{\circ} 39' 5''$. Camped in the southern part of Campbell County, section 16, town 124, range 79. Remained here until the 12th, counseling with the Brickarees, who had a large village on the south, and on an island. Three days at this point. October 12th, camp forty-one, Campbell County, town 128, range 77. Camp forty-two was in Campbell County, near the boundary line between the two states. No. 43 in Emmons County, N. D., ten miles above the boundary, between the two states. No. 44, October 15th, Emmons County, nearly opposite Fort Yates. No. 45 on the north, about section 12, town 133, range 79. Camp forty-six, in the south or west, three miles below the mouth of Cannon Ball River. Camp forty-seven in Emmons County, above Fort Rice, in section 6, town 135, range 78, latitude $46^{\circ} 23' 57''$. Camp forty-eight, Burleigh County, N. D., four miles above the boundary, opposite section 18, town 137, range 78, camped on sandbar. No. 49, October 19, near Bismarck, on the west bank. No. 50, seven miles above Bismarck, on the east bank, Sunday, 21st. Camp fifty-one in Mercer County, N. D., five miles above southern boundary. Camp fifty-two near the north line of Burleigh County and south line of McLean. Monday, October 22, camp fifty-five; expedition reached Mandan and Ree villages, now McLean County, and spent a week looking for winter camping place, changing its camp occasionally, and finally, on the 29th of October, selecting a site for winter quarters near the present Town of Washburne, McLean County, in latitude $47^{\circ} 21' 47''$, longitude 101 west from Greenwich.

CHAPTER VI

THE FUR TRADE

FUR TRADE THE PIONEER INDUSTRY OF NORTH AMERICA—JOHN JACOB ASTOR AND HIS ENTERPRISES—THE CHOTEAU'S, LISA AND OTHERS—FORT PIERRE CHOTEAU—ASTOR EXPEDITIONS BY SEA AND LAND—WASHINGTON HUNT'S PERILOUS AND TRAGIC JOURNEY—THE WAR OF 1812—ASTOR SELLS TO CHOTEAU.

The Upper Missouri Valley was the theater of a very large and profitable industry generations before the country was opened to settlement, and prosperity, measured in the profits realized from the fur trade, possibly equalled, if it did not exceed, our boasted per capita of the present day. We do not realize how much was accomplished in the exploration of this great Northwest by the pioneers who bartered with the savages during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, nor do we realize the comparatively large number of civilized people who lived sumptuously on its bounty. The forests, plains and streams furnished the raw material in immense quantities; the natives found it a source of profitable industry and congenial employment. The traders were the middlemen and accumulated princely fortunes, while the product in its unfinished condition formed the staple of our foreign outgoing commerce. It found an eager and profitable market in Europe, and one of still greater pecuniary value with the opulent classes, the mandarins and royal princes of China, and Astor's Pacific coast enterprise with the China trades led to the founding of a trading port at Astoria. It will seem somewhat singular that during all these decades, when the fur trade flourished so vigorously, that the adventurous pioneers made no effort to discover the gold which lay hidden in the very gulches and river banks trod by the enterprising traders and trappers. There seems to be no record of gold discoveries nor of any attempt at prospecting for minerals until the discovery of gold in California in 1849. The fur trade was civilization's pioneer industry in the northern half of the United States as well as Canada; and the Dakotas, with their savage races, contributed as largely and possibly a greater volume to this profitable traffic than any other similar area in North America.

From almost the earliest settlement of North America by white people, the fur trade was the only important industry to engage their enterprise. It had its beginning with the French occupation of Canada in the sixteenth century, and by the year 1800 had grown to immense proportions, and had, by its alluring prizes in the immense profits accruing from it, led its working forces across the continent of North America to the shores of the Pacific. Fur companies had been formed in the Canadian provinces on a scale of great magnitude and their enterprising projectors had become monarchs of wealth. Early in the last century the leading merchants of Philadelphia and New York were largely engaged in this trade, but the major portion of it was controlled by British subjects.

John Jacob Astor, who was born in Germany some time about 1760, had made his way to the United States and had been engaged exclusively in buying and exporting furs for a number of years. He had succeeded in accumulating what was then considered a large fortune. He had become an American citizen and was a resident of the State and City of New York. He was a man of high and laudable ambition, of great executive ability, a sincere and active American patriot, in fact, a type of the best and most intelligent citizenship. When Louisiana was purchased he saw the way opened for the establishment of a fur trade on a magnitude equal to that of Canada and exclusively within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. After the return of the Lewis and Clark exploring expedition he set about the practical execution of the most daring and costly business undertaking that had up to that day engaged the attention of this country's business men. He planned to open up and develop a fur trade that would embrace the entire country drained by the Missouri and Columbia rivers, reaching to the shores of the Pacific, and for this purpose secured a charter from the Legislature of the State of New York, in 1808, incorporating the American Fur Company with a capital of $1,000,000, practically all of it furnished by himself. Because of his high character as a citizen and probity in all his affairs, he was also enabled to secure the favor of the President and Congress, who extended to him every privilege that could be consistently given in support of a private enterprise. Prior to this time, however, there had been a profitable trade carried on with the Indian population of the Missouri country by way of the British-American provinces controlled by the Hudson Bay Company of Great Britain, the Northwest Fur Company of Canada, and by a number of traders licensed by the Spanish governors of Louisiana—all foreigners—all inimical to the young Republic of the United States—and all, apparently, judged by subsequent developments, made it a large part of their business to prejudice the minds of the Indian population all along the Missouri against the new government that had come into possession of the Territory of Louisiana by purchase from France.

Mr. Doane Robinson, who has investigated the pre-settlement history of the Upper Missouri Valley quite thoroughly and intelligently, had this to say in his History of Dakota, regarding the infancy of the fur trade in the Northwest:

From 1764 the French of St. Louis begun trading up the Missouri. There is very little of record indicating how far up the river this trade extended, but it is certain that long before 1800 they were trading within the South Dakota Territory. Loisel's Post, a strong fortified trading house, was built on Cedar Island in the Missouri River, thirty-five miles below Pierre, in 1796. In the fall of 1796, Treaudeau, a St. Louis trader, established a house for trade with the Pawnees on the east bank of the Missouri, and a little above the site of Fort Randall.

To compress into a paragraph the conclusions relating to the exploration of South Dakota prior to the nineteenth century, it may be said that it is highly improbable that South Dakota was explored by the Spaniards in the early portion of the sixteenth century; or that any white man saw the territory during the sixteenth century at all. That it is quite possible that white men, employees of LeSeuer and LeMoyné, visited Sioux Falls in 1683, and very probable that LeSeuer's men were here to trade in 1700; and that it is also possible that LeSeuer visited South Dakota in person about 1695. That Verendrye was certainly here in 1742, and that DeLusignan visited our borders in 1745. That the French had established a general fur trade in our territory and had built two strong posts prior to 1800. That, so far as is yet developed all other reputed explorations are based on conjecture.

Small trading posts were also established at Big Stone Lake and along the James river by small traders, or as branch establishments of the larger companies. They endured for a brief time and were then abandoned for a more favorable location, or were merged with other concerns.

The Columbia Fur Company, about 1827, had trading posts at the mouth of the Niobrara, James and Vermillion rivers.

In the lower Missouri country a profitable and growing trade with the natives was carried on by citizens of St. Louis, first of whom in point of wealth and ability was the Chouteau family and its connections by marriage, whose ancestors founded St. Louis in 1764. The Chouteaus were deeply engaged in the fur trade as far west as the Kansas River, during the closing years of that century, and were extending their business up the Missouri Valley as rapidly as practicable. A prominent character in the trade early in 1800 was a wealthy Spanish gentleman named Manuel Lisa, also a St. Louisian, and associated with him were Benoit, Gregory, Sarpy and Charles Sanginet, who conducted their enterprise under the partnership title of Lisa, Benoit & Co. This gave way in 1806 to a new partnership headed by Lisa, in company with George Druillard, who was a member of the Lewis and Clark expedition. The partners made a trading trip to the mouth of the Yellowstone in 1807, and built a trading post near that locality which they named Fort Manuel. It was the first trading post built in the Dakotah country. Druillard remained in charge of the post, while Lisa returned to St. Louis in 1808, and organized the American Fur Company of St. Louis, with Capt. William Clark, of Lewis and Clark, and Sylvester Labadie, a relative by marriage of the Choteaus. In 1809 these three gentlemen, with a party of 150 men, trappers, hunters, frontiersmen and employes, made a trip to Fort Manuel, locating a small trading post at the Arickaree village near Big Knife River on their way up, which was named Fort Clarke. They also established posts at a Mandan village a few miles above, and still another at a village of the Gros Ventres on the opposite side of the river. This party proceeded to the headwaters of the Missouri, erecting a fort at the three forks of the river, and began trapping on an extensive scale, as well as trading. They encountered serious trouble with the Blackfeet Indians, losing nearly a third of their men. Their employes became discouraged and deserted, some of them entering the employ of the Hudson's Bay Company, which conducted an itinerant trading business through that section. The Lisa company abandoned the country. What is known as the second war with Great Britain, 1812-15, followed, the fur trade became too hazardous for Americans in that section, and it languished for four years. In 1816 it revived, however, with great spirit, and a number of new partnerships were formed at St. Louis, conducting their operations mainly south of the Dakota line. In 1819 another partnership under the head of Lisa was formed at St. Louis, embracing nine individuals, men of wealth and business experience. Their names were Manuel Lisa, who was elected president of the partnership; Thomas Hempstead, Jr., Lisa's brother-in-law; Joshua Pilcher, an experienced upper river trader; Joseph Perkins, Andrew Woods, Moses B. Carson, Andrew Dripps, Robert Jones and J. B. Zaroin. The firm sent Mr. Pilcher with about seventy-five men and a large stock of Indian wares into the Sioux country that same season and located trading posts, first at Cedar Island, about midway between Fort Randall and Chamberlain, or what is now Gregory County; they also built a post near Chamberlain, which they called Fort Lookout, and Fort Kiowa was afterward erected near this locality. Passing on to the great bend of the river above Crow Creek, they built Fort George, and also put in a very complete frontier repair shop with a blacksmith outfit, and closed their season's building operations by the erection of Fort Tecumseh, opposite the mouth of Bad River and very near the site of the present capital of South Dakota. This post was looked upon as occupying hostile Indian country and was surrounded with a substantial stockade.

In the meantime Mr. Astor had been pushing his great enterprise with all the energy and celerity possible in those days. With no lack of means, it was not an easy matter to secure the necessary assistants in an undertaking such as Astor contemplated. He needed experienced men who combined honesty, efficiency, courage, good judgment—qualities that go to make up not only a first-class business man but a great military commander, and as resolute as Napoleon. His first move was the sending of two expeditions to the Oregon country—one by sea and one by way of the Missouri and Columbia rivers. This was in 1810. The first was attended with great misfortune and an appalling sacrifice of life. It forms a chapter of tragic history, the most thrilling and disastrous in the annals of those early days of resolute adventure and exploration. The Missouri expedition fared little better, though its misfortunes were due to the difficulty of finding a path through the mountains, and its formidable enemy was starvation.

which threatened its members for months and brought them possibly to feed a human body.

The Missouri expedition was under the command of Mr. Washington Hunt, an experienced fur trader, of fine executive ability, undaunted courage and resolution, but a comparative stranger to the duties and experiences of such an undertaking. After visiting Canada and possessing himself of such information concerning his trip as he could obtain, securing the most experienced boatmen and other assistants, and outfitting with the necessary boats, he crossed to the Mississippi and voyaged down that stream to St. Louis, where he completed his outfit and his complement of hunters and voyageurs, engaging for an interpreter a son of the Frenchman Durion, who had accompanied Lewis and Clark in a similar capacity as far as Yankton. Mr. Hunt found considerable difficulty in securing what he needed, certain St. Louis interests, notably those controlled by Lisa, seeming to take particular pains to obstruct his negotiations.

Being amply supplied with money, however, and known as the agent of Astor, he was finally successful, and, everything being in readiness, he set out from St. Louis on the 21st of October, 1810, with a strong company, thoroughly equipped, having planned to follow, as near as possible, the route taken by Lewis and Clark. The time of starting was late, the stage of water was low, and winter coming on early, the expedition made but 450 miles, when reaching the Nodawa River, 150 miles above old Fort Osage, they found an excellent point for a permanent camp. On the 16th of November they landed and prepared their winter quarters. This encampment was surrounded by a country abundantly supplied with game and groves, and the winter was passed very pleasantly. The breaking up of the river, the following spring, came unusually late, and the expedition was obliged to remain in camp until about the 20th of April, 1811, when the voyage toward the mountains was resumed, and continued with fair success.

If this expedition made any important halt in the vicinity of Yankton, along the river or other points, the record does not mention it, but does relate meeting with members of the Yankton tribe at the Omaha village below, who informed Mr. Hunt that the Teton Sioux, in the upper country, were inclined to be hostile, and advised him to act with caution. A village of the Poncas was found about four miles south of the mouth of the Niobrara River, and the Indians proved to be very friendly. During the voyage Mr. Hunt had been, most unfortunately, persuaded to change the plan of his route, and instead of following in the path of Lewis and Clarke, he had resolved to abandon the river at the Arickaree village, near the mouth of the Cannon Ball River, and strike across the plains as a more expeditious route and affording many trading advantages. The Arickaree village was reached June 10th, after many interesting experiences. And here Mr. Hunt, after long and vexatious delays, in which Mr. Lisa again appears as a trouble maker and then as a most valuable and cordial cooperator, succeeded in procuring about eighty horses, which, however, was not as many as he required for pack animals, having in addition to the ordinary supplies for his men, a large quantity of goods for barter and for presents to the Indians. Finally the cavalcade got away from the Missouri about the 20th of July, having been nearly six weeks making the necessary arrangements caused by the change of route. Mr. Hunt, however, believed he would be able to get through the mountains before winter set in and join the expedition sent by the same route.

The subsequent journey of this expedition, after reaching the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, forms a fearful chapter of early Northwest history. Starting out with great pomp, and about as well equipped for the journey as it was possible to be supplied, the members of the party were called upon to endure every hardship and privation that human beings could endure and survive. The Indians proved sometimes friendly and often treacherous; ignorant guides led the party into impassable canyons and barren deserts; storms and floods destroyed and swept away their supplies and raiment, horse flesh and dog meat became a luxury, and finally this was denied them. Their sufferings were indescribable—they were horrible. The party became necessarily separated in order to obtain subsistence, and labored on, half demented, and finally, almost literally naked, emaciated, barefooted and bleeding, Mr. Hunt, with a small number of his men, reached the new fort of Astoria, near the mouth of the Columbia River, about the middle of February, 1812. This post had been built the summer before by the Astor party which went around by sea on the chartered vessel Tonquin, which, with its captain and crew, had already met with a most tragic and melancholy fate. He received a welcome so sincere and heartfelt that no language can properly portray it. A portion of his party had preceded him by a full month, and had about given up their leader as lost. The reunion was cordial beyond expression. They had been seventeen months out from St. Louis, and it was estimated that they had traveled 3,500 miles.

We question seriously whether the annals of adventure in any part of the world can furnish an instance where men endured the bitter experiences of this band of pioneers and survived to tell the story of their journeyings and their hairbreadth escapes.

This expedition, occurring at that time and journeying through a region largely unexplored, must be regarded as only second in importance to that of Lewis and Clarke, for, although attended with much loss and suffering to those engaged in it, the survivors were enabled to furnish to the world a vast amount of useful information regarding the region traversed and the people who inhabited it.

Following this Astor expedition came the war between the United States and Great Britain, from 1812 to 1815, which placed an effectual embargo on the foreign commerce of our country. It was to Europe and China that our merchants looked for their commerce of furs. The fur business, including the traffic with the Indians, so far as Americans were concerned, languished during this period. The British traders, however, maintained a continual bartering, and although Congress had enacted laws prohibiting foreigners from trading in the Missouri country, little attention was paid to the law and the enforcement of its provisions was not practicable as long as the British possessed the friendship and confidence of the Indian, which they did to a great extent, having gained it by a wise, if not an honest, course of dealing with them long prior to the purchase of Louisiana by the United States. The long association of the British fur companies, the Hudson's Bay and the Canadian Northwest Company, operating through itinerant traders from the Red River of the North and the Assiniboine, with the upper Missouri Indians, had established terms of friendship that enabled the British influence to control their sympathies and their trade during the War of 1812 and for many years after that contest was settled. The aggressive character of the American traders, however, was year by year gaining the advantage. The provision of law requiring traders to obtain permits from the Government was a great help to the legitimate business on this side of the boundary. After the close of the war there was a rapid revival, and the upper Missouri country, from the mouth of the Bix Sioux to the headwaters of the Missouri, was the scene of greatest activity. Mr. Astor's American Fur Company and the American Fur Company of St. Louis, controlled by Choteau, were both energetic and backed by ample capital. The resident manager of the Astor interest was Kenneth McKenzie, a Scotchman, who had learned the fur trading business very thoroughly during the many years of service with the Hudson's Bay Company. He was considered one of the most competent men in the trade in experience and executive ability. The Pacific Fur Company, the Southwest Company and the Columbia Fur Company were organized by Mr. Astor between 1810 and 1817, and the North American Fur Company in 1823. The three first named were merged with the North American in 1826 and the Astor establishment conducted its affairs under the title of the American Fur Company, and also the North American, until 1834, when Mr. Astor disposed of all his western interests west of the Rocky Mountains to the American Fur Company of St. Louis, of which Pierre Choteau, Jr., was the principal owner, a man of rare business talents and great enterprise. In purchasing the Astor interests, Choteau secured the services of McKenzie, whom he highly valued, and made him general manager of his entire upper Missouri trade, with headquarters at Fort Tecumseh, opposite the mouth of Bad River. McKenzie had located a post eight miles above the mouth of the Yellowstone in 1829, for the Astor American Fur Company, and called it Fort Union. It occupied one of the finest sites on the river. It was at the time the most complete post in the country; enclosed within a strong log stockade 325 x 350 feet in area, with two strong stone bastions in front, each two stories, supplied with cannon. Inside were a large store, a comfortable residence, a workshop for the carpenter, a blacksmith shop and buildings for employes. The post was supplied with a small herd of beef and dairy cattle, and a garden was successfully cultivated. An abundance of pasturage was convenient, and hay was cut and stacked for winter use and for the accommodation of visiting expeditions and adventurous travelers. Fort George, this side of Fort Tecumseh, was built in 1832 by an independent firm made up of Premen, Harvey and Boise, but was soon absorbed by Choteau's company.

CHAPTER VII

THE FUR TRADE AND THE FIRST STEAMBOAT

FORT PIERRE CHOTEAU—FORT VERMILLION AND BENTON—INTRODUCING THE STEAMBOAT, A MACKINAW BOAT; AND THE FIRST STEAMBOAT ON THE UPPER MISSOURI—MAGNITUDE OF THE FUR TRADE—THE TRADERS.

At this time Mr. McKenzie resolved upon changing the location of Fort Tecumseh to the west bank of the river. Experience had taught the manager that the west side was the most convenient for those Indians whose trade was the largest and most profitable, such as the Ogallallas and Arickarees, while on the opposite side were the Yanktons and Yanktonnais, but to reach them it was frequently necessary to go across the prairies to the James River, where competition would be met with. McKenzie therefore resolved to change the location of the trading post to the south bank, and, having obtained the consent of the Arickaree Indians, who seemed to control that country at the time, he, in company with William Laidlaw, another Choteau employe, selected a site for a new trading post about three miles above the mouth of Bad River and 300 feet back from the Missouri River, where they erected a stockade 280 x 300 feet square, enclosing a number of buildings that were necessary for a central trading post and depot of supplies. The portable property of Fort Tecumseh was abandoned and business was begun at Fort Pierre Choteau, the name bestowed on the new post in honor of the head of the American Fur Company of St. Louis, about June 15, 1832. George Catlin, the famous Indian painter, arrived at the new post from the Yellowstone, very soon after its completion. He found it in charge of Laidlaw, whose delighted guest he became, and in writing of his visit, says: "This gentleman has a finely built fort here of two hundred or three hundred feet square, enclosing eight or ten of their factories, houses and stores, in the midst of which he occupies spacious and comfortable apartments, which are well supplied with the comforts and luxuries of life, and neatly and respectfully conducted by a fine looking, modest and dignified Sioux woman, the kind and affectionate mother of his little flock of pretty and interesting children." This post, according to the same author, was 1,300 miles from St. Louis, and the distance is given by Lewis and Clark as 1,283 miles.

Fort Pierre Choteau covered an area of about two acres in the form of a square. The outer walls were composed of cottonwood logs twenty feet long, set upright in the ground to the depth of four feet. Blockhouses were built at the northwest and southeast corners, which projected outside of the stockade some eight feet. There were two gates on the east side, each ten feet wide and reaching nearly to the top of the wall. Within this enclosure were about twenty buildings devoted to various purposes, including a store 100 x 24 feet, where the Indian goods were kept. There was a carpenter shop, saddler's shop, blacksmith shop, living quarters for the employees, kitchens, storerooms for the furs and robes taken in, awaiting shipment to St. Louis, and very ample and comfortable quarters for the manager, Mr. Laidlaw and his family. There were also stables and a sawmill, and a small concrete structure made to store powder in. By crowding, the fort would accommodate 100 persons, but it was very seldom that more than twenty-five would people it at the same time. While it was named by its founders

Fort Pierre Choteau, the last name was soon dropped and "Fort Pierre" became widely known throughout the United States than any military or trading post in the territory. Not only was it a great central mart for Indian barter, as many as 6,000 Indians being in camp around it at the same time, but it became the most prominent landmark in the Northwest for Government expeditions sent out on scientific errands, and in this way it became well and favorably known throughout the nation. It occupied a geographical position also that brought it in line with the first circle of military forts erected by the Government along the Northwest frontier from Minnesota to Western Nebraska—a fortunate circumstance for its owners in years to come.

Fort Vermillion, situated on the bank of the Missouri River about two miles below the present village of Burbank, in Clay County, was built by the American Fur Company in 1835, under the direction of Larpenieur, a famous trader. It was abandoned about 1850.

A trading post called "Dickson's Post" was built about the same time as Fort Vermillion. It stood on the bank of the Missouri very near the present boundary line between Yankton and Clay counties. Dickson had been in the employ of the British companies, but this post is presumed to have been his personal enterprise.

Fort Benton was built in 1846 by Alexander Culbertson for the American Fur Company, and named in memory of Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, for thirty years a member of the Senate of the United States. Fort Berthold was built about the same time.

Maj. Charles E. Galpin, who had been employed by Choteau, in company with Capt. Joseph LaBarge, both well known to the early white settlers of Dakota, engaged in the fur trade in 1848, and built Fort Campbell, above Fort Benton, and also a number of other posts. LaBarge was a pioneer steamboat captain and merchant, while Galpin was an old fur trader and had a wide acquaintance with the Indians. The building of these fur trading posts continued up to about 1850, when the trade entered upon its declining stage, and fifteen to twenty years later was numbered among the industries that had had its day and never could be restored.

Intoxicating liquors were used by the fur traders in their dealings with the Indians. It was discovered that the red men were fond of it, and were willing to pay, in barter, any price almost the trader would ask. It was discovered that when under the influence of liquor the Indian could be traded with to much better advantage to the trader than when sober, and this led the unscrupulous trader to use it freely as a means of driving a good bargain. This criminal and general use of intoxicants became a matter of such serious importance that Congress, in 1832, enacted the law prohibiting the carrying of liquors into the Indian country, and as a means of enforcing the law made it the duty of all army officers along the Missouri at the various posts to inspect the steamboats traversing the river, and to seize all spirituous liquors consigned to fur traders or their representatives. Intoxication among the Indians was materially lessened as a result of this beneficent measure, as forfeiture of the trader's license was one of the hillest penalties for transgressing the statute; but it seemed impossible to stop the traffic altogether, for some of the traders were shrewd enough to manufacture, it was claimed, good enough intoxicants for trading purposes at their posts, and used it in the morning where they could feel safe from detection. The Indians, however, would not divulge the trader's name who furnished them liquor, knowing that it could result in depriving them of it. The law of 1832, prohibiting the introduction of intoxicants into the Indian country, is still in force.

Mr. A. C. Randolph, a merchant of St. Louis in 1867, then something more than thirty years of age, related to a Dakota pioneer his own experience as a trader in the Northwest in 1830. In that year Mr. Randolph resided in Saline County, Missouri, and in connection with a Mr. Montgomery and a Mr. Breau-a land expedition, and their outfit consisted of one wagon and five two-wheel carts drawn by mules, and in addition eleven saddle horses, in all eighteen animals. They took along ten months' provisions and all the Indian goods they could transport. Their route took them up the valley of the Missouri, and over the tenantless townsite of Sioux City to the Big Sioux River, which they crossed near the mouth of Brule Creek, on the 15th of December, 1840. They then journeyed along the bluffs or highland until opposite old Fort Vermillion, to which post they made a visit and found the American Fur Company established there and doing a thriving trade. At this point the Randolph party dismissed their Indian guides, whom they had "discovered to be worse than useless." These guides were accompanied by their families and a multitude of dogs that were accustomed to breakfast off of Mr. Randolph's harnesses. Leaving Fort Vermillion, the Randolph party camped the same evening on the bank of the Vermillion River. Quite a number of the Indians had kept along with the party, and that night a squaw gave birth to a papoose, and the dusky mother washed and dressed it herself, and all the next day, carrying her infant child, kept along with the procession and camped with them the same night at a point near the present farm home of S. C. Fargo, not far from Gayville. The next day the Randolph party reached and crossed the James River, some distance north of the present wagon bridge on the main road to Yankton, and pursued their journey along the highlands north of the bottom, keeping two or three miles away from the Missouri, the better to enable them to observe both highlands and lowlands. They finally reached the Bijou Hills region without serious mishap, their destination being the White River country, a stream that abounded in fur-bearing animals and Indians, whose source was somewhere in the Black Hills, as they had learned. Crossing the Missouri at Makazith (ziti), or White River, they followed up the west bank of the Missouri to old Fort George, where they halted and made their preparations for trade and barter. Here the company was divided into three detachments, each detachment being placed in charge of a member of the firm, and each detachment was to form a separate and distinct party for trading purposes. Randolph chose the White River Valley and Little Missouri as his field and traded with the Brules. Montgomery took up winter quarters on the Belle Fourche, or North Fork, of the Big Cheyenne, and bartered with the Two-Kettles, while Breauchamp drove a thriving business with the Ogallallas on the South Fork of the Cheyenne. A general name for the Sioux who inhabited the country west of the Missouri was Teton, or Tetonwan. They were all wild and warlike, but had been at peace with the whites so long that it was not known among them that they were ever hostile, although constantly at war with other Indian nations. In the spring of 1841 the three parties came together again in accordance with their plan, at old Fort George, all well and unharmed. All had enjoyed a very profitable trade, despite the misfortune that came to Randolph, who lost a small boat load of robes and furs by the sinking of the boat containing them in the Little Missouri River. Snow had been unusually abundant, as they learned from the natives, and the average weather had been much colder, a condition, however, that prevailed throughout the Northwest. The peltries were repacked at Fort George and the party returned without event to civilization, retracing the ground they followed on their way out. The adventure proved very profitable, and furnished the members of the expedition with a fund of experiences that were well worth the toil and hardship each endured.

While the fur trade grew to be a great and profitable industry, it declined for lack of material to feed it, and passed away leaving but little impress upon the regions where its great sources of supply existed. It aided in bringing together the white and red races, and rather led the way to the advent of the better civilization that was to occupy the land and subdue and develop it for the uses of civilized mankind. It is now little more than a memory, except in the far North, though within a century it formed the principal industry of our nation. It was the one crop which was annually harvested and which furnished the means to a large extent of supplying subsistence to the pioneers and founders of the republic. It laid the foundations of great fortunes that have since increased manifold and today wield a potent influence in the business affairs of mankind. The Verendryes, the Astors, the Choteaus, the renowned Lord Selkirk, and others, designedly or not, used it to advance the standard of Christian civilization. It was a valuable aid to the earliest missionaries among the red men, contributing the ways and means which sustained and gave success to their unselfish and heroic labors.

Hundreds, possibly thousands, of small traders were engaged. The Randolph Expedition reveals a type of trading that was largely represented. Even subsequent to the advent of steamboats, for a score of years, the small trader continued to patronize the mackinaw, the pony's back, and his own, and move around among the producers who were scattered in small bands, and who provided the element of barter. Of this numerous class but little of record is left. A trader's license was all that was necessary to legitimize and legalize the trader's right to pursue the business.

The original mackinaw boat was supplied, a little forward of midships, with a stout mast, thirty feet high. A rope from two hundred to three hundred feet long called the "cordel" was made fast to the foot of the mast and passed through a block at the top, and from there to the bow of the boat, passing through another block, so as to bring this block at any required distance from the bow. The rope was then passed ashore and lengthened out or shortened as circumstances might require. From twenty to fifty men grasping the rope constituted the motive power, assisted occasionally by a lodge skin set as a sail. The men who followed this business as a profession were generally French-Canadians and were known as "voyageurs," or "cordellers." This was the genuine mackinaw used in Canadian streams and on the Missouri before the advent of steamboats, and on its unnavigable tributaries until a much later period. It was a boat usually that would carry fifteen to fifty tons. With the advent of the gold miner in 1862 and later, when thousands of small boats descended the Missouri in the fall bringing down the miners and their gold, the name "mackinaw" was given indiscriminately to all kinds of small boats, and it became the custom to speak of the arrival of these boats as the arrival of mackinaws. A well equipped boat, having sail and oars, would come down the Missouri at the rate of ten to twelve miles an hour. The Lewis and Clark bateau would seem to have been a first-class mackinaw, fitted for towing, rowing and sailing.

Regarding the average profits of the fur trade in its best days, Major Galpin and others who were still engaged in it when Dakota was opened to settlement and well acquainted with the pioneers, estimated that it was not below 300 per cent net, and this, it was maintained, was justified by the extraordinary risks attending the trade and the fluctuations in the market price of robes and furs.

As showing the magnitude of the traffic, the export business from the port of Philadelphia for the year 1824 was made public. Philadelphia was not the only export point, but had the largest share of this country's business. The merchandise was all from the upper Missouri country, and amounted to 250,000 pounds of deer skins; 250,000 pounds of beaver; 17,000 buffalo robes; 800 bear skins; 4,500 otter skins; 25,000 raccoon; 81,000 muskrat; 1,000 mink; 1,500 fox and wolf, and 400 fisher and martin skins. The shipment was on account of American traders and largely for that company. The Hudson's Bay Company shipped from Canadian ports, and in still larger quantities, and while they continued their illicit trade on the Missouri, the great bulk of their business was in the vast region drained by the Red River of the North and its tributaries. It was estimated that this company received annually from the Northwest frontier about 120,000 beaver; 30,000 martin; 20,000 muskrat; 5,000 fox; 4,000 otter; 2,000 bear; 2,000 mink; 30,000 buffalo; 5,000 lynx; 4,000 wolf; 1,000 elk, and 12,000 deer skins.

The early fur traders, those that engaged in the traffic directly with the Indians, were men of no ordinary mold. In many instances they were heroes, at all times resolute, self-reliant, and often self-sacrificing. As a rule no obstacle discouraged them, and they were appalled by no threatened calamity. This much can be said in commendation of their merits, without meaning to justify their methods of bartering with the ignorant natives.

The fur traders have disappeared from the Dakotas along with the buffalo, the beaver, the elk and the mink, and to a large extent the native inhabitants. Civilization had no place for them, but delayed its invasion until their occupation had been well nigh extinguished for want of material to subsist on. But the memory of the traders has been preserved on history's page, and in story and song, and among the most attractive type of these itinerant merchants, who were self-banished in their lust for gold to a life of isolation from their race, and exposed to a brood of privations and dangers inseparable from their avocation, it is peculiarly appropriate that a native Dakota boy should compose the requiem that tells of their departure and disappearance. We have therefore thought it appropriate to give place to a most excellent poem composed by the talented son of Maj. J. R. Hanson, of Yankton, in which he portrays the fur traders as the central attraction of a word-picture that will be found true to nature and of charming expression:

The moon on plain and bluff and stream
Casts but a faint and fitful gleam,
For striving in a ghostly race
The clouds that rack across her face
Now leave her drifting, white and high,
In some clear lake of purple sky.
And, then, like waves with crests upcurled,
Obscure her radiance from the world.
Across the wild Missouri's breast,
Which lies in icy armor dressed,
The north wind howls and moans,
Wrenching the naked trees that stand
Like skeletons along the strand
To shrill and creaking groans.
On distant butte and wide coteau
Is snow, and never ending snow,
Whirling aloft in spiral clouds,
Weaving in misty, crystal shrouds,
Then floating back to earth again
To drift across the frozen plain
In slow and strangely sculptured waves,
Whose like no shell-strewn sea beach laves.

Such night is not for mortal kind
To fare abroad; the bitter wind,
The restless snow, the frost-locked mold,
Bid living creatures seek their hold
And leave to winter's monarch will
The solitude of vale and hill.
The buffalo, whose legions vast
A few short moons ago have passed
Adown these bleak hillsides,
Now graze full many a league away
Where, through the softly tropic day
The winds of Matagorda Bay
Caress their shaggy hides.
The wolves have sought their coverts deep
In dark ravine and coule steep,
Where cedar thickets, dense and warm,
Afford protection from the storm;
And every creature of the plains
Has left his well beloved domains
To seek, or near or far,
A haven where warm blooded life
May cower from the dreadful strife
Of hyperborean war.

HISTORY OF DAKOTA TERRITORY

But, see! across yon barren swell,
Where wind and snow-rime weave a spell
Of phantoms o'er the hill,
What awkward creatures of the night
Come creeping, snail-like, on the sight,
Halting and slow in weary plight,
But ever onward still.
Their limbs are long and lank and thin,
Their forms are swathed from foot to chin
In garments rude of bison skin.
Upon each broad and stalwart back
Is strapped a huge and weighty pack;
Their coarse and ragged hair
Streams back from brows whose dusky stain
Is dyed by blizzard, wind and rain,
They are a fearsome pair;
Lone pilgrims of the coteau vast,
They seem like cursed souls, outcast,
To roam forever there.

Yet, hark! Adown the cold wind flung,
What voice of merriment gives tongue?
'Tis human laughter, deep and strong,
And then, all suddenly, a song
Rings o'er the prairie lone;
A chanson old, whose rhythm oft
Has lingered on the breezes soft
That kiss the storied Rhone,
Or floated up from lips of love
To some dark casement high above
The streets of Avignon,
Where lovely eyes, all maidenly,
Glance slyly forth that they may see
What lover comes to serenade
Ere drawing back the latticed shade
To toss a red rose down.

What fickle fate, what strange mischance,
Has brought this song of sunny France
To ride upon the blizzard crest
That mantles o'er the wild Northwest;
To find its echoes sweet
In barren butte and stark cliff-side,
Whose beetling summits override
The fierce Missouri's murky tide;
To rouse the scurrying feet
Of antelope and lean coyote,
To hear its last, long, witchery note,
Caught in the hoot owl's dismal throat,
Sweep by on pinions fleet?

Full far these errant sons of Gaul
Have journeyed from the grey seawall
That fronts on fair Marseilles.
But still the spirit of their race
Bids them to turn a dauntless face
On whatever fates prevail.
The storm may drive to hush and den
The creatures of the field and fen,
But neither storm nor darksome night,
Nor icebound stream nor frowning height,
Can check or turn a foot to flight
These iron-hearted men.

Across the flats of stinging sands,
Through thickets, woods and sere uplands,
Their weary pathway shows;
Toward some far post of logs and stakes,
Deep hidden in the willow brakes,
Right onward still it goes.
Persistently, an emblazed track
Bent from the cheerless bivouac

Of some poor, prairie Indian band,
Whose chill and flimsy tepees stand
Half buried in the snows.
Yet what of costly merchandise
That wealth may covet, commerce prize,
Could these adventurers wring
From that ill-fed barbarian horde
Will be to them a sweet reward
For all the risk and toil and pain
They've suffered on the winter's plain
Amid their journeyings.

Ah, wealth enough such tepees hold,
Though not of silver or of gold,
To rouse the white man's longing greed
And send his servants forth with speed
The treasure to unfold.
The trinkets cheap these traders brought
The savages have dearly bought.
Persuaded guilelessly to pay
A ten times doubled usury
In furs of beavers and of mink;
Of silver fox and spotted lynx;
For all their rich and varied store
Of peltries, gathered from the shore,
The wood, the prairie and the hill,
By trapper's art and hunter's skill
The trader's heavy packs now fill.

A journey far those furs must go,
From these wild fastnesses of snow.
By travois, pack and deep bateau;
By keel-boat, sloop and merchantman,
Till half a hemisphere they span
Ere they will lie, at last, displayed
By boulevard and esplanade,
In Europe's buzzing marts of trade.
These martin skins so soft and warm
May wrap some Russian princess' form
And shield her from the Arctic storm
That howls o'er Kroonstadt's Bay.
That robe, a huge black bear which dressed,
May cloak some warrior monarch's breast
As, gazing o'er the battle crest,
He sees the foemen's legion pressed
In panic from the fray.

But it is not the destinies
Which may, perchance, beyond the seas,
Await these rare commodities
That chiefly signify.
Though king and knight and fair princess
Should drain the Northwest wilderness
Of all its savage tribes possess,
Their pride to gratify.
But this—that in the storm tonight,
Through cloudy gloom, through pale moonlight,
Two men still press along,
Not hiding as the wolf and hind
From blinding snow and bitter wind,
Nor like the Indian crouching low
Above a brush-fire's feeble glow,
But vigorous and strong,
Hasting their bidden task to close
Whatever obstructions interpose,
And parrying fortune's adverse blows
Right gaily, with a song.

Plains of the mighty virgin West,
Plains in cold sterile beauty dressed;
Your time of fruit draws near!
Creatures of thicket, vale and shore,

HISTORY OF DAKOTA TERRITORY

Tribes of the hills, your reign is o'er;
The conqueror is here!
His foot prints mark your secret grounds,
His voice upon your ear resounds,
His name, unto your utmost bounds,
Is one of strength and fear.
The magic of his virile powers
Shall change your desert wastes to bowers,
Your nakedness to shade;
Shall stretch broad rustling ranks of corn
Along your stony crests forlorn;
And wheat fields, dappling in the sun,
Where your mad autumn fires have run,
The trails your bison made
Shall grow beneath his hurrying feet
To highway broad and village street,
Along whose grassy sides shall sleep
Meadows and orchards, fruited deep;
Homesteads and schools and holy fanes,
To prove that o'er the vanquished plains
At last, the Lord Jehovah reigns,
Whose power shall never fade.

CHAPTER VIII

INDIAN WAR—BRITISH TRADERS STIR UP TROUBLE

FIRST BATTLE ON DAKOTA SOIL BETWEEN UNITED STATES TROOPS AND INDIANS—
HOW IT HAPPENED—COLONEL LEAVENWORTH CHASTISES THE ARICKAREES—
THE YANKTON INDIANS AID GOVERNMENT FORCES—MISCHIEVOUS INFLUENCE OF BRITISH TRADERS—AMERICAN OFFICERS CRITICISE THE INGRATE FOREIGNERS
—FIRST INDIAN PEACE COMMISSION.

The first battle between the United States troops and the Indians to occur on what is now Dakota soil took place on the 10th of August, 1823, near the mouth of the Grand River, which empties into the Missouri from the west near Wakefield, Carson County, and near the state boundary. The United States troops engaged were a detachment of riflemen and infantry commanded by Lieut. Col. Henry Leavenworth, of the Fifth United States Infantry. His command numbered 200 soldiers, and in addition a large number of trappers, traders and frontiersmen, who were volunteers for this engagement only, and also several hundred Yankton Indians. The enemy were the Arickaree Indians, who had their villages on the banks of the Missouri, near Grand River, and also on an island near the same locality. These Indians had borne the reputation of a friendly tribe and inclined to a peaceful life. They were not nomadic in their tribal life, but built permanent villages, cultivated the soil in a crude way and raised corn, beans, pumpkins and potatoes, and traded these articles to other Indians for furs and peltries, which, in turn, they bartered with the white traders for such articles as they desired to have and could procure. They also trapped and hunted, in addition to their agricultural employment. An occasion and temptation came to these Arickarees to perpetrate an act of serious hostility in the month of May, 1823. William H. Ashley, of Missouri, a licensed trader, was descending the Missouri River with a number of small mackinaw boats loaded with furs and peltries, on the way to St. Louis. He had in his company about ninety men. Regarding the immediate outbreak, Mr. Ashley reported the facts five days later to Colonel Leavenworth, at Council City (Council Bluffs), dating his report aboard "The Keelboat Yellowstone, 25 miles below the Arickaree villages." He says that he arrived at the Arickaree villages on the 30th of May, and that the chiefs invited him to stop and trade with them. He was desirous of procuring some horses for a journey up the Yellowstone, and finding that the Indians had some animals to dispose of, he halted, made the Indians some presents, and made arrangements to purchase forty or fifty horses. The Indians were apparently friendly disposed, though they spoke of some recent differences with the Americans in which a son of one of the Arickaree chiefs had been killed, but they had concluded to overlook that offense because they regarded the Americans as their friends. The following day was passed in negotiating the horse trade satisfactorily. The horses were delivered and placed in charge of forty men of Ashley's force, and plans were made to get an early start the following morning. Mr. Ashley continues:

"About half past three in the morning I was informed that one of my men had been killed, and in all probability the boat would be immediately attacked. The men were all under arms and so continued until sunrise, when the Indians commenced a heavy attack."

from a line extending along the picketing of their towns, about six hundred yards in length. In about fifteen minutes from the time the firing commenced the surviving part of the men embarked, nearly all the horses killed or wounded; one of the anchors had been weighed, the cable of the other cut and the boats dropping down the stream." His losses he gives at twelve killed and eleven wounded; and says seven or eight Indians were killed. Ashley asks Colonel Leavenworth to send a force to punish the Indians and tells the military commander that "their towns are newly picketed in, with timber from six to eight inches thick, twelve to fifteen feet high, dirt on the inside thrown up about eighteen inches. They front the river where there is a large sandbar, forming two-thirds of a circle, at the head of which where the river is very narrow, they have constructed a breast-work of dry wood. The ground on the opposite side of the river is high and commanding."

The hostile force numbered about six hundred warriors, three-fourths of them armed with London fuzees and the remainder with bows and arrows and war axes. Ashley tells the colonel that he expects Major Henry, another trader from above, very soon, and that his own party then numbers but twenty-three effective men.

This Mr. Ashley was a man of enterprise and courage, and resolved to continue his efforts to bring about the punishment of the Indians who had assailed him in such a treacherous and summary manner. He dropped down the river to near the mouth of the Cheyenne, where he was joined, probably in July, by the Major Henry spoken of above, who had passed the hostile villages successfully and without being attacked.

The combined forces went into camp here while Ashley made a trip down the river to about where the capital of South Dakota is now located, thinking to purchase horses from the Sioux. Here he learned that Colonel Leavenworth was on his way up the river at the head of a force of 200 men to punish the Arickarees. He then returned to his camp, where he intended to join Leavenworth's expedition with eighty men, forty men having been secured from the Missouri Fur Company. A camp of Yankton Indians numbering four or five hundred were also in the vicinity who had volunteered to join the whites, which would make a mixed force of about eight hundred, sufficient to destroy the hostiles. Colonel Leavenworth's expedition arrived in due time and was joined by Ashley's conglomerates, made up of the trappers, traders and Yankton Indians, whom Leavenworth does not regard as entirely trustworthy, for in a letter to the United States Indian agent, O'Fallon, at Fort Atkinson, he says: "These Yanktons appear to be zealously determined to cooperate with us, but I have some doubts as to the continuance of their ardor." Leavenworth's expedition reached the Arickaree villages on the 9th of August. The Yankton Indians, who were in the advance, were met by the Ricaras a short distance from the towns, and a skirmish took place, the Ricaras forcing the Yanktons back upon the regulars and Ashley's men, and by this time the Indians had become so intermingled that Leavenworth declined to order his forces to fire, fearing that they would kill his friendly Indians. The military operations of that day appear to have ended with this skirmish, but on the morning of the 10th, Colonel Leavenworth's artillery having arrived by boats, a company of riflemen and a company of infantry took possession of a hill to the north of the upper village within three hundred feet of the town. An attack on the lower town was also undertaken, aided by a six-pounder cannon and a 5½ inch brass howitzer. The assault was kept up with energy until 3 o'clock in the afternoon, the Yankton Indians in the meantime being industriously engaged in securing the spoils of war by carrying off the Ricaras' corn. Towards evening a party of Yanktons were discovered holding a council with the enemy on a hill above the upper village, and it was discovered that they were quietly withdrawing from the field though not having announced such an intention. Firing on the part of the troops ceased about 4 o'clock, when the Ricaras sent out an embassy to ask for peace, stating that the first shot from the cannon had killed their chief "Grey Eyes," who had caused all the trouble, and that we had killed a great many of their people and their horses.

Colonel Leavenworth in his report says:

They were evidently very much terrified and completely humbled. Being convinced of this and supposing that the Government would be better pleased to have them corrected than exterminated and as the Sioux in a very strange and unaccountable manner, had left us, it was thought best under all circumstances, to listen to the solicitations of the Ricaras for peace, especially as it was understood that our round shot were nearly all expended. Consequently a treaty was made with them and the next two days was occupied in arranging its terms.

Under this treaty the Indians agreed to recognize the United States Government as their rightful sovereign, and to remain true and faithful in their allegiance to the republic, to live at peace with the white people and to commit no depredations upon the persons or property of the whites who came among them to trade and barter. To deliver over to the military power of the Government all offenders among their own people against the persons and property of the whites, for trial and punishment, and to seek peace with their neighboring and other tribes. The Government agreeing to protect the Arickarees so long as they fulfilled their agreements faithfully and to look after their welfare and to guard them against the imposition, fraud and violence of the whites; the Arickarees not to take the law into their own hands to punish such offenders, but to deliver them over to the military, report the facts of their grievance to a licensed trader or to the military authorities who would investigate the charge and punish the offenders.

General Ashley's property was restored and although there was some complaints that the Indians had kept back some articles, the principal chief, who was now "Little Soldier," insisted that all had been turned back, while he made presents of buffalo robes and protested that he could do no more. Leavenworth assured him that he would not further be disturbed, that his property was not wanted, to faithfully observe his treaty engagements and there would be no further trouble. But it would seem that the Indians had little faith in these assurances or in their treaty, for during the following night they evacuated their villages, and made haste to put as great a distance as possible between themselves and the little army. The next morning the soldiers entered the villages but did not disturb them. They found from the best evidence obtainable that not less than fifty of the Ricaras had been killed and a much greater number wounded. Troops were sent out to find the fugitives bearing this message to them:

Ricaras—You see the pipe of peace which you gave to me in the hands of Mr. Charbonneau, and the flag of the United States. These will convince you that my heart is not bad. Your villages are in my possession; come back and take them in peace, and you will find everything as you left them. You shall not be hurt if you do not obstruct the road or molest the traders. If you do not come back there are some bad men and bad Indians who will burn your villages. Come back and come quickly. Be assured that what I say is the truth.

H. LEAVENWORTH,
Colonel U. S. Army.

The message bearer, however, returned without finding the fleeing band. The Ricarees had left the mother of their fallen chief "Grey Eyes" in one of their principal lodges, giving her water and provisions, she being the sole occupant of the town. She was an old woman and according to the custom of many tribes she was abandoned because she would require too much attention and assistance if taken along. Leavenworth did not disturb her nor anything else belonging to the Indians, believing that possibly they might return and he was desirous that they should find their property just as they left it. The troops then embarked for home, leaving the old squaw, the sole occupant of the villages. Before the command had passed out of the sight of the villages, however, they were discovered on fire and it was supposed they were totally destroyed. The burning was undoubtedly the work of incendiaries and Leavenworth thought the guilty people were a partner and clerk of the Missouri Fur Company.

There was a purpose in this military expedition beyond the mere punishment of the Indians for their attack upon the Ashley party. It will be noted that this difficulty occurred but a few years following the close of our second war with Great Britain, and the cause of it was ascribed to the mischievous and rapacious counsel and misrepresentations of the British traders of the Hudson's Bay Company, who lost no opportunity to prejudice the savages against the United States and the American traders. Here is the view taken of the situation by General Gaines, then in command of the western department, headquarters at Louisville, Ky., in a letter to secretary of war, John C. Calhoun:

I am convinced from what you have said and written upon the subject of our western Indian relations that I need not point out to you the evils that must result from our being compelled to recede from the position we have taken, and give up our trade and intercourse with those distant nations. The trade itself, however valuable, is relatively little or nothing when compared with the decided advantage of that harmonious influence and control which is acquired and preserved in a great degree, if not wholly, by the constant friendly intercourse which the trade affords, and by which it is principally cherished and preserved. If we quietly gave up this trade, we shall at once throw it, and with it the friendship and physical power of 30,000 warriors, into the arms of England, who has taught us in letters and blood (which we have had the magnanimity to forgive, but which it would be treason to forget) that this trade forms rein and curb by which the turbulent and towering spirit of these lords of the forest can alone be governed. I say alone, because I am decidedly of the opinion that, if there existed no such rivalry in the trade as that of the English with which we have always been obliged to contend under the disadvantages of restrictions such as have never been imposed upon our rival adversary, we should with one-tenth of the expense and force to which we have been subjected, preserve the relations of peace with these Indians more effectually than they have been at any former period. But to suffer outrages, such as have been perpetrated by the Ricaras and the Blackfeet to go unpunished, would be to surrender the trade and with it, our stronghold upon the Indian, to England.

Agent O'Fallon is another witness who testifies of the pernicious and mischievous influence of the British traders upon the American Indians. He says, reporting a hostile act of the Blackfeet:

Many circumstances have transpired to induce a belief that the British traders (Hudson Bay Company) are exciting the Indians against us, to either drive us from that quarter, or reap with the Indian the fruit of our labor. I was in hopes the British Indian traders had some bounds to their rapacity. I was in hopes that during the late Indian war, in which they were so instrumental in the indiscriminate massacre of our people, that they were completely satisfied with our blood; but it appears not to have been the case. They ravage our fields and are unwilling we should glean them. Like the greedy wolf, they devour our flesh, then quarrel over the bones. Although barred by the Treaty of Ghent from participating in our Indian trade, they presume to do so. Alarmed at the individual enterprise of our people, they are exciting the Indians against them. They furnish them with the instruments of death and a passport to our bosoms.

It is not pleasant to refer to the perfidious character of these British traders, who forgetful of the gratitude they owed to the Government of the United States for tacitly permitting them to trade in the country, endeavored to provoke the deadly hostility of these savage nations upon the Americans by insidiously arousing their jealousy and anger somewhat as Iago played upon the confiding trust of the honest Othello. These Hudson's Bay emissaries knew what the effect of their teachings would be—they knew it meant the massacre of American traders, and they were just as guilty of these murders as if they had personally wielded the instruments of destruction or participated in the cruel tortures which the savages resorted to. They were accessories before the fact. They planned the diabolical outrages, then viewed their bloody enactment with gratification, from a safe refuge. To what depths of sordid diabolism had the greed for wealth sunk the governors and subjects of the Hudson's Bay oligarchy. The summary punishment of these Ankarée Indians was designed more to impress them and all the tribes with the power and authority of the United States than as a punishment. The British traders had never missed an opportunity to belittle the authority of this Government with the Indians and to weaken their allegiance and alienate their friendship until it had become a serious question whether an American trader was safe in the country. The fur trade was one that had then engaged millions of American capital and thousands of American citizens and must be protected, and the Indians taught that the Great Father was in fact the ruler as well as the owner of the soil and could punish as well as protect them. The Ashley difficulty was only one of many that was laid at the door of British intrigue and intermeddling.

FIRST INDIAN PEACE COMMISSION

In 1825 the first Indian peace commission was formed under Brig. Gen. H. Atkinson, of the United States Army, and the superintendent of Indian affairs on the Upper Missouri, Benjamin O'Fallon, who was resident agent at Fort Atkinson, a few miles above the present City of Omaha. The commission rendezvoused at Council City, near Council Bluffs, and had, in addition to its commander and O'Fallon, A. L. Langham, secretary; also Colonel Leavenworth, Maj. S. W. Kearney and Maj. Daniel Ketcham; Capt. Wm. Armstrong, Capt. Benj. Riley, Capt. John Gantt, Capt. G. C. Spencer, Capt. R. B. Mason, R. H. H. Stuarling, James W. Kingsbury, Levi Huney, Thomas Neel, J. H. Enger, M. W. Batman, Thos. P. Guynne, Geo. C. Huwer and W. Harris; Surgeon John Gale; Adjutants S. Wryz, and R. M. Coleman. Also William Day, A. S. Miller, G. H. Kennerly and P. Wilson, Indian agents; Antoine, Joseph and Pierre Garreau, interpreters; Edward Rose, Colin Campbell and Touissant Chaeneau, guides and interpreters. The escort was composed of 476 men. The expedition had a fleet of eight large boats, rigged with all the appliances for sailing, rowing and towing, and of sufficient capacity to accommodate the entire force and its equipment and provisions. A troop of forty mounted men traveled along the river bank. The expedition left Council City about the middle of May, 1825, and proceeded without unusual event to the village of the Ponca Indians at the mouth of the Niobrara River, where a grand council was held and a treaty of amity concluded.

The next stopping place was at Fort Lookout, near the present Town of Chamberlain, where a treaty of peace was made with representatives of three tribes of the Sioux, the Yanktons, Yanktonnais and Tetons, who had assembled for the purpose, having been gathered together by advance agents of the commission.

This treaty acknowledged the sovereignty of the United States and the right and authority of the Government to regulate all trade and intercourse with them. The United States agreed to receive the Indians into its friendship and afford them protection, and to have due regard for their welfare and to extend to them such assistance as might be necessary for their well-being. The Government agreed to designate certain points in the territory of these tribes where all trade and barter with the Indians should be carried on; and the Indians agreed to trade with none but licensed traders who were American citizens, and who were licensed to trade by the United States; the Indians agreeing to protect the property of such traders, and their persons and those employed by them; and the Indians further promised to arrest any foreigner found trading among them or making an effort to trade, or any unlicensed person, and to deliver such persons to the Indian agents or to the military power. The Indians further agreed to afford safe and a speedy conduct to all persons who may have occasion to pass over their country, having authority from the Government so to do, and to protect all agents of the Government sent to reside among them. The treaty further provided:

That the friendship which is now established between the United States and the Yankton, Yanktonnais and Tetons bands of Indians shall not be annulled by any act of individuals, and it is agreed that for any injuries done by individuals, no private revenge or retaliation shall take place, but instead thereof complaint shall be made by the party to the superior agent of Indian affairs or other person appointed by the President; and it shall be the duty of the chiefs upon complaint being made, to deliver up the person or persons against whom the complaint is made, to the end that he or they may be punished agreeably to the laws of the United States. And if any offense, or robbery, or murder, shall be committed by any white person on any Indian belonging to the bands who are parties hereto, the person committing shall be punished, when found guilty, the same as if the offense had been committed against a white person. And it is agreed that the chiefs of the tribes here represented shall, to the utmost of their power, exert themselves to recover horses or other property, which shall be stolen or wrongfully taken from any citizen of the United States, by any individual of said tribes; and the property when recovered shall be turned over to the agent or person authorized to receive it, in order that it may be restored to its owner. The United States further guarantees to indemnify the Indians of said tribes, in full, for all losses of horses or other property that may be stolen from them by persons who are citizens of the United States; Provided, That said property cannot be recovered, and that proof is furnished of a satisfactory character, showing that the offense was committed by a citizen of the United States. And said Teton, Yankton and Yanktonnais bands of Indians agree to deliver up to the said United States authorities, when so required, any white man resident among them. And the chiefs and warriors of said tribes engage, on behalf of their respective tribes, that they will never furnish guns, ammunition, or other implements of war, either by trade, exchange, or as presents, to any nation or tribe of Indians not in amity with the United States Government.

Done at Fort Lookout, near the Three Rivers of the Sioux Pass, this 22d day of June, A. D. 1825, and of the independence of the United States the forty-ninth. In testimony whereof, the said commissioners, Henry Atkinson and Benjamin O'Fallon, and the chiefs, headmen and warriors of the Teton, Yankton, and Yanktonnais bands of Sioux Indians, have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals.

Following this, treaties of like tenor were made with other Sioux tribes, namely: the Cheyennes, Ogalallas, Arickarees and Uncpapas; when the expedition proceeded up the river, halting at Bad River, Cheyenne, and the Arickaree villages, as far as the mouth of the Yellowstone, from which point it retraced its journey without incident to Fort Atkinson. It must be added to the great credit of the Indians who were parties to these treaties that they observed their agreements with almost scrupulous fidelity, better, if anything, particularly in promptness than did the agents of the Government in many cases and gave little occasion for complaint up to the time when in 1854, the unfortunate and avoidable trouble at Fort Laramie gave occasion for the Harney expedition, the Battle of Ash Hollow in Nebraska, the march to the Missouri, and the establishment of Fort Randall.

The Dakotah nation of Indians while they were the most warlike and the most dreaded of all the Missouri Indian tribes, seem to have abstained from any serious quarrel with the whites during the period of time covered by the first half of the nineteenth century. It would seem that their hostility was finally awakened near the beginning of the latter half of that period by the steady encroachment of the whites upon their domain when they began to realize that the aggressions of civilization were imperilling their freedom and restricting them of liberties that had been theirs for generations.

In the year 1838, Professor Nicollet, a famous French geologist, with John C. Fremont, celebrated in the annals of this country as the "Pathfinder," afterward, in 1856, the first candidate of the newly formed republican party for the office of President, visited parts of Minnesota and the famous Red Pipestone Quarry. On this scientific exploring trip an inspection was made of the region east of the St. James River, and Fremont gave names to a number of lakes, including Lake Benton, Lake Preston and Lake Poinsett, in honor of the secretary of war. Benton was a senator from Missouri, and Preston a senator from North Carolina. In 1839 a second expedition was undertaken, the purpose being to explore the Dakota country west of the James River, and particularly the James River Valley north. It was headed by Professor Nicollet, with Fremont as topographical engineer and under the direction of the War Department. The party journeyed by the Missouri River, having chartered Choteau's pioneer steamboat, the Antelope, and left St. Louis early in May.

At Fort Pierre the party abandoned their boat, made their necessary preparations and struck across the plains, reaching the James River near the Dirt Lodges (near Ashton, Spink County), thence north to the source of the stream near Devil's Lake, returning through Minnesota to St. Paul.

CHAPTER IX

FIRST WHITE OCCUPATION OF DAKOTA—CAPTAIN TODD

BEGINNING OF WHITE OCCUPATION OF DAKOTA—SIOUX WAR OF 1855—HARNEY'S MILITARY EXPEDITION AND MARCH TO THE MISSOURI—FORT PIERRE PURCHASED—HIS FIRST GARRISON BY STEAMBOATS—HARNEY'S DISAPPOINTMENT AND INDEMNATION POST NOT SUITED FOR MILITARY PURPOSES—FORT RANDALL LOCATED—FORT CONSTRUCTED—FORT PIERRE ABANDONED—CAPTAIN TODD.

It was comparatively a trifling incident that led to the military expedition under General Harney, which marched from the Platte to Fort Pierre in 1855, and built the military post at Fort Randall, in 1856, bringing with it the men under whose auspices and direction the treaty of cession with the Yankton Indians was to be made, the Territory of Dakota as a political organization erected, and the early years of its career directed. The lands would have been ceded and the territory duly organized had not this incident occurred; but the individuals who composed the pioneers of the Missouri Slope and of Dakota would not have been those who are mentioned in these pages. What a world of difference this would have meant to many who, as they survey the past, and recall the peculiar circumstances and influences that led their steps hither.

In 1853 a hunting village of the Minneconjoux Indians, a tribe of the Sioux, or Dakotah Nation, was established near Fort Laramie on the north fork of the Platte River, on the bank opposite the fort. Two of the young Minneconjoux braves who had visited the fort were detained at the ferry crossing for some trifling reason, and to show their displeasure discharged their guns into the air. They then returned to their village, but they had committed an offense for which the commandant of the fort deemed it necessary to call them to account, and the commander of a fort on the western plains at that day embodied all authority. He could do unwise things without objection or hindrance, and so Lieutenant Fleming, with a squad of soldiers, was sent over to the Indian village to demand the two young braves. The chief at the village told Fleming that the young men were not there at the time; but Fleming refused to believe him, and became so incensed because they were not immediately delivered up, that he ordered his soldiers to fire upon the Indians, which they did, killing three outright. There were a hundred Indians in the camp at the time, but they refrained from retaliating, and Fleming seized a couple of young bucks and took them back to the fort as prisoners. This atrocity laid the foundation for "bad blood." It also incited a desire to emulate Fleming's uncalled for and brutal assault in the breast of Lieutenant Grattan, a young officer who had graduated at West Point during the year, and had been ordered to duty at Laramie. When he heard of Fleming's exploit, he expressed a wish to be sent on a similar errand so that he could win some renown. The time came all too soon for the young lieutenant.

In the following summer (1854) the same tribe of Minneconjoux, with another of about equal numbers, were in camp on the Platte, about eight miles below the fort, waiting for the Government to bring them some annuity goods that they were in need of, and anxious to receive, in order that they might get away on their summer hunting expedition. The agent was long delayed and the Indians began to suffer for supplies. Just at this time a Mormon emigrant passed the Indian camp, having in his outfit a lame cow, which he left behind, evidently intending to abandon her. One of the Indians shot the animal, and he and his friends appeased their hunger. In some way this shooting of the cow was reported at the fort, probably by the Mormon, and it was looked upon as a grave offense for the Indians to shoot an animal belonging to an emigrant. The Indian chief "Bear" went up to the fort to explain the circumstances of the shooting. Lieutenant Fleming was in command, and he told Bear that the only way to settle the matter was to surrender the offender. Bear asked for a little time and went back to the camp, which at this time had received large accessions from other bands who were to unite with the Minneconjoux in their summer hunt, and now numbered all the way from one thousand to fifteen hundred lodges, with women and children. The following morning the offending Indian not being produced, young Lieutenant Grattan, who had expressed his ambition to imitate Fleming's conduct at the Indian village the year before, applied to the commander for the privilege of leading an expedition against the Sioux camp and securing the offending Indian. Fleming gave him an order for seventeen men, and Grattan managed to increase the number by volunteers to thirty-one, well armed and supported by two howitzers. Arriving at the Indian camp Grattan should have realized the danger of any hostile act when he found himself and his small party confronted by over one thousand Sioux warriors who were in the camp. Grattan demanded the immediate surrender of the offending Indian who had shot the lame cow, and when he did not appear Grattan ordered his men to fire. At the same time old Bear, the chief, urged the Indians not to fire on the whites.

The next minute Bear fell mortally wounded by Grattan's soldiers. This maddened the Indians, who rushed upon Grattan's little force and in five minutes, he, with every man of his command, lay dead upon the ground. This event started a conflagration of great proportions. It was reported to the war department that the Indians had treacherously turned murderers and without provocation had massacred a company of United States troops while in the performance of duty. Dispatches were sent to the secretary of war, and that official called upon Congress for authority to raise four regiments of cavalry. Exaggerated and grossly incorrect accounts of the terrible occurrence were printed in the newspapers, and suddenly and without warning a war against the Sioux of Western Nebraska was inaugurated.

The Indians realized that they would be punished as soon as troops could be sent against them, and a portion of the reckless ones abandoned the Platte and fled to the headwaters of the White River and the south fork of the Cheyenne, donned their war paint and committed some depredations upon exposed emigrants. Red Leaf, a brother of Bear, had succeeded to the leadership, and was in command of the war parties. The Government regarded the whole Sioux Nation as having voluntarily and wilfully declared hostilities and the war department made preparations accordingly. The following summer (1855) General Harney, the ablest and most successful of our generals in Indian warfare, was ordered to lead an expedition against the hostiles. He assembled a strong force and met the Sioux on the north fork of the Platte and completely defeated them so that they were glad to sue for peace on any terms. He killed eighty-six of the Indians and wounded seventy others, his own loss being five soldiers. Harney's victory was followed by a treaty of amity which promised to the Indians liberal annuities so long as they observed its provisions faithfully. This battle of Harney's was known as the Battle of "Ash Hollow."

With this accomplished, General Harney, in obedience to instructions, set out for the Missouri River, blazing the first trail from the head of the North Platte by way of the White and the south fork of the Big Cheyenne to Bad River, striking the Missouri River at Fort Pierre late in the fall of 1855.

Corroborating the opinion held by many of the commissioned military men of the Harney expedition, and to some extent entertained by the general himself, that this Ash Hollow conflict might have been avoided had the general followed the dictates of his own judgment instead of the influences of a council of war composed largely of young men, an excerpt from a letter, written in 1885 by Colonel Carlin, of the Fourteenth Infantry, is here copied, giving an account of his adventures while a young lieutenant, during a march with his company in the spring of 1855 from Jefferson Barracks, Missouri, to Fort Laramie. After relating many interesting incidents of the long trip by river and overland, during a portion of the journey in the company of Captain Todd, the troops reached Fort Laramie. Colonel Carlin then relates the Ash Hollow incident, in which he participated:

BATTLE OF ASH HOLLOW

The troops at Forts Kearney and Laramie were subject to the orders of General Harney, and constituted part of the Sioux expedition. "Ash Hollow" is a wide and deep canyon near the Platte River on the old emigrant road passing up the Platte via Fort Laramie. It was across the Platte from Ash Hollow that Little Thunder's band of Sioux Indians were encamped in August, 1855, when General Harney was moving his command to Fort Laramie. The Indians did not seem to expect an attack, or to fear one, and made no demonstration against the troops. It was notorious, however, that the Sioux had been on the warpath since the previous year, when they had killed Lieutenant Grattan, of the Sixth Infantry, and about thirty men who had constituted his command.

Harney was sent out with his troops to punish the Sioux for this massacre. But when he arrived at Ash Hollow and saw Little Thunder's camp before him, he did not at first feel called on to attack the Indians. Such, at least, was the current report of that day. It was his idea that he ought to parley with Little Thunder and have an understanding of his status towards the Government and the white people. There were, however, two officers under his command, one of whom was on his staff, who combatted this idea with all their force and energy. Major Winship, paymaster, was one of them. Capt. Henry Heth, Tenth Infantry, was the other. The report of that day was that Harney was persuaded by Winship and Heth, against his own inclinations and judgment, to attack the camp. It was done. Many women and children were killed and wounded. Doubtless some warriors were killed also. Spotted Tail, since so famous, was in the fight. He was the son of Little Thunder. There was very little said about this affair outside of military circles, and there were many officers of the expedition that did not approve of the attack.

It was soon after this affair that a small force, one company of infantry and thirty men additional, with a little mountain howitzer, the latter detachment under my command, were ordered to proceed under my command to Fort Pierre, in charge of a wagon train. Fort Pierre was on the Missouri River, 325 miles northeast of Fort Laramie. Fort Pierre had for many years previously been an Indian trading post, and had but recently been purchased from the American Fur Company by the war department. It had been just garrisoned by a few companies of the Second Infantry, and was a part of Harney's command. It was his destination for the winter of 1855-56. The wagon train which Capt. C. S. Lovell's command was to escort to Fort Pierre was for the use of Harney's expedition. The march was made in September and October, 1855, through the very heart of the Sioux country, and yet we marched to Fort Pierre and back to Fort Laramie without seeing an Indian. Our route lay across the famous "Mauvais Terres," or Bad Lands. It was interesting to me as I was eager to see new regions, notwithstanding the general monotony of the scenery everywhere between the Missouri and the mountains.

At Fort Pierre I first met Capt. Nathaniel Lyon, Second Infantry, afterwards General Lyon, whom I have ever regarded as the best and bravest soldier and one of the brightest men intellectually that I have ever known. He died too early in the great war for the good of his country, and for his own reputation. If he had lived he would have won fame second to none in the great conflict. He was one of the few men who figured in the great conflict. I saw Lyon once after this visit to Fort Pierre. It was in St. Louis. He and Lieut. Charles Griffin, of the artillery (afterwards General Griffin), were together. They invited me to take a walk southward on Fourth Street. We walked from the Planter's House down to the court house. A great auction sale was in progress at the time. A gentleman of well known name had raised a house and his slaves had to go to the auction block. Among them was a child, one of the number of the family sold about sixty years of age. She was bid out for $300. This was the last sale of human beings I had ever witnessed. I had read "Uncle Tom's Cabin," Wendell Phillips' speeches, and William Lloyd Garrison's harangues, but had never fully realized the true character of the institution of slavery till I witnessed the public sale of this family. Lyon and Griffin, I found, were both interested in the question, both strong anti-slavery men, and both really believed that a great conflict was soon to come, and were both fully convinced that the disunionists would be defeated in the end. Both of these brave men lived to see their conviction verified as to the conflict, but Lyon was too daring to live to the end of it. He died at Wilson's Creek, leading a regiment, when he was the commander of an army.

UNION SENTIMENT IN THE ARMY

The winter of 1865-66 was a hard one at Laramie. There were more than twenty young officers who had been compelled to pass the winter there away from their proper commands, in consequence of heavy snows which had interrupted all travel. We had no mails after November till the following spring. There was no amusement except such as cards afforded. It is probable that many young men took their first lessons in draw poker that winter. In those days the slavery question dominated all others in the arena of politics. Officers were discussing the question with each other, and the question of disunion was often referred to. I do not remember hearing any officer, even of southern birth, advocate secession or disunion. At the same time hardly one ever admitted the possibility of a republican President being elected. But I remember one circumstance that occurred that winter that showed how deeply some southern statesmen were interesting themselves at that time in the question of war and of the part the army officers would take in it. It was common rumor that a certain officer of southern birth had questioned his associates with whom he was intimate, on the subject, and endeavored to ascertain which side they would espouse in the event of an attempted dissolution of the Union. This officer subsequently became a prominent Confederate general and was already a reputed favorite of Jefferson Davis. I remember only one reply made to the inquirer by a northern born officer. It was in effect that he would go with the North, as it was certain that the North would pay best; that they had all the wealth of the country and would use it for the protection of their interests and their cause. This was doubtless a selfish view to take of the matter, but it was then only a speculative question, and no one should be held responsible literally for the utterance, which may have been a jesting way of postponing a decision. When the time did come the officer referred to remained true to the Union.

THE PURCHASE OF FORT PIERRE

It seems necessary to digress at this point and return to the beginning of this campaign in order to explain some matters in connection with this march to the Missouri and Fort Pierre. In preparing the plan of the campaign the war department considered that the army's operations would be confined to the country north of the Platte River in Nebraska, east of the Black Hills, south of the Cheyenne River, and west of the Missouri River in Dakota. That not more than seven thousand Indians would be encountered and that it was advisable to have a decisive engagement with the whole body rather than permit them to break up into small detachments; and to this end three rendezvous for troops and depots of supplies were established, viz: at Fort Kearney, and Fort Laramie, Nebraska, and the third at some point on the Missouri River between the White and Cheyenne rivers, in the vicinity of Fort Pierre. As the department had no reliable information regarding Fort Pierre, which at the time was a fur trading post that had stood the wear and tear of time and tempest for twenty-five years, the quartermaster general at Washington about the last of March, 1855, instructed Major Vinton, the quartermaster at St. Louis, to obtain the most reliable information possible as to the suitability of Fort Pierre Chateau, at the mouth of Bad River, for a depot of supplies. Major Vinton seems to have had the means of securing the information desired with little delay, for on the thirtieth of the same month he sent a rough draft of Fort Pierre to Washington accompanying it with a report stating that he had conversed with Mr. John B. Sarpy, the active partner of the firm of P. Choteau, Jr., & Company, and from the conversation he gathered that Fort Pierre was not a suitable post for a depot of supplies for any considerable force. He says the fort itself is small and is located in the "mauvaise terre" (Bad Lands) where for hundreds of miles there is no grass that can be made into hay; no good ground for corn and fodder and no fuel for twenty miles; and although his opinion is very unfavorable he feels compelled to state that there is no other point on the river more eligible.

A few days later, however, Mr. Vinton had met a Mr. Picotte, probably the Yankton pioneer and an old employee of the American Fur Company, from whom he received a statement that flatly contradicted that of Mr. Sarpy, and this statement Mr. Vinton sent forward to the quartermaster general. Picotte's statement seems to have agreed with the views held by the war department officials, who at once resolved to secure Fort Pierre, and on the 13th day of April an agreement was made between Charles Gratiot, representing the firm of P. Choteau, Jr., & Co. and Quartermaster General Jesup of the United States army, whereby Choteau was to sell to the United States the "trading establishment on the Missouri River, known as Fort Pierre," for $45,000, together with the buildings within and around the picket of the fort and the lumber and material, as well as an island in the vicinity, and give possession by the 1st of June, 1855.

The orders for the movement of the Harney expedition were issued March 23, 1855, and provided that four companies of the Second Infantry at Carlisle Barracks, Pennsylvania, and two from Fort Riley, should proceed up the Missouri River in boats and establish a military post near Fort Pierre. This was a few days before the old trading post was purchased. The remainder of the expedition, consisting of about one thousand troops, dragoons, infantry and artillery, gathered at Forts Kearney and Laramie, in Nebraska, where the hostilities were to be punished. Owing to those impediments to navigation for which the Missouri was notorious, coupled with the mistakes of the officials in selecting unsuitable boats for the upper river channel, a great deal of difficulty and vexatious delays were experienced in getting the troops and supplies to their destination. One boat, the Australia, sank in nine feet of water. Two boats, the William Baird and Grey Cloud, were purchased by the Government on account of their light draught, but both were compelled to discharge part of their cargo at Niobrara and again at White River, taking the remainder to Fort Pierre and then returning for the portions left at these points.

The first boat to reach Fort Pierre was the Arabia, July 7th, carrying Company G, of the Second Infantry, numbering 100 officers and soldiers. A few days later the Grey Cloud reached the landing with eighty-two men of Company A and supplies and the William Baird with eighty-four men of Company I, under command of Capt. Henry W. Wessels, Second Infantry. During the following week Maj. W. R. Montgomery, the regimental commander, and Major Gains, of the pay department, Capt. P. T. Turnley of the quartermaster department, Captain Simpson, commissary of subsistence, Asst. Surg. T. C. Madison and Lieut. G. K. Warren, of the topographical engineers, arrived. These officers formed the first military officials of Fort Pierre with Major Montgomery in command.

On the 2nd day of August, Capt. Nathaniel Lyon, with Company B, Second Infantry, thirty-seven men, and Company C, thirty-five men, arrived on the steamboat Clara, and on the 19th of August Capt. William M. Gardner, with two officers and eighty men, arrived on the steamboat Genoa.

This garrison was the furthest advanced of any that had been sent to the frontiers, its distance from St. Louis being given at 1,525 miles. The nearest postoffice at that time was Council Bluffs, though one was established at Sargent's Bluffs and Sioux City that winter.

The military officers were very much dissatisfied with Fort Pierre. A council was held to inspect the place and found the whole establishment in "bad order, bad condition and bad repair," the buildings so dilapidated that they would have to be rebuilt—everything in fact nearly worthless, and estimated that it would require $22,000 to put the establishment in anything like the conditions called for under the agreement of purchase. Maj. Chas. E. Galpin was there as the agent of Choteau to turn over the property. In replying to the complaint, he said his company was selling a trading post, not a military post—that it was all it had been represented to be. Finally the government paid the $45,000 agreed upon.

General Harney with his command, consisting of four companies of the Second Dragoons, five companies of the Sixth Infantry, one of the Tenth Infantry and Light Battery G, of the Fourth Artillery, arrived on the 19th of October, 1855, expecting to go into winter quarters at Pierre. The troops that had previously reached there by river were the six companies of the Second Infantry. Recognizing the impossibility of wintering this force at Pierre, General Harney sent four companies of the Second Infantry under Major Wessels to a point five miles above on the east bank to establish a winter camp. The two other companies of the Second with two troops of the dragoons were sent to a point eighteen miles above, also on the east, under Captain Gardner, who established Camp Miller; four companies of the Sixth Infantry under Major Cady to a point ten miles above, named Camp Bacon; and Major Howe with a troop of dragoons and fifty men of the Second Infantry to a point far below between the White River and the Niobrara, where they established Camp Canfield. The whole number of officers and men in the command was given at 900. General Harney's reports to headquarters exhibit the utmost dissatisfaction with nearly everything that had been done by the Missouri division of his expedition. He finds at Pierre neither grass, nor fuel, nor accommodations, and after enumerating a number of unfortunate things, concludes by stating that the most unfortunate of all was the absence of an officer of energy, experience and industry.

After disposing of his forces as best he could, the general set about finding a suitable location for a permanent military post, although he had been directed to cause a military reservation to be laid off about Fort Pierre. This duty he intrusted to Lieut. G. K. Warren of the Topographical Engineer Corps, who went ahead and surveyed out an area of 270 square miles, or about 175,000 acres, in order to secure about ten thousand acres of good timber and hay land, but the commander had determined that Pierre was not the place for the permanent post and the following winter and spring of 1856 were employed in reconnoitering the river for a suitable location. Fort Lookout on the west bank, near the present town of Chamberlain, was at one time decided upon and was occupied during the winter as headquarters, and arrangements for the removal of the buildings at Fort Pierre to that post were partially made; when in the month of June Harney discovered a site on the west bank of the Missouri thirty miles above the mouth of the Niobrara River that met his requirements, and notified the War Department of his selection, suggesting that the post be named Fort Randall as a token of respect to the memory of Daniel Randall, late a colonel and paymaster general of the army. This disposed of this very important affair, which had occupied the attention of the commanding general for nearly eight months. In the meantime the troops that had come in with the expedition had been quartered at various points and had been subject to frequent assignments caused by the difficulty of procuring supplies and not from any hostility on the part of the Indian tribes, who were perfectly disposed to peace.

Fort Lookout, though deemed to be lacking in the requirements for a permanent military post, became the temporary abode of numerous bodies of troops during the years 1856 and 1857 and Fort Pierre with a strong garrison remained headquarters during the same period. Capt. Nathaniel Lyon was in command at Fort Lookout. Fort Randall, however, was designed to be the permanent military post and depot of supplies for all the Upper Missouri country. When completed it seemed to form the final link in the chain of military establishments that partly encircled the frontier of the Northwest. Fort Leavenworth had been built in 1827 and seems to have supplied all that was necessary in the way of a depot of supplies for twenty years, when in 1848, Fort Kearney, in Nebraska, was erected, probably demanded by the increasing Mormon emigration and commerce between the States and Salt Lake. This was followed a year later by the Government purchasing the American Fur trading post on the North Fork of the Platte River called Fort Laramie, which was converted into a strong military post. About 1852 Fort Ridgely, at the head of the Minnesota River, was established, and Fort Riley at the junction of the Smoky Hill and Republican rivers in Kansas was built. It would seem that a depot of supplies, with a suitable garrison, should have been established in this Upper Missouri country long before the coming of General Harney, but it was not done, though frequently recommended by military men even as far back as the period of Lewis and Clark's exploration, so that Fort Randall became the first military establishment on the Upper Missouri country, and was designed to furnish the link which completed the chain from Fort Ridgely in Minnesota around by way of Laramie to Riley and Leavenworth, and while it was the last of the old frontier forts it was the first of a new line of forts to follow in a few years along the Missouri River reaching to Fort Benton.

About the last of June, 1856, the first troops reached the site of Fort Randall. They consisted of eighty-four recruits of the Second Infantry under command of Lieut. George H. Pauge, regimental quartermaster, and First Lieut. D. S. Stanley, of the First Cavalry, who laid out the fort and built the first barracks. In August following, companies C and I of the Second Infantry and D, C, H and K of the Second Dragons reached there, commanded by Col. Francis Lee, of the Second Infantry, and formed the first garrison of the post with Colonel Lee in command.

In the spring of 1857 Fort Pierre was practically abandoned as a military post and its military stores removed to Fort Randall on the steamboat D. H. Morton, which had been sent up the river for this purpose. The fur trading firm of D. M. Frost & Co. of St. Louis, who had been trading at Pierre and at other points in the upper country, was given charge of the United States property, consisting principally of the buildings and material at Fort Pierre and also at Fort Lookout, which had likewise been abandoned. Maj. Charles E. Galpin, who was in the employ of the American Fur Company at the time, took the contract for taking down and removing a portion of the buildings at Pierre and Lookout to Fort Randall. In this he was assisted by Mr. Dupuis, an independent trader, and so much interested in the improvements begun in that year at Yankton that he selected enough of the best cedar logs from the old fort at Pierre to make a raft and floated them down to Yankton, where they were used in the construction of the first trading post for Frost, Todd & Company.

Fort Pierre was continued as the abode of a small force of troops under command of Captain Lovell, Company A, Second Infantry. Capt. Alfred Sully, Company F, of the same regiment had marched across the plains in 1856, from Fort Ridgely, Minnesota, to Fort Pierre, and with Lovell's forces formed the Fort Pierre garrison until 1858, when the post was altogether abandoned and Sully returned to Fort Ridgely or Fort Abercrombie in Dakota. Captain John B. S. Todd of Company A, Sixth Infantry, who came with General Harney, remained at Fort Pierre during the winter of 1855-6, and resigned his commission on the 16th day of September, 1856, to take up a business career. He was appointed sutler at Fort Randall immediately after quitting the army, at which time, 1856, the firm of Frost, Todd & Co. was organized at Sioux City.

At the breaking out of the War of the Rebellion in 1861, Fort Randall was garrisoned by five companies of the Fourth Regiment of Artillery under the command of Lieut.-Col. John Monroe. In May of that year three companies of the command were sent East to be used in putting down the insurrection of the seceding states, leaving but two companies under Capt. John A. Brown, of Maryland, in command of the post. And these were now the only troops left of all of Harney's forces in this upper country. They had been withdrawn and distributed at various frontier posts, by the secretary of war, John B. Floyd, known to be in sympathy with the rebellious states, and a very large proportion of the officers had already cast their fortunes with the Confederacy. Captain Brown, who was in command at Randall, was inclined to favor the Union cause, but it is said that he was influenced by the tie of marriage and against his inclinations, to join the Confederates. He left the post without permission and the next heard of him was his resignation sent to Washington from the South, in July. Fort Randall was thus left in command of Second Lieut. T. R. Tammatt, of the Fourth Artillery, the only commissioned officer at the post. This officer was a staunch Union man and remained in charge of the post until the following winter. The post was surrounded by Indians whose loyalty to the Government had been seriously impaired by the counsel and influence of agents of the South and the disloyal military officers who had been stationed here and had frequent and unrestricted intercourse with them for several years. Tannatt conducted the public affairs very creditably, and in December, '61, was relieved by three companies of the Fourteenth Iowa Volunteers under Capt. Bradley Mahana, of Iowa City. Lieutenant Tannatt and the two companies of artillery were then ordered to Louisville, Kentucky, where his companies were united to form a light battery and as such performed most heroic and valuable service for the Union cause.

While Fort Pierre, as it existed from 1832 to 1858, had been demolished, its name remained and has continued to have a local habitation up to this day, and will doubtless become more celebrated as an emporium of commerce and the seat of various institutions possibly for centuries to come. But its local habitation has been changed. The site of the old fort was abandoned when its buildings were finally demolished, but the name attached to another locality near by where Joseph La Fromboise had built a trading post, at first known as Fort La Fromboise and afterwards called Fort Pierre.

That vicinity continued to be a favorite trading ground for the Indians of the western portion of the territory, and the American Fur Company had maintained two trading posts in the neighborhood of the mouth of the Cheyenne after disposing of Fort Pierre to the Government in 1855. When the early Government agents were sent up the river to distribute gifts and pay annuities to the Indians which began with annual regularity about 1857, the principal point for assembling the Sioux on the west of the Missouri was known as Fort Pierre, but was in fact the La Fromboise post. Subsequently when the settlement of the country was so far advanced as to demand a trading center for the civilized whites, a town was laid out at the mouth of Bad River and the City of Fort Pierre has grown up there with all the attendant advantages of modern cities, including schools and churches, and has enjoyed a very prosperous career. Three of the Mathieson boys, who were among the young lads of early Yankton in the '60s, George, and Richard, were among the founders of this town, and are yet to be found among the leaders of its best enterprise. These boys including the youngest son, Robert, with their mother, were survivors of the Spirit Lake, Iowa, massacre, led by Inkapaduta, in 1857. Mr. Mathieson, the father, was killed in that dreadful slaughter.

Starting with that insignificant show of bravado by two thoughtless young Indians back at Laramie in 1853 we find the train of events leading to an Indian war, resulting in Harney's march to the Missouri, the establishment of Fort Randall, the ushering into civil life of Captain Todd, and the pioneer history of Dakota Territory has its beginning, with the Missouri Valley as the theater of the important pioneer movements leading up to the political organization of the territory, and the location of its seat of government. "Behold what a great flame a little fire kindleth."

The foregoing account of the cause of the famous Harney expedition was substantially furnished to President Franklin Pierce by an army officer, who wished to induce the President to pardon a number of the Indians who possibly would have been executed for their crimes committed during the first outbreak of hostilities. The President seemed to believe that the Indians had been "more sinned against than sinning" and granted a full pardon, restoring them to all their annuities.

And here begins the story of the opening up and settlement of the Upper Missouri Valley of Dakota. Capt. John B. S. Todd, who was destined to bear so conspicuous a part in the early history of Dakota Territory, was now in civil life, and resided at Fort Randall with his family. He had charge of the sutler's store as a member of the firm of Frost, Todd & Co., and was beginning to interest himself in those affairs which were to engage his attention during the remainder of his life.

(BY GEN. W. H. H. BEADLE, WRITTEN ABOUT 1875)

The southern part of Dakota Territory belongs to the Cretaceous group of the Mesozoic system, having shunks and Ammonites as the leading types of its fossils. A general view of Dakota's geology can be had by referring to the generally received theory of the formation of this continent. It had a regular growth. It commenced as an angulated ridge of land, between the region now occupied by the River St. Lawrence and lakes, and Hudson Bay, enclosing the latter in its obtuse angle. This gave general form to the continent, which has grown from this by a succession of upheavals, extending through a long series of ages. The Age of Molluscs saw the continent very small; all the rest an ocean. In the Age of Fishes the area was enlarged, but yet only reached the extreme northeastern and northwestern points of the United States. At the close of the Age of Reptiles the shore line included New England and extended to Trenton, N. J., inside of Delaware and Chesapeake Bay to the interior of South Carolina, and thence curving west and north to the mouth of the Ohio. The gulf extended with varying width to the north and east of the eastern base of the Rocky Mountains, which had risen from the sea. Further to the northwest it extended along what is now McKenzie River. The whole of the upper valley of the Missouri was then under the gulf, and ships could have sailed over the region now occupied by Dakota's pre-emption and homestead claims, long after the great mountain ranges had risen from Alaska to the isthmus. We find that the land grew upon the water to the south and southwest of the formative nucleus or ridge of the continent, and hence that Dakota grew from the northeast to the southwest, and from the Rocky Mountains eastward.

There is probably little to be found older than the Cretaceous unless in the Valley of the Red River of the North, and from the discovery of salt springs in that region we are led to believe that valley plows its way down to the Silurian Rocks, as the salt springs of the United States issue invariably from that formation. As the Devonian lies next to the Silurian, and the Carboniferous between the latter and the Cretaceous, it will be seen that our rocks include the possibility of coal in theory, whether present in fact or not. From the Red River Valley we pass southwest over the broad Cretaceous belt and when we cross the Missouri we enter a newer formation. This is a Tertiary; and nearly one-half of Dakota is found to be no older than the Tertiary belt along the Atlantic seaboard and the Gulf of Mexico, and not as old as most of the Pacific slope.

The part known as the Bad Lands, west of the Missouri River, belongs to the Tertiary group of the Cenozoic system, and here Nature has collected, in one desolate sepulchre, the relics of a golden age. The fossils are most interesting and remarkable. The ground on which one treads, the columns, shafts and buttresses, the monumental domes and massive walls, which characterize this strange domain of death and desolation, are strewn and filled with fossil skulls and jaws, and teeth, and thigh bones, which belonged to varied races of mammals of which scarcely a single specimen is familiar to the anatomist of the present day. Strange pachyosaurs and turtles of wonderful size, rhinoceros different from any existing, elk with canine teeth, hornless rhinoceros with jaws five feet long, and horses that united some of the characteristics of the tapir which had incisor teeth and ate either flesh or grass and chewed the cud, are some of the strange combinations shown in this grave where the slain of a great convulsion lie buried. The region in its other characteristics is true to its general nature. The water is brackish and bad. The earth is burned by the sun in summer, and cold and deathly still in winter. It is a treeless waste, and in the winter is the abode of snow and naked trees. The strange formation of the hills and general surface of the Bad Lands is the work of excavating waters, and is a phenomenon of the Post-Tertiary Age. South of this region, and near the mouth of the Yellowstone River, was a great inland sea after the Bad Lands had been drained. Around its shores roamed the rhinoceros, the elephant, the mastodon, the horse, beaver, wild cat, and wolf, with other animals now extinct. This sea changed slowly from salt to fresh, as its successive fossils show, and its bottom was finally lifted, and its waters furrowed the great Valley of the Missouri.

GENERAL JOHN B. S. TODD

First delegate to Congress from Dakota

When these successive scenes had passed came the Ice Period. The equalizing currents between the south and the polar regions were cut off by the intervening continent. The whole northern regions were covered with ice, the southern border only being free, and the expansive force of the whole body pushed this over the land with irresistible power, grinding and furrowing the rocks and covering the surface. Later the greater streams made or resumed their way, and smaller rivers and creeks cut down their varying routes, leaving the terraces, slopes and hills, with the depressions and gravelly ridges sprinkled with the limestone and granite boulders. In the parts through which streams have passed, Dakota has no lakes, but on the higher general levels between the sources of streams, we have the beautiful lake country of Minnesota and Dakota. Some of these are marshy, but the most have clear, pure water, and firm, gravelly or sandy shores.

Here are found walled lakes similar to those in Northern Iowa. These walls are of rough and irregular stones, compactly built and filled with clay and sand, giving the appearance at first of man's handicraft, but a closer examination shows them in elemental and not mechanical order. These walls are generally upon the south sides of the lakes, and are made of the same materials that are found in the bed of the lakes adjacent to them, showing that the power which set them there was the expansive force of ice, the same that acted on so grand a scale in the Glacial Period—one of those forces loosed from the right hand of God in that hour when "the morning stars sang together." A warmer age succeeded the Ice, and over this again the storms of changing seasons have waged their varying war; summer followed winter, and water, air and frost, in infinite succession, wrought their slow but mighty changes upon the surface materials. To these were added the vegetable growth, which burned or decayed, mingled with the minerals and left our finely pulverized, deep, calcareous and arenaceous soils. Our soil is excellently suited to produce cereals from the presence of much mineral and other valuable constituents.

But to return to Eastern Dakota, which, as indicated, belongs to the Cretaceous. Nearer its eastern boundary it seems to approach the Jurassic and Carboniferous, the coal measures appearing in Iowa. The Cretaceous, as its name implies, is marked by the presence of the chalk formation. This is shown in great abundance in the bluffs of the Missouri near Yankton, and at various points above, while it also appears at different points interior. At Sioux Falls, Dell Rapids, and in Davison County, are great masses of red quartzite rock, or, as some call it, red granite. It seems to be entirely without fossils. It is a very hard, unstratified rock, and is colored from a pale red to a rosy tinge. It is difficult to dress or cut, but breaks under the hammer into suitable shape for very substantial building stone. This rock is also found at other points in the territory, west, northwest and northeast of Sioux Falls, where the Big Sioux River breaks through and over the formation in a beautiful succession of rapids, cascades and falls; descending a distance of 110 feet in half a mile, forming a series of attractive pictures and a scene of wild beauty. Partly overlying the granite at Sioux Falls is a finely grained white or yellowish sandstone of a very friable texture, being easily pulverized in the hand. This does not show, however, in large amount. In the river bank above the falls, and at other places, and in considerable amount about forty miles east of north from Sioux Falls, appears the red pipestone of the Indians, so closely associated with their religious legends and traditions.

(Professor Hayden's account of his journey to and exploration of the Black Hills and Bad Lands, in 1866, will be found in the chapters devoted to the Black Hills.)

Professor Hayden furnished the following regarding a geological survey made by him of that portion of Dakota lying east and north of the Missouri River:

In October, 1866, after my return from a tour of exploration of the "Mauvaise Terres" or Bad Lands of White River, I took advantage of an opportunity that presented itself to visit some portions of Dakota Territory on the north side of the Missouri River not hitherto examined by me. I have taken as my starting point the Village of Yankton, the capital of Dakota Territory, located on the Missouri River about twelve miles above the mouth of the James. At this point we observe a large exposure of the yellow calcareous mud beds of No. 3, Niobrara division, forming along the river nearly vertical bluffs, extending sometimes several miles. The rock varies in texture from a nearly white soft chalk, much like our chalk of commerce, to a somewhat compact limestone, which is used for burning lime and for building purposes. Thick beds of this chalk present a marked rust color from the presence of a greater or less amount of peroxide of iron; otherwise it could be easily distinguished from the chalk of Europe, and without doubt would serve the same commercial purposes. The organic remains found here are not very numerous in species. The most abundant shell is the ostrea congesta Conrad, which seems to have been so numerous and to have aggregated together much in the same way as the little oyster which is common in the the tide recedes along the shores of the Sea Islands of South Carolina. Near the base of the rock there are layers of rock several feet in thickness, made up almost entirely of one or more species of inoceramus, one of which has been identified as I. problematicus. The fish remains are quite numerous, diffused throughout the rock. Fragments, consisting of jaws, fins and scales, are found in the greatest abundance, and Mr. Propper, a resident of Yankton, has succeeded in recovering some nearly perfect specimens (undescribed) from the quarries there. This group of rocks extends for 400 miles along the Missouri River, and I am convinced that when carefully studied, it will be found to represent the white chalk beds of Europe, and be employed for similar economical purposes.

The Cretaceous rocks of the Missouri River have been numbered in the order of superposition, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and all of these divisions have been located in the geological scale by the unmistakable evidence of their organic remains. We find, therefore, that this portion of Dakota is occupied exclusively, or nearly so, by the middle member of the Cretaceous series. The soft and yielding nature of No. 3 is well shown by the topographical features of the country, where all the slopes are gentle in their descent, and for the most part, covered with a thick growth of grass; for the soil, which is composed of the eroded materials of this group, is quite fertile, and in ordinary seasons produces excellent crops, and is especially adapted to the growth of cereals.

From Yankton our course was nearly north up the west side of James River. Our path led over a gently rolling prairie for sixty-five miles, with not a tree or bush to greet the eye. There were no cut bluffs along the little streams over which we passed; the sides of the hills bordering the valleys sloping at a very moderate angle and being covered with a thick growth of grass. No rocks were seen in place until we arrived at Fort James, about twelve miles below the mouth of Firesteel Creek, a branch of James River. Erratic rocks of all sizes and texture were visible on the surface everywhere, more especially in the valley of the James River and tributaries. At this point on James River, uncovered by the seeping out of the valley, is a large exposure of reddish, variegated quartzites, differing somewhat in structure and appearance from any rock hitherto observed by me in the Upper Missouri. They cover a considerable area in the valley of the James at certain localities, but nowhere are they exposed at a thickness of more than twenty or thirty feet. Indeed, they have been much worn by water, so that they project above the surface in large square masses, suggesting to one in the distance a village of log houses. The rocks are mostly reddish and flesh colored quartzites, so compact that the lines of stratification are nearly obliterated. They also appear to be metamorphic. There is, however, a horizontal as well as vertical fracture, and the horizontal fracture breaks across what appear to be original laminae of deposition. These lines or bands are seldom horizontal, but much waved and inclined, as if the materials had been deposited in shoal or troubled waters. The illustrations of ripple or wave markings in these rocks are numerous and very beautiful. There is considerable variety in the texture of the rock; some of it is a very fine, close grained quartzite, so that when worn by water it presents a smooth glistening surface like glass. Again it is filled with small water worn pebbles, forming a fine pudding stone; again there are layers of siliceous sandstone, which separate into slabs from one-fourth of an inch to several inches in thickness. This rock is very useful for building purposes, and has been employed at this point by the United States army officers in erecting the numerous buildings that constitute the fort. I looked diligently wherever the rock had been quarried for some traces of organic remains, but none were visible. Resting upon the quartzite of this locality is a bed of black plastic clay, precisely like No. 2 Cretaceous as seen along the Missouri River near the mouth of the Vermillion. I found no fossils in the rock, but there were numerous specimens of selenite in crystals, which characterize it in other localities. Reston also has the chalky marl of No. 3, not differing in structure from the same rock before described as occurring at Yankton on the Missouri River. It here contains an abundance of the characteristic fossil, ostrea congesta. Its thickness exposed is about fifty feet, but from an examination of the slope above I estimated its entire thickness at this point at from eight to one hundred feet. The formations at this locality, in descending order, are as follows: A, yellow chalky marl, No. 3; B, black plastic clay with selenite crystals, and small No. 2; C, reddish and rose colored quartzite.

From Fort James we again proceeded across the undulating prairie in a direction a little north of east, about sixty-five miles, to Fort Dakota, at Sioux Falls, on the Big Sioux River. Nothing of special interest, in a geological point of view, met our eye except a small exposure of the reddish quartzite in the valley of the Vermillion River. The soil of the prairie and the exposed and also the superficial deposits, as shown along the streams, are everywhere evidence that the surface features of all this region are due to the wearing of the rocks of the Cretaceous, Nos. 2 and 3, and that they are the immediate underlying formations. The only features which met the eye everywhere were the bluffs which cover large areas so thickly as to render cultivation impossible until they are removed. These bluffs, however, will be found to be very useful to future settlers for building and other economical purposes.

At Sioux Falls there is a small exhibition of the same red and variegated quartzites which are here exposed only in the valley of the river by the removal of the soft and yielding Cretaceous rocks. The falls are five or six in number, extending a distance of half a mile, and have a descent of one foot in all, forming the most valuable water power I have ever seen in the West. About ten feet from the top of the rocks, as seen at this locality, is a layer of Steatitic material, mottled, gray and cream color, very soft, about twelve inches thick, which is used sometimes for the manufacture of pipes and other Indian ornaments. When the quartzites have been subject to the attrition of water, they present the same smooth, glassy surface as before mentioned. There are also beds of pudding stone, and the most beautiful illustrations of wave and ripple markings that I have ever observed in my geological explorations hitherto. I was unable to discover any well defined fossils, but wherever the surfaces of the rocks had been made smooth by the attrition of the water, quite distinct rounded outlines of what appeared to be bivalve shells could be seen so numerous that the rocks must have been charged with them. The matrix is so close grained and hard that on breaking the rock no trace of the fossil could be found. I am confident, however, that the rock is filled with organic remains, but they cannot now be separated from the matrix so as to be identified.

From Sioux Falls to the celebrated Pipestone Quarry, the distance is just forty miles, measured with an odometer. Direction, a little east of north. We passed over similar undulating prairie, with but one small tree along the route, and but one rock exposure, and that occurred about four miles south of the quarry. The rock is a very hard quartzite, composed largely of water worn pebbles, quartz, jasper, small clay nodules, chalcedony; some of the rock is a quartzite sandstone, other portions fine-grained silicious rock. It lies in regular layers or beds, dipping at an angle of about five degrees thirty minutes south of east. On reaching the source of the Pipestone Creek in the valley of which the pipestone bed is located, I was surprised to see how inconspicuous a place it is. Indeed, had I not known of the existence of a rock in this locality so celebrated in this region, I should have passed it by almost unnoticed. A single glance at the red quartzites here assured me that they were of the same age with those before mentioned at James and Vermillion rivers and at Sioux Falls. The layer of pipestone is about the lowest layer of rock that can be seen. It rests upon a gray quartzite, and there is about five feet of the same gray quartzite above it, which has to be removed with great labor before the pipestone can be reached. About three hundred yards from the pipestone exposure is an escarpment, or nearly vertical wall of variegated quartzite extending directly across the valley. Each end of the wall passes from view beneath the superficial covering of the prairie. It is about a half mile in length. About a quarter of a mile farther up the valley, there is another small escarpment, so that the entire thickness of the rock exposed at this point is about fifty feet. Not a tree can be seen; only a few small bushes growing among the rocks. There is a little stream of clear, pure water flowing from the rocks, with perpendicular fall of about thirty feet, forming a beautiful cascade. The evidences of erosion were very marked, and the question arose—how could all the materials which must have once existed here joined onto those walls, have been removed, except by a stream much larger and more powerful in its erosive action than the one at present flowing here? There is a slight inclination of the beds from one to three degrees about fifteen degrees south of east. About two hundred yards southeast of the quarry are five massive boulders, composed of a very coarse feldspathic granite, very much like that which forms the nucleus of the Black Hills.

The pipestone layer, as seen at this point, is about eleven inches in thickness, only about two and a quarter inches of which are used for manufacturing pipes and other ornaments. The remainder is too impure, slaty, fragile, etc. This rock possesses almost every color and texture, from a light cream to a deep red, depending upon the amount of peroxide of iron. Some portions of it are soft, with a soapy feel, like steatite; others slaty, breaking into thin flakes; others mottled with red and gray. A ditch, from four to six feet wide and about five hundred yards in length, extending partly across the valley of Pipestone Creek, reveals what has thus far been done in excavating the rock. There are indications of an unusual amount of labor on the part of Indians, in former years, to secure the precious material. This is the only locality from whence the true pipestone can be obtained, and the labor is so great in throwing off the five feet of solid quartzite that rests upon it, that the rock has always been rare. For a mile or two before reaching the quarry, the prairie is strewn with fragments cast away by pilgrims. Nearly all our writers on Indian history have mistook this place with a number of legends or myths. They have represented the locality as having been known to the Indians from remote antiquity. All these notions, I am convinced, will disappear before the light of a careful investigation of the facts. It is quite probable that the rock has not been known to the Indians more than eighty or one hundred years, and perhaps not even as long a period. I could not find a trace of a stone implement in the vicinity, nor could I hear that any had ever been found; and, indeed, nothing could be seen that would lead one to suppose that the place had been visited for over fifty years. All the excavations could have been made within that time. There are many rude iron tools scattered about, and some of them were taken out of the ditch last summer in a complete state of oxidation. Again, it does not appear that in the mounds opened in the Mississippi Valley so extensively, any trace of this rock has ever been found. It is well known that the pipe is the most important of the dead Indian's possessions, and is almost invariably buried with the body, and if a knowledge of this rock had extended to the stone age, it is almost certain that some indications of it would have been found in the light in the vast number of mounds that have been opened in the valley of the Mississippi.

Wares and other ornaments made from Steatite have been in use among Indians from the earliest periods of their history, and they are still manufactured from this material on the Missouri.

Regarding the age of these rocks described above, Professor Hayden accepted the opinion of Professor Hall, who had given the matter elaborate investigation by personal visits to many points in Minnesota and Dakota, and who concluded that they were of the same age with the Huronian rocks of Canada and Lake Superior.

THE PRINCIPAL RIVERS

The Missouri River is probably the longest navigable river in the United States, the distance from its mouth, twenty-five miles above St. Louis, to Fort Benton, the practical head of navigation, being not far from 3,185 miles. Its principal tributaries in Dakota from the north and east, are the Big Sioux, the Vermillion and James rivers, Choteau, and Medicine creeks, the Little Cheyenne, and Swan in South Dakota, and the Beaver, Apple, Turtle Valley, Snake and Pride creeks, and the Little Knife, White Earth* and Little Muddy and Milk rivers, in North Dakota. From the west and south it receives the waters of the Niobrara, which drains quite an area of the territory, also the Ponca, White, Bad River, Big Cheyenne, Moreau and Grand in South Dakota, and the Cannon Ball, Heart, Knife, Little Missouri; and the Yellowstone in North Dakota, the Missouri's largest tributary, being the only one of the tributary streams navigable. The Missouri is navigable for ordinary steamboats during the boating season to the Great Falls, Montana, from the beginning of April and frequently from the middle of March to the last of October. Its peculiar and objectionable feature to steamboat men is the frequent shifting that takes place in its channel, owing to the quicksands which compose the bed of the river.

The Red River of the North is, next to the Missouri, the largest river in Dakota, rising north of Lake Traverse, South Dakota, near the eastern boundary between North and South Dakota, and flowing almost due north to its outlet in Lake Winnipeg, Manitoba.

The Red River of the North is navigable as far south as Fargo, and steamboats have ascended during the '60s, to Breckinridge and Wahpeton, in favorable seasons. It forms the boundary between Minnesota and Dakota north of the 46th parallel, to the international boundary, and runs nearly due north. The valley of this stream is one of the largest and most fertile in the world. Its average width from east to west is from fifty to sixty miles, and its average length from north to south in Minnesota and Dakota is about two hundred and thirty miles. This valley is divided about equally between Minnesota and Dakota; one-half being east and one-half west of the Red River. The valley is principally prairie, and is uniformly smooth, and very nearly level throughout its whole extent. Along the Red River there was a good supply of timber before the country was settled; the variety of timber being oak, ash, basswood and elm, and some others, but the ones enumerated predominated. It is a well watered valley; every few miles small streams of water make down from the highlands to the west, across the valley and empty into the Red River. These streams were likewise timbered with the same kind of wood.

Commencing at the 46th parallel of north latitude and traveling north along the valley, in Dakota, one will cross first the Wild Rice, coming from the southwest, then the Cheyenne, coming also from the southwest. The Cheyenne is one of the most important rivers in the northern portion of the territory and wholly within the boundaries of the territory. It rises near Devil's Lake and waters nearly a third of that section of the territory; it is skirted with fine timber for more than two hundred miles from its mouth. It is called the Cheyenne River of the North to distinguish it from the Big Cheyenne of Southern Dakota, and drains a greater area than any other of the Northern Dakota streams excepting the Red River. It rises about ten miles southwest of Fort Totten, and after coursing in and out in a southeasterly direction for about two hundred miles, river measure, it turns abruptly north from near the 46th parallel and following the general course of Red River, debouches into that parent stream a few miles below Fargo, at a point 250 miles by river south of Pembina. The valley of the Cheyenne was early noted for its luxuriant grasses, indicating a superior soil, and for its small forests of oak, hickory and walnut, which in great part were felled by the early settlers for buildings and fuel. The Cheyenne is an important historical boundary line, marking with its tributaries, in Dakota, the northeastern extremity of the Louisiana Purchase.

The River St. Jacques or James River, named by the act of Congress organizing the Territory of Dakota the "Dakota River," is over three hundred miles in length, and has its rise a few miles southwest of Devil's Lake in North Dakota; passing thence through the counties of Foster, Stutsman, La Moure and Dickey, North Dakota, it enters South Dakota a few miles west of the northeast corner of the County of Brown, passing thence through Brown, Spink, Beadle, Sanborn, a portion of Davison and Hanson, through Hutchinson, entering Yankton County near the northwest corner and running diagonally through the county, falls into the Missouri about six miles west of the southeast corner of the county. The river resembles somewhat an immense ditch excavated by artificial means, the current being broken by no falls or rapids, and its clayey banks are permanent and quite uniform in height. The windings of the stream are all long and gradual and bend with as much regularity as the windings of a canal. Occasionally the stream spreads out into the dimensions of a lake, affording ample sea room for small steamers, and the first 100 miles of the river could be easily navigated during the spring and summer when there is an average depth of water in a permanent channel of about ten feet. The uniform width of the river for about one-third of its length from its mouth, is about one hundred and fifty yards, and the water being confined within the banks moves very slowly and smoothly. The fall does not average over a foot to the mile. The bottom lands seldom equal a mile in width and are among the most fertile and productive in the United States, while the highlands bordering the valley are equally productive though lacking the depth and probably the strength and durability of the bottom soil.

While Congress has decreed that the name shall be "Dakota," one seldom hears it called by that name, and it is very probable that there are thousands of Dakotans who would not recognize the river under that title. The popular name is the "Jim" but the name "James" is used in public addresses, and by those in charge of the educational interests of the state, and also by that numerous class of estimable people who abhor a "nickname" under any guise.

The Pembina River is a favorite waterway in the extreme north and nearest of all streams to the international boundary. For more than thirty miles from its mouth, it was sparsely settled and cultivated nearly a century ago and a thriving village stood upon its banks. It runs very close to and parallel with the international boundary line, and empties its waters into the Red near where the City of Pembina, on the northern border, is situated. The soil of the valley is called a black clay loam, partly alluvial and partly a deposit of decayed vegetation. The dark surface soil is generally about two or three feet in depth. The subsoil is principally clay. The land cannot be excelled as far as native fertility and durability is concerned. It has not only the elements of extreme productiveness, but is also capable of sustaining a long cultivation without the addition of manure.

The valley through which the Cheyenne River flows is no less valuable and possibly superior in natural beauty to the Red, having a greater topographical variety. The Mouse River also drains a large section of Western North Dakota, and empties its waters into the Assiniboine in British America. (See Report of Bismarck Railroad Committee.)

The Little Muddy empties into the Missouri River from the north, about twenty-five miles above Fort Buford, and was noted for its heavy forests of good timber, for which the soldiers who were stationed at Fort Buford in the early days can vouch, for they cut thousands of logs from its wooded banks and rafted them down to the fort. A portion of these logs measured 45 inches in diameter, and were 80 to 90 feet in length, and perfectly straight.

The Big Muddy empties into the Missouri eighteen miles above the Little Muddy, and forty-three miles above Buford. It is well timbered but not as densely as the Little Muddy. Both streams have their source near the international boundary, but are not regarded as important tributaries of the Missouri.

The water-shed or elevation that divides the water courses flowing north and south is situated largely in North Dakota. Starting at Lake Traverse, it trends west of north and northwest to very near the Devil's Lake region, southwest of which the James River has its sources, and on in the same direction, crossing the territory's northern boundary near the northwest corner.

The Devil's Lake or Lake Minnewaukan (Spirit Water of the Dakota Indians) was the largest lake in Dakota Territory. It covers an area of nearly 100 square miles, and is probably the most romantic spot, including its natural attractions, in the northern state. Its bed and beach is composed of fine gravel. It has no visible outlet, but is supposed to have subterranean drainage into Cheyenne River. It is situated in the north central section of the northern portion of Dakota Territory. It is eighty miles long and from three to twenty miles in width, and from fifty to two hundred feet in depth. Its altitude above the ocean is set down as 3,000 feet. It has a firm rock bottom, and its waters are clear and cold and palatable. Its shores are well timbered with valuable species of wood, and in the early days these forests sheltered large herds of deer, bears were numerous and fur animals abounded. It was a famous region in the earliest explorations of the Northwest, and a favorite resort of both the Chippewa and Sioux Indians, and furnished the battle ground for many a conflict. Fort Totten was built at this lake in 1868, or partially built, the improvements being of brick which were manufactured near the site of the post.

FIRST SURVEYS

The first surveys made by the Government in Dakota were made by two surveyors named James Snow and Stephen Hutton, who under a contract with the government surveyed and marked the eastern boundary of the Territory of Dakota from Big Stone Lake to the Iowa line. The Big Stone Lake boundary had been defined by the act admitting Minnesota into the Union. Snow and Hutton ran the boundary line south from Big Stone to the Iowa line a distance of about one hundred and twenty miles, marking the boundary with four cast iron monuments. This work was done in the summer of 1859. The same season the United States surveyor general at Dubuque let a contract to a surveyor named Neely to run the township lines in the southeastern part of the territory covering the Big Sioux from its mouth to Canton or above and extending west nearly to the Vermillion River, embracing about eighty townships. Thos. J. Stone of Sioux City had a contract for subdividing these townships and probably did some of the work during the fall of 1859.

In the spring of 1860, Congress having appropriated $10,000 to be disbursed by Surveyor General Lewis of the Dubuque office, that official was induced to expend the entire amount in surveying the newly acquired public lands in Southern Dakota, and a contract was awarded by General Lewis to Ball and Darling, a firm of land surveyors, who were very close to the throne in the surveyor general's office, to do this work. Mr. William Miner, afterward and for over a quarter of a century the junior member of the mercantile firm of Bramble & Miner of Yankton, was a member of this party of surveyors. Being a surveyor himself, he had gone from his home to Dubuque for the purpose of procuring a contract, but as there was only enough of the appropriation to satisfy the Ball and Darling people, he engaged with the successful contractors and assisted in the work during that season.

Mr. Miner relates that the surveying party left Dubuque late in May, 1860, with a team and covered wagon loaded with their surveyor's instruments, provisions, etc., and drove across the State of Iowa; a great part of the way, and more especially the western half of the state from Fort Dodge west, being destitute of any road, just the naked bald prairie which supported an abundance of big game. Mr. Miner says:

There were eight in our party, and all except the one whose turn it was to drive the wagon, walked the entire distance. We had, in some respects, quite a notable party, made up as follows: John Ball, E. N. Darling, for many years after a well known civil engineer in Washington, D. C.; Bill Jones, son of United States senator from Iowa; Warner Lewis, son of Surveyor General Lewis (both Jones and Lewis, when the war broke out in '61, went south and enlisted in the Confederate army and I think both came to grief at Vicksburg); Miner Lorrimer, son of one of the best known business men of Dubuque; Thomas C. Powers, for many years after head of the firm of Powers Bros., Indian traders, and one of the first United States senators from the State of Montana; Horace J. Austin, for over forty years one of the best known and respected citizens of Dakota, residing and doing business at Vermillion (Mr. Austin died at Pierre during the session of the Legislature of 1893), and myself. Our instructions for doing this work were to go to a point on the Big Sioux River, about thirty miles north of Sioux City, where a standard line of Iowa surveys stopped on the Big Sioux, and between townships 94 and 95 north, and run that standard west until it came to something, either the Missouri River or the Yankton reservation. (The latter is what it hit near the old Sherman ranch on Choteau Creek.) Then to do enough town line and subdivision work to use up the money, the work to be done being largely discretionary with us. We were also ordered to note and define the grants designated and selected at different localities by Frost, Todd & Co.; Charles F. Picotte, who had a grant of one section by the treaty at Yankton, and I think a few other grants in the Sioux Point region. Following our instructions we ran all the town lines between our standard line and the Missouri River and subdivided two fractional townships at Yankton, two at Vermillion, one at Elk Point, if I recollect right, and finished up late in the fall with a foot of snow on the ground by running all the subdivision lines in Big Sioux Point. Austin and myself bid the party adieu at Sioux City when they left for Dubuque with their team and wagons, and we went back to Yankton, on foot, of course, to take our chances for something to eat over the winter, and it was not a very brilliant chance either. D. T. Bramble had put up a little frame building on the levee near the foot of Walnut Street, and opened up a small store in it. I got a chance to bunk with him and we got our bacon and corn bread at the log dirt roof ranch which was presided over by Mrs. H. C. Ash, who, I venture to assert, could get up a better meal with a very limited stock and assortment of provisions than any woman in Dakota.

With these surveys completed the pre-emptors were enabled to adjust their boundaries under the direction of Surveyor Armstrong. The former "squatter boundaries" that had governed were found to be three chains too far south and four chains too far east.

The land surveys under the United States are uniform and done under what is known as the "rectangular system." This system of surveys was reported from a committee of Congress before the United States Government came into existence, May 7, 1784. The committee consisted of Thomas Jefferson, chairman; Messrs. Williamson, Howell, Grey and Reas.

This ordinance required the public lands to be divided into "hundreds" of ten geographical miles square, and those again to be subdivided into lots of one mile square each, to be numbered from 1 to 100, commencing in the northwestern corner and counting from west to east and from east to west continuously; and also that the lands thus subdivided should be first offered at public sale. This ordinance was considered, debated and amended; and on the 3d of May, 1785, on motion of Mr. Grayson, of Virginia, seconded by Mr. Monroe, the size of the townships was reduced to six miles square. It was further discussed until the 20th of May, 1785, when it was finally passed.

The origin of the system is not known beyond the committee's report. There had been land surveys in the different colonies for more than a hundred years; still, the method of granting land for settlements in vogue in all the colonies was regular tracts, except in the colony of Georgia, where, after 1733, eleven townships of 20,000 square acres each were divided into lots of fifty acres each.

The act of cession of the State of Virginia of her western territory provided for the foundation of states from the same not less than one hundred nor more than one hundred and fifty miles square.

This square form of states may have influenced Mr. Jefferson in favor of a square form of survey, and besides the even surface of the country was known, the lack of mountains and the prevalence of trees for marking it also favoring a latitudinal and longitudinal system. Certain east and west lines run with the parallels of latitude and the north and south township lines with the meridians.

The system as adopted provided for sale in sections of 640 acres, one mile square. In 1820 a quarter-section, or 160 acres, could be purchased. In 1832 sub-divisions were ordered by law into 40-acre tracts, a quarter-quarter-section to settlers, and in 1846 to all purchasers. On May 18, 1796, the ordinance of May 20, 1785, was amended; also on May 10, 1800, on the introduction of land offices and credit sales, and on February 11, 1805; April 24, 1820; April 5, 1832; and May 30, 1862. (For existing laws on surveys see Chapter IX, United States Revised Statutes, "Surveys of the Public Lands," sections 2395 to 2413.)

Since the inauguration of the system it has undergone modification in regard to the establishment of standard lines and initial points, the system of parallels or correction lines, as also of guide meridians, having been instituted, contributing largely toward its completeness.

The cessions of the several states were organized from time to time into geographical divisions by the laws creating them and the lands were ordered to be surveyed, including lands to which the Indian title had been or would be extinguished. The same proceeding took place with purchased territory in 1803, 1819, 1848, 1850 and 1853.

The extension of the surveys being authorized by Congress over a district of country, the commissioner of the general land office directs the surveyor general of the district, whose office is created by law prior to extending the surveys, to begin the same.

PUBLIC LANDS—THE NUMBER OF ACRES

Dakota's boundaries enclosed a compact body of public lands, every acre of which belonged to the Government of the United States (subject to the Indian titles), no portion having been alienated by grants executed by its prior sovereigns. Its original boundaries included about two hundred and twenty-four million acres, and at the time of its organization was the largest compact body of public lands wholly owned by the Government, except the Territory of Alaska, then belonging to the national Government. An early public document informs us that in the very infancy of the nation, before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the ownership and control of public lands was the chief obstacle to the Union. The difficulty was finally magnanimously adjusted by the proprietor states transferring their outlying lands to the general Government—New York, first, in 1781; Virginia, in 1784, with a cession of the Great Northwestern Territory, the provisions of which cession have been so frequently and authoritatively quoted in the steps taken by Dakota to secure statehood. Massachusetts followed in 1785; and Connecticut, Georgia, North and South Carolina and other states surrendered their claims shortly after.

By the treaty of peace with England in 1783, at close of the Revolutionary war, the western boundary of our nation was fixed at the middle of the Mississippi River, and the outlying lands then belonging to the states in severalty, and ceded to the general Government as above stated, amounted to two hundred and twenty-six million acres (about two million acres more than was comprised within the original Territory of Dakota). By the treaty with France in 1803 (Louisiana Purchase); the treaty with Spain in 1818 (Florida and west of the Mississippi); the treaties with Mexico in 1848 and 1853 (California, Arizona, New Mexico, Nevada, and part of Utah); and the treaty with Russia in 1867 (Alaska), the public domain was increased over seven-fold, adding about one billion six hundred and nine million acres to the national territory. The United States thus became possessed of a total of one billion eight hundred and thirty-four million acres of land; a domain sufficiently ample to make twenty-five countries each of the size of England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales combined, capable of supporting a population estimated at seven hundred and twenty million of people of the average density of Great Britain or nearly half the population living on the globe in the year A. D. 1870. In the early days of our Republic the public lands were chiefly regarded as a possible source of public wealth in the dim future; but under the stimulating influence of growth and development, the Government has been led to make use of them to accelerate their occupation and settlement by civilized people, by liberal land laws; by generous donations to induce public improvements; and to foster and encourage popular education. In 1870 about four hundred and forty million acres had been disposed of by sale, pre-emption and homesteads, and grants to railroads, etc. The surveyed land then on the market and ready for settlement, was estimated at seventy million acres; and the area unsurveyed at one billion and three million acres.

During the first eleven years of our constitutional government land was taken up at the rate only of 100,000 acres a year. In 1806, the sales realized $705,245. During the War of 1812 the sale fell off, but with the return of peace they improved, and in 1819 amounted to about three million dollars. The sales for 1835 aggregated thirty-five million dollars; and the next year following twenty-one million dollars, the largest year's sales made in our public land history. In 1842 the sales diminished to about one million. From 1850 to 1855, they averaged about ten million dollars a year. In 1862, the War of the Rebellion being on, they amounted to $125,048, the lowest of any year previous to 1890. Since the war they have slowly increased, averaging about three million dollars a year.

The wise policy of setting apart a portion of the public lands for the benefit of common schools and the cause of education is one original with this Government, and has been of great service to the cause of education in the western states. The Territory of Dakota was not permitted to make any sale of these lands; but the common school lands in the two states of North and South Dakota inherit about ten million acres which is conservatively valued at one hundred million dollars. Public lands have also been generously donated in endowing our state educational institutions; and those of a charitable and penal character. Agricultural colleges have also been greatly aided by land endowments.

PRE-EMPTIONS

What was known as the pre-emption law, passed by Congress in 1841, was the first enactment that offered an inducement for settlement upon the public lands. Under this law any citizen of the United States or a single woman of lawful age, and persons of foreign birth who had declared their intention to become citizens, were permitted to settle upon and claim 100 acres of the public land, as a pre-emption right, under which right he was entitled to enter his land at any time after six months from settlement and before the expiration of five years, by paying therefor at the land office $1.25 an acre. Before making his final proof the foreign born claimant was required to become a citizen. Bounty land warrants good for 100 acres of the public domain, given to veteran soldiers of the Mexican and other wars, were abundant in the years prior to the rebellion and were receivable by the Government in payment of these pre-emptions. Residence upon the tract claimed and some improvements to indicate good faith, were required under the pre-emption law.

The homestead law was passed in 1862. It extended to the same classes of people, the right to a homestead on the public domain not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres. Title to the homestead could be acquired by a continuous residence of five years, and the payment of $14 entry fees, or after six months actual residence and suitable improvement the claimant could commute his homestead entry by payment of $1.25 an acre. This law gave a great impetus to the settlement of the West.

The belief was quite prevalent that one great if not insuperable obstacle to the settlement of the vast prairies of Dakota and other public land sections was the lack of timber—that if this could be supplied the country would fill up with a desirable class of citizens. Congress in order to meet this condition as far as could be done, by encouraging legislation, enacted a law, in 1873, known as the Timber Culture Act, amended in 1874 and again in 1878, which gave to any party, being the head of a family, or over twenty-one years of age, a citizen of the United States, who shall plant, protect, and keep in a healthy and growing condition, for a period of eight years, ten acres of timber, on any quarter section of any of the public lands of the United States, or five acres on any legal subdivision of eighty acres, or $2\frac{1}{2}$ acres on any legal sub-division of forty acres or less, a patent to the whole of said quarter section, or of such legal subdivision of eighty, or forty, or less, as the case may be, at the expiration of said eight years, on making proof of such fact by not less than two credible witnesses, and a full compliance with the further conditions of this act; Provided, That not more than one-quarter of any section shall be thus granted, and that no person shall make more than one entry under the provisions of the act.

The further provisions of the law provided that the applicant should make an affidavit similar in substance to the affidavit made in homestead cases, with the addition that the land claimed is wholly devoid of timber. The applicant was required to pay $10 to the land officers where the claim embraced a full quarter section, and a proportionate amount for an eighty acre tract or a sub-division. It was further stipulated in what manner he should cultivate his timber tract; the number of trees to the acre, and in case the young plants were at any time destroyed by grasshoppers or by extreme drouth the time limit of eight years was extended; there were various other directory provisions; and when the applicant came to make final proof, provided he could prove by his witnesses that not less than two thousand seven hundred trees had been planted on each acre so cultivated, and at the time of making proof there were 625 living and thrifty trees on each acre, he was entitled to a patent for the land upon paying the land office fees.

A large number of entries were made under the provisions of this act, but the percentage of claimants who appeared to offer final proof at the expiration of the eight or more years provided was quite limited. And it was early discovered that the law was not fulfilling the expectations of the Government. Where a homesteader could secure a tree claim adjoining his homestead, he was able to comply with the law, as a rule, but this was seldom available. There was no commutation clause in the timber culture law. It did not appeal to the homesteader in preference to the homestead law under which he could take a homestead and after five years' residence secure his title. To fulfill the requirements of the law in the great majority of cases was considered at the time as much more expensive than the requirements of the homestead law. Partial drouths were one fatal to the early growth of the timber tracts planted; many claims were totally abandoned or relinquished to a homesteader after a few years' trial and failure; the law was finally repealed, and the prairies had been but little benefited directly from its well intended but rather impracticable requirements.

CHAPTER XI

EARLIEST WHITE SETTLEMENTS

RED RIVER OF THE NORTH—SIOUX FALLS AND MEDARY—PEASE AND HAMILTON SETTLEMENTS—YANKTON, VERMILLION, AND BONHOMME—BIG SIOUX POINT
—MIXVILLE—ELK POINT.

We have here undertaken to give a brief sketch of the pioneer settlements of Dakota which were contemporaneous, or nearly so. These include Sioux Falls and Medary, Yankton, Bon Homme, Charles Mix, Mixville, below Fort Randall; Vermillion, Big Sioux Point, Elk Point, and Red River of the North region, which had been occupied by white people a half century earlier. What is now Lincoln County does not appear to have had a permanent white settlement until some years later, though the county was carved out and named in 1862, and there were a very few scattered pre-emptors along the valley in that section, in 1864. While Yankton was the first point occupied by a permanent settlement of whites on the Missouri slope in Dakota, the country opposite Fort Randall contained a number of white men, not soldiers, who had probably come as civilian employes with the Harney expedition in 1855 and had located in that vicinity in 1857, for the purpose of sharing in the wood and hay contracts that were annually given out, or to engage in hauling supplies for the Government. Thus the Hamilton and Pease settlements were both well established in 1859, and peopled largely by discharged soldiers and French Canadians who had been employed in various civil capacities in Harney's campaign. We have for convenience of reference frequently designated these various settlements by the names of the counties given them by the first Legislature in 1862, though no county names or boundaries were existing during the period these sketches are designed to cover, up to the winter of 1861-2.

In 1858 Minnesota was admitted as a state with its present boundaries, and that portion of its former territory lying west to the Missouri River, was without a government. This fact will explain the urgency of the early settlers to secure the organization of Dakota Territory. An exception to this statement as to the absence of local government might be taken as to the strip of ceded lands lying west of the western boundary of the State of Minnesota and east of the Big Sioux, which the House of Representatives virtually decided as still being the Territory of Minnesota, and permitted the delegate to Congress elected prior to the state's admission to continue as its representative to the end of his term—1859. The Territorial Legislature of Minnesota at its closing session in 1857 had also organized the counties of Big Sioux, containing Sioux Falls, and Midway, containing Medary, and the governor had appointed officers for each county, who completed their organization in 1858, and transacted business.

The earliest settlements by the whites within the boundaries of the future Territory of Dakota were made when all of the country east and north of the Missouri River as far away as White Earth River, was embraced in the Territory of Minnesota; the country on the south and west of the Missouri being then in Nebraska Territory, excepting the settlement of the Hudson's Bay Company, made by Lord Selkirk in 1808. The first settlement in the future Dakota by citizens of the United States was made at Pembina about 1843 by Norman W.

Kittson and Joe Rolette. A postoffice was located there with Kittson as postmaster and Rolette as deputy. In 1850 a custom house was established there, it being close to the international boundary, with Charles Cavileer, of St. Paul, as the customs officer. The settlement has been continuous from that time.

The first settlement on the Big Sioux was made in 1856, December, by the Western Town Company, of Dubuque, Iowa, represented by David M. Mills, W. W. Brookings, John McClellan, and others, and in June, 1857, by the Dakota Land Company, of St. Paul, Minnesota, represented by A. G. Fuller, F. J. Dewitt, Byron M. Smith, and others. The latter company the same season made settlements at Medary and Flandreau, on the Big Sioux. The Sioux Falls settlements were abandoned in 1862, owing to Indian hostilities, the Medary settlement in 1859; and the country remained unoccupied until 1867-68.

In 1857 settlements were made on the James River near Yankton by W. P. Lyman, Samuel Mortimer, A. C. Van Meter and Sam Jerou; and as early as 1855, Aleck C. Young made good improvements and opened a farm a few miles east of the Vermillion River, which he abandoned about the year 1859; Aleck was a white man, related by marriage to the Yankton Indians. (See sketch.) A few civilian employees of the Government and contractors who had come across from the Platte with Harney's expedition in 1855, were located in Charles Mix County opposite Fort Randall. In 1858 the settlement at Vermillion and also at Bon Homme, was begun, the former by McHenry, Van Meter, Kennerly and others, and the latter by John Shober, George Rounds, Thomas Tate and others. A more complete list of these early settlers is furnished in other chapters. Elk Point was occupied in 1850, and Eli B. Wixson built a log hotel there; in 1860 the Brule Creek Settlement was started by M. M. Rich, Mahlon Gore, E. B. LaMoure, and Judson LaMoure, a younger brother, and others.

The Red River of the North formed the eastern boundary between the northern half of Dakota Territory and Minnesota. The first occupation of the country by white men was long prior to the formation of the Government of the United States. The Hudson's Bay Company charter,* granted by King Charles II to Prince Rupert and his associates in 1670, included all of British America contiguous to Hudson's Bay and its tributary waters. French and Canadian history are quoted as authority for the claim that in 1734, Pierre Gaultier Varennes, Sieur de la Verendrye, of Three Rivers, Canada, was the first explorer of the Red River Valley. Verendrye was a native of Canada, and a Frenchman of remarkable enterprise. In 1734 he traversed the country from the head of Lake Superior to the Red River in company with two sons and a nephew, and explored not only the valley of the Red, but also the Assinaboine and Pembina rivers. He is credited with having founded the fur industry in a portion of that region and established the young men who were with him as traders. He became noted as an explorer, and his work in that field formed the basis of the French claims to the Red River country, afterwards, in 1763, ceded to Great Britain. The younger Verendryes were also possessed of the adventurous and enterprising spirit of their ancestor, and in 1743 made a journey west across and along the valley of the Saskatchewan River, and discovered the Rocky Mountains during their wanderings. The elder Verendrye died in 1849.

One of the important divisions of Dakota Territory is the Red River of the North country. That portion since included within the Territory of Dakota was partly embraced within the Hudson's Bay Company grant, the oldest fur company

*The history of the Hudson's Bay Company, of Lord Selkirk's settlement, and the Northwest Fur Company would occupy a volume, and has been freely published in various works, particularly by the North Dakota Historical Department. But it does not appear to have any necessary connection with the history of Dakota, except through the introduction of missionaries and the half-breeds. It is probable that the missionaries would have come had there been no companies, for they were among the earliest of the white pioneers and were found wherever Indians had their habitation. The fur companies of that region were both foreign enterprises, and except in an illicit manner, conducted no operations on the American side of the boundary, though indirectly obtaining a large percentage of the fur traffic from the itinerant trappers and traders who operated regardless of international lines.

in America, and was occupied by white people earlier than any other section within the boundaries of Dakota as later defined, and possibly earlier than any section west of the Mississippi and north of Iowa. Its first white settlers were British subjects and went into the country when it was all British territory, under employment with the Hudson's Bay Company, but there does not appear to have been any event of importance to Dakota history until about the beginning of the eighteenth century, when Lord Selkirk, a Scotch nobleman, a leading member and large owner of the stock of the company, was granted by the Hudson's Bay autocracy, exclusive control, commercially and politically, as well as judicially, of the country bordering the lower Red River Valley, extending from the mouth of the river to the Red Fork of the main stream, in the vicinity of Grand Forks. Though the Selkirk grant was made some time after the formation of the United States Government, nothing definite was known regarding the northern boundary line separating the new Republic from the possessions of the mother country, and Selkirk, believing that his domain extended to the Grand Forks, erected his principal fort and trading depot in 1809, within the territorial limits of the United States. Lord Selkirk was a very intelligent and enterprising man, according to authentic reports, and was solicitous for the physical as well as spiritual welfare of the conglomerate population which composed his subjects.

The Hudson's Bay Company had brought into the country a number of English and Scotch families to assist in their fur trade with the natives, a trade that extended into the Upper Missouri Valley; and later a rival company formed in Canada in 1780, of French capitalists, and chartered by the Canadian Government as the Northwest Fur Company, had come into the field, and brought in a large number of assistants known as French Canadians; these people constituted the early citizenship of the country including that portion belonging to the United States. In due time the population increased by the intermarriage of the white Canadians with the Indian women who were natives of the country, and this produced a distinct class known as "Red River half-breeds," who became much more numerous than the whites, and formed a very valuable factor in supplying robes and furs to the fur company.

THE PEMBINA COUNTRY

Lord Selkirk had fixed upon a point near the mouth of the Pembina River for his improvements which he made in 1809; he named his post Fort Douglass, that being his family name, and from that time the Pembina Settlement had a local habitation which it has ever since maintained, if not in the exact locality of Fort Douglass, yet near enough to justify its claim as the first settlement on the United States' side of the boundary.

The Pembina country south of the 49th parallel of latitude was much more inviting, because of its freedom from marshes, than a large portion of the country north of that parallel, and was greatly preferred by the earliest whites, and later by the half breed natives, most or all of whom were British subjects, if they acknowledged allegiance to any sovereign. Selkirk's choice of location for the important fort he erected is convincing proof that he regarded the country superior to that further north. It possessed a deep, fertile soil, was free from marshes, and the fort was well situated to take care of the trade in furs. Father Balcourt, who had lived a score of years or more in the British Provinces, and also on the American side, says of the Pembina Valley about 1850: "The soil is very fertile and the frosts never occasion any damage. Our gardens yield us an abundance of melons of all kinds, a fruit that is not known in the gardens of the Selkirks, about forty miles further north." In 1851 he says: "The first frost felt at St. Paul was on the 6th or 7th of September; while at St. Joseph, on the Pembina River, thirty miles west of Pembina Village, the first frost was not until the 2d or 3d of October. We raise potatoes which weigh about two pounds each, and carrots 18 inches long and 4 inches in diameter." The Reverend Balcourt speaks also of the "measly, soggy" character of the country further north, and the difficulty experienced in trying to make it a food producing region, with the limited facilities of the people then inhabiting it.

The superior natural resources, including climate as well as soil, and the more attractive topography of the Pembina region were the principal factors in its favor, and to obtain possession of these was the motive actuating these who were attracted to its fertile vales at the time of its earliest white occupation. The Pembina River, which empties its waters into the Red coming from the west, is not only remarkable for its beauty, but the country through which it winds its way is of the most fertile character, with forests of hardwood on either side, and skirting its shores. The fur companies made very little if any effort to develop the resources of the country beyond its fur products, influenced no doubt by motives similar to those which governed the early fur companies on the Upper Missouri River, whose policy was to discourage any industry that would interfere with the fur trade, and agriculture, if successful, meant the extinction, to a large extent, of the fur bearing animals, and the certain banishment from the land of the trading industry. Because of this policy, which necessitated the shipping into the country even the food required by the settlers, there were occasions when great suffering was experienced from lack of suitable food—when hundreds were compelled to pass the long winters on barely food enough to keep them alive. The possession of money, or large stocks of furs and merchandise other than food, availed nothing on such occasions, for these settlements were hundreds of miles removed from the nearest points where food material could be obtained.

The name "Pembina" is said to have been given to a country east as well as west of the Red River of the North, and may have been applied to the entire valley and west to the James River. It first comes into prominence the latter part of the seventeenth and early in the eighteenth century. The name is derived from the word "pemmican," which formed the principal food of the Indians who inhabited the country from time beyond the ken of the historian. When the early missionaries, who were the first whites to enter that region, visited the Indians in the seventeenth century they found them using pemmican as the chief article of diet, particularly when on the chase in pursuit of buffalo and on the warpath, and it soon became the principal subsistence of the clergy during their pilgrimages from one missionary station to another. Flour being a commodity not easily procurable, it is stated on good authority, pemmican was substituted by the priests in celebrating the holy communion. The Dakota Indians are also said to have given the name to the country and that its meaning when translated is "sanctified bread," and was called Indian bread. Its use by the priests in administering the sacrament of the Last Supper was not uncommon. Another authority claims that Pembina is the French word for "high bush cranberry," a fruit that grows wild in the country and is used with the buffalo meat in the preparation of "pemmican." In either case the words "Pembina" and "pemmican" are shown to be related and their meaning explained.

When the Hudson's Bay Company began its intercourse and business with the native inhabitants of the Red River Valley, it found that the missionaries had preceded them, but it remained for the fur company to establish on a substantial scale the fur industry which was destined to become for scores of years the leading industry of North America, and to give employment to many thousand people in procuring, transporting and disposing of the raw material.

After the close of the War of 1812 between the United States and Great Britain, an event that greatly interrupted the fur trade, the trading post built by Selkirk was discovered by some British astronomers to be located south of the boundary line, and his lordship, reputed to have been intensely hostile to Uncle Sam, and heartily loyal to John Bull, had it removed to Fort Garry, or to the site where Fort Garry was founded, now near Winnipeg. The Hudson's Bay people, however, constructed another post, safely, as they supposed, within the British denominations, but near enough to the line to give them control of the fur traffic in the Pembina country. Selkirk died in 1820, being then in eastern Canada. The Northwest Fur Company, chartered by the Canadian government in 1780, had become a powerful and aggressive rival of the Hudson's Bay, and the competition between these rival organizations at times had led to acts of extreme violence and open warfare. Their difficulties were finally settled shortly after the death of Lord Selkirk, by merging the Northwest with the elder concern in 1821, an arrangement that gave to the Hudson's Bay people a monopoly of the fur traffic, and afforded an opportunity, which was improved, of exhibiting the remorseless character of those who controlled its Red River business.

This was about the time of the coming in of the first American traders from points on the Mississippi River. Fort Snelling, at the mouth of the Minnesota River, was built by the United States Government in 1820. Jesuit missionaries from Canada had made their way into the British colonies of the Red River Valley, even before the advent of Lord Selkirk, and thereafter, not only Roman Catholic but missionaries of other denominations arrived, being encouraged thereto by Selkirk, who felt that the secular interests of the country as well as the spiritual welfare of the people, would be greatly enhanced by the zealous labors of the disciples of all Christian denominations. Selkirk himself was a Protestant, but quite catholic in his administration of the affairs of his colony.

The fur industry had brought into the country, largely as employees of the rival companies, a number of British subjects of excellent business qualifications, and a much larger number of French Canadians, also British subjects, men with more or less experience in trapping and bartering with the natives. The trade of the Hudson's Bay Company not only covered the Red River and its tributaries, but extended to the Missouri River where many flourishing trading posts existed with which the foreign companies had business intercourse when the Spaniards owned that country and continued it surreptitiously after the Louisiana Purchase, though their trading on the soil of the United States had been interdicted by a law of Congress. This influx of white people, males only as a rule, had the natural result of many intermarriages with the native Indian women, so that in the course of a score or two years, the population of the country, whites and half-breeds only being included, numbered more than a thousand. Some authorities estimate the mixed bloods alone at about one thousand five hundred. This numerous native population inhabited the Red River Valley as far north as Fort Garry (now Winnipeg), and extended south as far as Grand Forks, though principally settled around Pembina and along the Pembina Valley to St. Joseph (now Walhalla). In the summer season it was customary for an entire village to break camp, and with their women, children and household goods, betake themselves to the buffalo pastures and spend the season slaughtering the buffalo which grazed in countless numbers on the plains, packing the meat for winter use, and tanning the robes for barter with the traders. These villages, at times, numbered as many as five hundred all told. The village of St. Joseph, on the Pembina River, was one of the best examples of a Red River half-breed community, composed principally of mixed-bloods. It contained at one time over two hundred buildings, and it was estimated that its population exceeded one thousand two hundred. This was about the year 1845. Its streets and lots were laid out by compass and chain, and a number of business houses did a flourishing trade. While the Roman Catholics largely predominated, the Presbyterians were well represented, and the former denomination had erected a fine church edifice. These people were not warlike, but peaceably disposed, and not remarkable for their intelligence or industry, but yielded cheerful obedience to their priests in observing the rites and ceremonies of the church. As a rule a priest would accompany them on their annual summer hunting excursions. In a crude way and limited in quantity some ground was tilled and grain and garden vegetables grown. There were, however, individual instances where farms were opened and domestic animals raised, that would be considered creditable in the best of rural communities.

TABLE ROCK, BIG SIOUX RIVER, SIOUX FALLS

The earliest white settlement in what was included in the Territory of Dakota, was that of Pembina, and was made in the year 1780, or a few years before the formation of the government of the United States and during the closing years of the Revolutionary war.

Major Stephen H. Long, U. S. A., led an exploring and scientific expedition from the headwaters of the Red River of the North along that valley to Pembina, in the year 1823.

The 49th parallel of north latitude was known to be the northern boundary of the United States, from the Lake of the Woods in Minnesota to the Rocky Mountains, but this line had never been definitely established. Major Long, at this time, located the parallel by astronomical observations. The new trading post of the Hudson's Bay Company was discovered to be on the United States side, and was moved across and re-erected on what was ascertained to be British soil by Major Long's official survey. Accompanying the Long expedition was a Mr. Keating, the historian, who found an old white trader living at the mouth of the Pembina River, who claimed to have been there over forty years, but whose name is not given. This trader was personally known to Keating. The date of this settlement corresponds nearly with the year which witnessed the organization of the Northwest Fur Company of Canada, an event immediately followed by the immigration of a large number of French Canadians to the Hudson's Bay and Red River country. Major Long found a Mr. Nolen residing at Pembina at the time who extended the hospitalities of his home to the major. The Red River settlements of that day were in no way connected with the southwest portions of the country, but they gradually grew toward the Missouri River under the enterprise of the fur companies. M. K. Armstrong, of Yankton, who visited Pembina in 1807, leading a surveying expedition to establish the seventh guide meridian, found old Peter Hayden at Pembina, who claimed to be seventy-six years old, and came over to the Hudson's Bay Territory in 1810, and made a settlement at or near Pembina in 1821, upon a parcel of land where he found an abandoned church building in a dilapidated condition. In 1840, Rev. Father Balcourt built a chapel at Pembina. At this time there were quite a number of French Canadian settlers, and also several bands of Chippewa Indians in that region. In 1843, the well known Commodore Kittson, who was connected for a time with the fur companies and afterwards a famous steamboat owner on the waters of Red River, established a mercantile house at Pembina.

KITTSOON AND ROLETTE

Norman W. Kittson was a Canadian, born about 1814; he went to Pembina in 1843 to engage in the fur trade, where, during the same year, he founded the Red River Transportation Company in connection with Joseph Rolette. He was the first postmaster at Pembina, appointed in 1849, by President Fillmore; and was elected to the Minnesota Territorial Legislature in 1855. He continued in the fur trade at Pembina and Turtle Mountain for many years. He is credited with building the first steamboat for traffic on the Red River. Kittson was favorably regarded by the half-breed population of that country and his influence usually carried whatever enterprise he engaged in. Prior to building his boat, he in company with Mr. Rolette, established a line of Red River carts connecting Pembina with St. Paul, in competition with the Hudson's Bay Company, and in 1847 attacked the English fort at Pembina, burned the buildings, and drove off the trader. Rolette had ambition for political distinction and was elected a member of the Territorial Legislature of Minnesota from the Pembina district, in 1853 and in 1855, and was a member of the last Territorial Assembly in 1857, prior to the admission of Minnesota into the Union. In 1851 the United States made Pembina the seat of a custom house with a revenue agent. Charles Cavileer, an Ohioan, was the first customs officer, and also deputy postmaster, and was a partner with Forbes & Kittson in their Indian trade. Cavileer's wife was a Scotch lady, born near Fort Garry, and educated in the mission schools. Cavileer received his appointment from President Fillmore, the last of the Whig presidents, and about this time would seem an appropriate one to begin the history of the Red River country in connection with the history of Dakota.

When President Pierce came in in 1853 he appointed Norman Kittson as customs officer, and he in turn was succeeded by Joseph Beaupre of St. Cloud, Minnesota, and Beaupre by Hon. James McFetridge, who, in 1861, was elected a member of the Council of the Dakota Legislature by the Red River vote.

Pembina's first United States mail was received by dog train from St. Paul, once a month. In 1856 William H. Moorhead became a resident. He engaged in freighting with Red River carts from St. Paul. From this time the growth of the Pembina settlement amounted to very little until the treaty with the Chippewa Indians, in 1864, opened the valley to settlement. It may be remarked that it was during these years, 1856-57, that the settlements in the Big Sioux Valley, at Sioux Falls and Medary, and in the Missouri Valley at Yankton and opposite Fort Randall, had their beginning.

The famous Red River cart was made without any iron save a strap iron band about the hub, and cost in Red River currency, two pounds sterling. The carts were made up in trains of twenty-five to forty or more, each drawn by an ox and containing when on the march from eight hundred to one thousand pounds of freight. They were used largely in transporting merchandise from St. Paul, Minnesota, to the settlements on the Red River of the North, and to the trading posts of the Hudson's Bay Company, the Northwest Company, and many individual traders. They were operated by transportation companies. One half-breed would drive three or four carts, and the distance covered in a day was about twenty-five miles. The carts were good for three or four round trips from Garry or Pembina to St. Paul, a distance of three or four thousand miles. They were also in common use among the half-breeds for transporting their portable property, and Armstrong speaks of employing one while prosecuting his surveys, to carry himself and his instruments.

THE RED RIVER TREATY

The Chippewa Indians on the Red River had made no relinquishment of their title to the lands of that region until 1864. The Chippewas owned the land on both sides of the Red River and extending nearly across the northern part of Minnesota and also west as far as Devil's Lake, and the Cheyenne River, Dakota. Commissioners had effected a treaty with the Chippewas as early as 1851, when the treaties were made with the Sioux for their lands in Minnesota, but the treaty had never been ratified. In October, 1863, a treaty was concluded at the old crossing of Red Lake River, by Alexander Ramsey and Ashley C. Morrill, and the chiefs and head men of the Red Lake and Pembina bands of Chippewa Indians for the cession of a large tract of country, of which the boundaries are as follows: Commencing at the intersection of the national boundary with the Lake of the Woods; thence in a southwest direction to the head of Thief River; thence following that stream to its mouth; thence southeasterly in a direct line toward the head of Wild Rice River, and thence following the boundary of the Pillager cession of 1855 to the mouth of said river; thence up the channel of the Red River of the North to the mouth of the Cheyenne; thence up said river to Stump Lake near the eastern extremity of Devil's Lake, thence north to the international boundary; and thence east on said boundary to the place of beginning.

It embraced nearly all of the Red River Valley in Minnesota and Dakota, and was estimated to contain eleven million acres. This treaty was ratified by the Senate March 1, 1864, but certain amendments had been made by that body which required the assent of the Indians. This being obtained the treaty was confirmed by proclamation of President Lincoln, May, 1864. Thereafter the white settlements on Red River were entitled to the privileges and protection of the laws of Dakota.

FORT ABERCROMBIE

Fort Abercrombie, on the Red River of the North, was built in 1857, about the same time that Fort Randall was erected on the Missouri. It completed the chain of military posts partially encircling the frontier from Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, by Fort Riley, Fort Laramie, Fort Randall, Fort Abercrombie, Fort Ridgely, Minnesota, down to Fort Snelling at the mouth of the Minnesota River. It was located on the west bank of the Red River, just north of the 46th parallel of north latitude, and about twenty-five miles north of the headwaters of the Red, which is formed by two streams named Otter Tail and the Bois de Sioux. The post was built under the direction of Lieut.-Col. John J. Abercrombie, for whom it appears to have been named. Logs were the material used in its construction. It was a two company post. The fort was the practical head of navigation on the Red River during favorable seasons. Gen. Alfred Sully, who later won distinction in Dakota in the campaigns against the Sioux in 1863 and 1864, was stationed at Abercrombie shortly after the completion of the post, and marched across the plains with his company in 1858, to old Fort Pierre; returning to Fort Ridgely the year following.

At the time of the Little Crow outbreak in the Yellow Medicine country, Minnesota, in August, 1862, Fort Abercrombie was garrisoned by a portion of the Fifth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, the regular troops having all been sent south for service with the forces who were then contending for the preservation of the Union against the armies of the Southern Confederacy. Fort Abercrombie lay almost directly in the path of the thousands of fleeing savages who were being pursued from the headwaters of the Minnesota River country by Sibley's troops. The pioneer settlers from a large section in the western part of Minnesota sought refuge at the fort at this time, though hundreds were killed before reaching it. The settlement of Breckinridge, some twenty miles south of the fort, on the Minnesota side, was deserted save by a few who sought to barricade one of the best buildings and defend themselves. They were, nevertheless, assailed by an overwhelming force of the hostiles, all killed, their bodies mutilated, and the town partially destroyed. The fort was besieged by the same merciless foe, and from about the 20th of August until the same date in September, the soldiers and settlers gathered there had almost daily conflicts with the savages who attempted to capture the fort and slaughter its inmates. About the 20th of the latter month substantial reinforcements arrived from Fort Snelling under Captain Emiel Buerger. The hostile Indians then abandoned the siege and pursued their way to the Cheyenne Valley and on to Devil's Lake, where they spent the winter. A portion of these Indian refugees found their way to the Chippewa lands on the Lower Red River, and were pursued and many captured by General Sibley. In this terrible crisis which for a time depopulated the frontiers of Minnesota and Dakota, Fort Abercrombie gave a good account of itself, and proved its inestimable value in succoring hundreds of helpless settlers and many women and children included, from massacre. Abercrombie was abandoned as a military post in 1877, and the improvements disposed of to homesteaders of the surrounding country.

STEAMBOATING ON THE RED RIVER

The era during which steamboating flourished on the Red River of the North began two or three years earlier than the beginning of the same industry on the Upper Missouri River and flourished in the American waters of that stream contemporaneously with the period of activity on the Missouri, the industry rapidly declining in the early years of the decade beginning in 1880. The inception of the industry on Red River, south of Pembina, was in the year 1856 or 1857, when the steamboat Anson Northrup, built at or near Fort Abercrombie, expressly for the shallow waters of the Upper Red River, and owned and operated by Anson Northrup, its builder, made a trip from Abercrombie to Fort Gary and return.

The voyage down occupied twenty days. The boat carried freight and passengers, and at that time, owing to gold discoveries in British Columbia, there was quite an encouraging amount of travel out of the frontier settlement of St. Paul for the Red River country, many going out with the Red River cart-trains which made regular trips from St. Paul to Pembina. The Northrup was sold the following year to J. C. & H. C. Burbank, prominent in that day as the proprietors of Minnesota stage lines. The name of the Northrup was changed to that of the Pioneer, and after some needed remodeling, it was put into service and proved a profitable venture. In 1861 the second steamboat was built at Georgetown, and named the International; Capt. Norman W. Kittson was her commander, and may have been the owner. Kittson was a capable man, and well acquainted with the river, and the inhabitants of the country, chiefly Chippewa Indians and half-breeds. Kittson, however, spoke their language fluently, which accomplishment coupled with his fine address and genial manners, made him a popular character in such an important position. Citizens from the southern portion of the territory had occasion to visit the Red Valley during the early '60s, and on official political missions, and spoke of their acquaintance with the commodore as one of the pleasing memories of their journey. The Indian troubles, however, seriously interfered with business. The Indians along the river complained that the whistles of the boats frightened their game away; and at the same period the troubles that culminated in the Little Crow war of 1862 were beginning to have a detrimental effect on the freighting and passenger business through this exposed region. Navigation of the river by steamboats was nearly abandoned for a brief time; but in 1864 the Indian troubles quieted down and the International made one trip that year to Fort Garry, and thereafter and until 1870, there appears to have been no further effort to increase the commerce of the stream, though the boats then in commission were kept employed. In 1871, the steamboat Selkirk was built for Hill & Griggs, with Alex Griggs as master. The Mr. Hill of the firm is presumed to be Mr. James J. Hill, who has since achieved renown as the railway king of the entire country. He was then getting acquainted with the transportation business. The Selkirk was a success, and soon added the former Pioneer and International to its line, so that the firm controlled a small fleet and did a thriving business. In the meantime the steamboat Manitoba had been built in 1874 at Winnipeg, the name of the town that had sprung into existence near the site of Fort Garry, and the capital of the Province of Manitoba. Another vessel named the Minnesota was put in commission in 1875. In 1876 Commodore Kittson bought both the Manitoba and Minnesota, and a new company was then organized called the Red River Transportation Company, and their steamboats were called the Kittson Line, and included the International, Captain Painter; the Selkirk, Capt. John Griggs; the Manitoba, Capt. Alex Griggs; the Minnesota, Captain Timeus; the Dakota, Captain Seigers; and the Alpha, Captain Russell. If the old Pioneer boat built by Mr. Northrup was in this fleet, it was steaming around under a new title. In 1872 the Northern Pacific Railroad had reached Moorhead, Minnesota, on the Red River, and that point became the head of navigation and the transfer point from the railroad to the steamboats for passengers and freight destined for the Red River settlements as far down as Winnipeg.

By 1876 the transportation business had increased enormously, with the completion of the shortening of the route by river and cutting off the portion of the stream which had presented the greatest obstacles to navigation. But the increase of tonnage and passengers had kept up with the increased facilities for carrying it, and the Kittson Line was abundantly patronized and proved a very lucrative enterprise for the owners as well as an important factor in the growth and settlement of the country.

These steamboats, as a rule, towed from two to a dozen barges all laden with merchandise, and in later years the volume of goods to be carried north increased to that extent that the boats continued running until the ice closed the stream, and when this occurred there would be waiting for shipment a thousand or fifteen hundred tons destined for the lower river as far north as Fort Garry. The transportation of these belated supplies to their destination was performed during the winter by teams. The tonnage of the Red River during these active years was given in round numbers at 60,000 tons per annum. But its days were numbered. The St. Paul & Pacific continued the construction of its line from Crookston north, and reached the international boundary at St. Vincent, on the Minnesota side of the Red, in 1878, where it joined with the Canadian Pacific which had been built up to the boundary from Winnipeg, and thereafter the railways monopolized the carrying trade of the Red River.

In this connection it will not be out of place to note the first adventure in transporting supplies by way of the Minnesota and Red rivers, to the Pembina settlement.

An incident connected with its earliest navigation in 1820 is made the subject of a brief sketch by General Sibley, which he furnished the Historical Society of Minnesota. The sketch tells of a trip from Prairie du Chien, Wisconsin, to Pembina, with Mackinaw boats:

In 1820, on the 15th day of April, three Mackinaw boats, manned with six hands each, laden with 200 bushels of wheat, 100 bushels of oats, and thirty bushels of peas, under the charge of Messrs. Graham and Laidlaw, left Prairie du Chien, Wisconsin, on the Mississippi River, for Selkirk's colony on the Red River of the North. They were detained by ice at Lake Pepin, and the crews planted the Maypole thereon. On the 3d of May the ice was sufficiently broken up to allow the passage of the boats through the lake. The voyage was continued up the Minnesota River to Big Stone Lake, from which a portage was made into Lake Traverse, about one and a half miles distant, the boats being drawn across on wooden rollers. Traversing the latter body of water and descending the Sioux Wood River to the Red River, the party arrived at Pembina in safety, with their charge, on the 3d day of June. Pembina was at that time a small hamlet, the rival companies of the Northwest and Hudson's Bay having each a trading post at the confluence of the Pembina River with the Red River, but on opposite sides of the former. The crop at Selkirk's colony having entirely failed the previous year, the grain was much needed for seed the ensuing season, and, of course, commanded a high price. The trip performed in these boats is worthy of mention, as it is the only instance of heavy articles being transported the entire distance from Prairie du Chien to the Red River settlements, with the exception of the portage between Big Stone and Traverse lakes, by water. The party returned across the plains, on foot, as far as Big Stone Lake, from which point they descended to Prairie du Chien in canoes.

PUBLIC LAND SURVEYS

The first public land surveys in the Red River of the North country were made by M. K. Armstrong, in 1867, who was selected by Surveyor General Tripp to perform the important work. It became necessary, before the work of townshipping and subdividing was done, to extend the eleventh, and establish the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth standard parallels north, and extend the seventh guide meridian from the seventh standard parallel to the international boundary through the country ceded by the Red Lake and Pembina bands of Chippewa Indians in 1864, in order to reach the locality of Pembina, which was presumed to be about two miles south of the international boundary, as astronomically established in 1823, by Major Long, United States topographical engineer. Armstrong was further instructed to run and define the international boundary for a distance of forty miles west along the 49th parallel from the post on the west bank of Red River placed by Major Long. It was the most important work that had ever devolved on the Dakota office, and the execution of the work involved all the hazards incident to an unexplored wilderness inhabited by a race of savage people.

Mr. Armstrong selected his assistants and procured his outfit at Yankton. In his company were Samuel Morrow, Thomas A. McLeese, Louis Frick and William Brewster. The party started on its journey overland June 15th, taking a direction north by east, passing near Sioux Falls, thence up the Big Sioux, and across to the headwaters of the Red River, thence to Fort Abercrombie, where the first halt was made, and where it remained a few days resting and making final prep-missions for its important duties. Leaving Abercrombie, they could not expect to meet with a white man or a semblance of civilization until they entered the Pembina settlement. Settlements at that time had extended but a very few miles north or east of the Missouri River in Dakota. While encountering many difficulties, suffering some privations and experiencing many exciting adventures, nearly devoured at times by myriads of mosquitoes and buffalo gnats, the purpose of their long journey was successfully accomplished, and they returned to their homes in November following, with their scalps on, which it may be added, was about all they did have on. They had traveled 600 miles across the trackless prairies of Dakota, traversing the territory from its extreme southern boundary to its northernmost limit, walking the entire distance, and were probably the only human beings of any race who have made the journey through the Dakotas afoot. The party met with no disturbance from the Indians, enjoyed a number of thrilling occasions chasing the American bison, upon whose meat, in the form of pemmican, when obtainable in the chase, they mainly subsisted. The members of the party had made good use of their opportunity to observe the natural features of the country, and were able to give the settlers on the Missouri border the assurance that Dakota was a vast domain of fertility, that would some day produce sufficient food products to supply the inhabitants of the United States with their bread and meat.

Regarding the character of the country, Armstrong says:

This portion of Dakota is in reality a timbered region. I ran a line seventeen miles long through a heavy forest of oak, ash, birch and whitewood. These woods abound with bear, moose and wolves in the way of game, and as for fruit, strawberries, cherries and cranberries grow in profusion. The birds of the forest are here, the blue-jay, the pigeon, and the mocking bird being seen daily in the woods.

Concerning the people of the Pembina region, Mr. Armstrong wrote:

There were a great many, and they lived on pounded buffalo meat, or "pemmican," and called themselves "plain hunters." They make their annual summer visits to the plains with horses, oxen, carts, and families to procure meat and robes, and return late in the fall to live in their thatched-roof log houses on Pembina River, of which the woods are filled for sixteen miles below St. Joe. This pemmican trade is like our fisheries, and is carried on almost as extensively, 300 carts sometimes going out in one train. The pemmican is made by drying and stripping the buffalo meat, then threshing the same with a flail, like wheat, till broken into fine shreds; the tallow of the buffalo is then heated to a liquid and poured onto the meat, and the whole mixed with a wooden shovel, like mortar for plastering, and the entire compound, with berries and other fruits, is then shoveled into a sack of raw buffalo hide, which, when cooled, becomes as hard as wood and has to be cut or shaved off with an axe for cooking. This is the food our party has been living on for the last six weeks, and I must say that when dished up "in style" with onions, potatoes and flour, salt and pepper, it is very nutritious, and a palatable food. This, with black tea, maple sugar, and rather hard shelled bread, completes a northern meal.

As for the means of transportation, large wooden wheel carts, tireless and with unbanded hubs, harnessed with rawhide to an ox or horse, constitutes a team, so much so that the roads are all three tracked cart trails, making them very tiresome for two horses. During my survey I have had some Cree and French half-breeds with me and two of these ox-carts, and it would make a white man look wild to see these two wheeled things go through the woods, smashing through brush, tumbling over logs, and fallen trees, and plunging down steep river banks, sometimes both ox and half-breed under the cart, and the next moment coming up all right on the other side. As for myself, I stopped riding in these northern sulkies after my first effort in crossing a creek, when I was thrown, compass and all, high and dry into a neighboring tree.

I found these people are among the happiest in the world. If they only have enough to eat, their mind and hardships are all the same to them, and after their day's labor is over, and before dark, they build a blazing campfire and with the iron kettle for a drum, they perform their Indian dance and song for hours, and when they retire for the night they rest their heads and go through with the Catholic prayer. The Catholic religion is the dominant one among the people here. They have a church at St. Joe, and there is no other place where they observe the Sabbath.

THE INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY LINE

In prosecuting this work, Mr. Armstrong found by actual measurement that the 49th parallel crossed the Red River about one and one-half miles north of the boundary established by Major Long, leaving the Hudson's Bay post within the United States. The improvements were not again disturbed at this time. The situation was explained to the United States authorities and the British ambassador at Washington, whereupon it was tacitly agreed to permit the company to continue business, foreseeing that the day was rapidly approaching when the company would abandon the post in any event. This post was the one taken by Riel's rebels a year or two later, and resulted in a case in court at Pembina and the liberation of Riel's followers. Armstrong's report led to a further and more accurate astronomical survey by the War Department in 1870, when Captain Heap, A. A. A., after the most careful observations with the best equipment obtainable, planted the boundary monument one mile and 683 feet north of the old oak post which Major Long had set to define the line, and about 400 feet south of Armstrong's line. Armstrong's measurements were unquestionably correct, but a parallel of latitude is not located by the surveyor's chain. The proximity of the measured line with that fixed by the astronomer entirely satisfied both governments that the correct boundary had been found and marked, near enough to the imaginary circle for all practical purposes. The boundary was, several years later, marked by iron posts between the Lake of the Woods and the Rocky Mountains.

RED RIVER ELECTIONS

Mr. Armstrong attended one of the far-famed "Red River Elections," the regular territorial election, held at St. Joseph, October 8, 1867. He left his work in the field, nine miles away, in order to be a personal witness of an event which had decided one or more territorial elections in Minnesota, and certainly one in Dakota. Of the visit he wrote: "Two hundred and fifty votes were polled at St. Joseph, mostly all in the morning before I reached the polls, and about thirty at Pembina."

The voting population of the Pembina district was a much mooted question at that time and for some time later. Prior to the admission of Minnesota into the Union in 1858, the Pembina district formed a large part of the Territory of Minnesota and contributed several hundred votes at each territorial election to the ticket, and when the country became a part of the Territory of Dakota there was only a slight, if any, diminution of its vote, which biennially disturbed the calculations of Dakota's candidates for Congress, who, being Southern Dakotans, were separated from their northern constituents on the Pembina River by at least a thousand miles by the nearest practicable route, which was by way of St. Paul. It was the Red River vote that decided the contest for delegate to Congress between Todd and Jayne, unseating the latter in 1864, after he had occupied the place for more than a year. It was the Red River vote that led Congress to decide that Indian land was not an Indian reservation within the meaning of the organic act, unless it had been specifically reserved by treaty.

All this, however, was before the day of the settlement of that country by legitimate immigration of citizens of the United States. In the late '60s the Chippewa treaty had been made and this state of political affairs began to correct itself. A judicial district had been formed for the northern part of the territory, and the United States court established with Pembina as its seat, and by 1870 the people began to observe the written law without protest.

RED RIVER COUNTIES

Under the proclamation of Governor Jayne, issued in 1861, calling the first election held in the Territory of Dakota, the Red River country was made a part of the First Council District, extending from the mouth of the Big Sioux River on the south to the international boundary line, taking in the settlements at Pembina and St. Joseph, and also those at Sioux Falls and below, including that portion afterwards included in Cole County. This was the First Council District, extending the entire length of the territory, distance about 450 miles, and given two councilmen. The western boundary was the range line dividing ranges 50 and 51. It is now the dividing line between Union and Clay counties.

All that portion of the territory lying on the Red River of the North, including the settlements at Pembina and St. Joseph, was made the Third Representative District and given one representative. The election in 1861 at Pembina Precinct was held at the home of Charles LeMay, and James McFetridge, Hugh Donaldson and Charles LeMay were appointed judges of election. At St. Joseph the election was held at the house of Baptiste Shorette, and the judges of election were Charles Bottineau, Baptiste Shorette and Antoine Zangrean (or Gingras). The election was held on the 16th of September, 1861, and Hugh S. Donaldson was elected representative. James McFetridge was a candidate for councilman, and received all the votes at Pembina and St. Joseph, nearly 200, but was not voted for in the precincts at Sioux Falls, Elk Point and Big Sioux, and the certificates of election to the two councilmen voted for in that district were given by the governor of the territory, to whom the returns were made and who canvassed the vote, to Austin Cole, of Big Sioux Point, and W. W. Brookings, of Sioux Falls. McFetridge, however, appeared at Yankton at the opening of the first session, and filed his claim to the seat held by Brookings, but no contest was made, the matter being arranged, outside the council, by an agreement to give to Red River an independent, or separate, council and representative district, with one councilman and two representatives, and such a law was passed at this session in words following:

That all that portion of the territory lying on the Red River, including the settlements of Pembina and St. Joseph, shall constitute the Seventh Council District of the Territory of Dakota, and shall be entitled to one councilman and two representatives in the Legislative Assembly of the Territory.

At the second session of the Legislature, 1862-63, the said Seventh district was represented by James McFetridge in the council, and Hugh S. Donaldson and J. Y. Buckman in the House of Representatives.

At the first session of the Legislature, held in March, 1862, a law was enacted defining the boundaries of four counties bordering the Red River and extending from the international boundary south to the north line of Deuel County, which was on township line number 124 north of range 53 east. The names of these counties were Kittson, beginning at the 49th parallel and extending south sixty miles, or through ten townships, where it was joined by Chippewa County, embracing also ten townships, or sixty miles further south; then came Stevens County, embracing a like number of townships; and last, the County of Cheyenne, whose southern boundary was the north line of Deuel County. The western boundary of all these counties was the west line of range 62; the eastern boundary, the Red River. Kittson County, the farthest north, in which the towns or settlements of Pembina and St. Joseph were situated, appears to have been the only one of the four in which there were any settlements of white people at that time, and very few were citizens of the United States. The act defining the boundaries of the counties named St. Joseph as the temporary county seat of Kittson, and another enactment incorporated the Town of St. Joseph, authorizing the citizens to elect for their governing body a town council, and naming John B. Wilkie as the first president of said town.

The County of Kittson was organized the same year by the governor, who appointed as the board of county commissioners Norman W. Kittson, Charles LeMay and Baptiste Shorette, which board met at St. Joseph in June, 1862, and completed the organization, appointing Charles Morian as register of deeds and county clerk, and Joe Rolette, sheriff.

No representative from the Red River for either house appeared at the capital during the session of the Legislature of 1863-64, the third session, although under the law above quoted the Seventh district was plainly entitled to one councilman and two representatives. No record was known of any election being held either at St. Joseph or Pembina, in 1863, when the members of the Legislative Assembly throughout the territory were elected. The Indian war was at full tide during the year, and Sibley's expedition had overrun the northern portion of the territory, and the presumption was that no attention was given to political matters in Kittson County.

The contest for the seat of delegate from Dakota between Todd and Jayne, which had been before Congress during 1863, had served to make public the character of the Red River vote, and the fact that the Indian title to the soil of that section had not been extinguished. The minority report of the committee in that case, supporting the Jayne side of the controversy, was mainly devoted to the fraudulent character of the Red River vote, as upon the admission or rejection of that vote depended the result of the contest. The majority report had counted the full vote of the Red River precincts, St. Joseph and Pembina, giving 125 votes for Todd and 19 for Jayne. The minority report said:

First, the census taken about one year prior to the election, showing that in the whole Red River country there were of white males but fifty-one, and of these over the age of twenty-one but forty-two.

From the testimony of Joseph V. Buckman, taken March 11, 1863, before Hon. W. F. Purcell, judge of the Orphans' Court in the District of Columbia, on notice duly given, both parties being present at the examination, the contestant, however, under protest and objecting to the jurisdiction of Judge Purcell to take the testimony. This testimony shows that there were but six white persons, native-born and naturalized, present at the St. Joseph precinct on the day of election. The witness had been an Indian trader and postmaster at Pembina for several years; was well acquainted, and swears that he did not think that more than ten or twelve white persons were present on the day of election, and of this number there were but three who were native-born citizens of the United States, and three others who claimed to be naturalized, and none who had made declaration to become citizens; that forty-six or forty-eight votes were cast for delegate at the election; that the excess over the number of legal voters present was cast by illegal voters, mostly half-breeds; and that there was added to the vote cast, after the close of the polls, a little over one hundred votes.

It is probable that in the face of these disclosures by Buckman, who had been elected to the Legislature of Dakota by the same vote, but whose title was not contested, the sentiment of the law-abiding Red River people was averse to further elections until after the treaty of cession with the Chippewas was concluded, and this treaty had already been practically agreed upon. It will be seen, however, that Congress recognized the vote of that section to the fullest extent. The majority report, known as the Dawes report, which gave the seat to Todd, held that the testimony of Buckman, being taken after the time for taking depositions had expired, must be excluded. No criticism was made of the reliability of the testimony. Regarding the claim that the vote was illegal and void because the Indian title to the country had not been extinguished, the majority report held that the provisions of the organic act governing this matter did not apply "to territory upon which Indians may happen to be living, but only to such portions as are held by tribes under or by virtue of treaties defining boundaries and stipulating for exclusive jurisdiction to be exercised by the tribe holding them."

No such treaty existed covering any portion of the election precinct in Kittson County, and therefore the vote could not be excluded for that reason.

The Red River country had participated for a number of years in the territorial elections of Minnesota prior to the organization of Dakota Territory, and this fact weighed in favor of the recognition of the vote cast there in 1862 which Congress now gave it, for to exclude it as fraudulent might have been taken as an indirect reflection upon the former government of a sister state.

In view of the political condition of the Red River country as shown by the disclosures made in the Todd-Jayne contest, the Legislative Assembly of the territory, which convened in December, 1863, took official notice thereof, and quite early in the session bills were introduced in both houses for the repeal of the laws creating the Seventh Council and Representative District, and also the act establishing the counties of Kittson, Cheyenne, Stevens and Chippewa. The House bill passed that body the first week of the session, but was not approved by the Council, where a bill for the same purpose had been introduced and was being considered by the Committee on Elections, which committee reported favorably, accompanying its report with a statement of the reasons governing its recommendation, from which statement the following paragraph is taken:

The fact that the counties of Kittson, Chippewa, Cheyenne and Stevens were created on domain from which the Indian title had not been extinguished, and consequently not under the executive, legislative or judicial jurisdiction of our territorial laws and courts, is of sufficient importance to justify the repeal of the statutes creating them. The further fact that representatives from the Red River districts, when residing in the territory comprised in these counties are not amenable to the laws they themselves aid in enacting, is a sufficient cause for denying them any participation in the enactment of such laws. The fact that they enjoy a total immunity from taxation, and from the provisions of all general laws enacted by the Territorial Legislature, of itself sufficiently denies the justice and equity of any claim to representation in this law-making body on an equality with the members from other districts.

The report also recommended that the Legislature memorialize the President in behalf of an early treaty with the Chippewa Indians, in order to open the Red River country to settlement, and admit its settlers to the enjoyment of their political rights and to the advantages and protection of the territorial laws. The report also alludes to the diversity of the commercial and social interests existing between the northern and southern sections of the territory, thus early recognizing a situation which was revealed when the northern section became settled.

The Council bill passed by a three-fourths vote; the House also passed it, and the governor approved it, leaving the Red River country in the same political situation it held prior to the organization of the territory. No further action was taken regarding Red River matters at this session, nor at the following session in 1864-65; but in the Council in 1865-66, Mr. Turner introduced a bill to re-establish the counties of Kittson, Cheyenne, Stevens and Chippewa. This bill was amended in committee by striking out these several names and inserting the name "Pembina" in lieu thereof, and thus amended the bill passed the Council, but was defeated in the House near the close of the session.

The treaty with the Sioux Indians at Lake Traverse in 1851 ceded a portion of the Red River country, beginning at the junction of Buffalo River (north of Moorhead, Minnesota) with the Red River of the North, thence along the western bank of the said Red River of the North to the mouth of the Sioux Wood River; thence along the western bank of Sioux Wood River to Lake Traverse; thence along the western slope of said lake to the southern extremity thereof; thence in a direct line to the junction of Kampseska Lake with Tchan-kas-an-data, or Big Sioux, River; thence along the western bank of said river to its point of intersection with the northern line of the State of Iowa, including all the islands in said river and lakes.

The treaty made with the Red Lake and Pembina bands of Chippewa Indians in 1863 ceded to the United States a large area of land in Minnesota and in Dakota Territory, "beginning on the Red River at the mouth of the Wild Rice River in Minnesota, thence up the main channel of the Red River to the mouth of the Cheyenne; thence up the main channel of the Cheyenne River to Poplar Grove; thence in a direct line to the Place of Stumps, otherwise called Lake Chicot; thence in a direct line to the head of the main branch of Salt River; thence in a direct line due north to the point where such line intersects the international boundary aforesaid; thence eastward along said boundary to the place of beginning. (This place of beginning was on the international boundary line in Minnesota where the said boundary line intersects the Lake of the Woods.) This treaty, owing to amendments made by the United States Senate, was not completed until 1867. This treaty freed a large area of the Red River country of the Indian title extending from the international boundary south to the sources of Red River.

PEMBINA COUNTY

At the session of the Legislature of 1866-67 a law was enacted to establish the County of Pembina and for other purposes, also creating the Seventh Representative District, and giving to that district one representative in the House, and at the following session in 1867-68 a Red River representative from Pembina County appeared at the capitol in the person of Hon. Enos Stutsman, formerly of Yankton County, who had already served nearly three terms in the Council. Mr. Stutsman had been appointed revenue agent by the federal authorities in 1866, and in the course of his official duties had visited the custom house at Pembina where he was so favorably impressed by the country and its prospects that he became a citizen of the county. His selection for representative was a fortunate one for the northern part of the territory. He was elected speaker of the House, and during the session succeeded in having passed a number of memorials to Congress for the benefit of the northern part of the territory, among them one calling for a United States land office at Pembina, which was established two years later. A memorial asking for a division of the territory on the 46th parallel was passed at this session.

The Pembina district was represented by Mr. Stutsman at the following session, 1868-69, during which a new apportionment of legislative members was made giving to the Seventh district one councilman and one representative. Pembina County was also made a part of the Third Judicial District of the territory.

A memorial to Congress asking for a division of the territory on the 46th parallel of north latitude was passed at this session.

At the election in 1869 Enos Stutsman was elected councilman and John Hancock elected representative, but as Congress had provided for biennial sessions of the Legislature, the next Legislative Assembly did not convene until December, 1870. At the convening of this session (December, 1870) it was manifest that the Red River country had made notable advances in population and settlement and was beginning not only to attract immigration but was seen to be the active field of great commercial enterprises. The Northern Pacific Railway had been under construction through the State of Minnesota during the year past, and promised to enter the Territory of Dakota within the next twelve months. Already a vanguard of settlers had preceded it. During this session the County of Pembina was given new boundaries, as follows:

Beginning at the northeast corner of Deuel County on the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude; thence north along the western boundary of the State of Minnesota to the northeast corner of the Territory of Dakota; thence west along the international boundary line to the ninth guide meridian; thence south along said meridian to the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude; thence east along said parallel to the place of beginning.

The ninth guide meridian passed just west of Devil's Lake and south through the center of Stutsman County. The boundaries of Pembina County as thus defined enclosed about one-half of the northern part of the territory east of the Missouri River.

A new apportionment of members of the Legislature was made at this legislative session of 1870-71, which gave to Pembina County one councilman and one representative. Pembina County was also constituted a part of the Third Judicial District of the territory and a district court ordered to be held at the Town of Pembina on the first Tuesday in June and September of each year. An act was passed authorizing the county commissioners of Pembina County to raise money to build a jail at Pembina. Memorials were passed asking for the organization of a new territory in the northern portion of Dakota; also to increase mail service from Abercrombie to Pembina to six times a week; also to remove obstructions in the Red River of the North; also for an appropriation for a suitable building for a United States land office, custom house, post office and United States court at Pembina; also to remove the Chippewa Indians to White Earth Agency.

In 1872 Enos Stutsman was elected to the Territorial Council from the Seventh Legislative District, and Judson LaMoure, of Pembina, was elected to the House of Representatives. During this year the Northern Pacific Railroad had been graded and the iron laid across the territory from the Red River practically to the Missouri. Mr. Stutsman was elected president of the Council at the convening of the Legislature at Yankton in December, 1872. A Mr. Stone, of Fargo, entered a contest for Stutsman's seat on the ground that he had received the highest number of votes in the Seventh district, but soon after withdrew his claim and left the capital. At this session a large number of new counties were added to the map and for the first time in the history of the territory every portion of its area, including the Indian reservations, was enclosed within county boundaries.

Along the Red River the boundaries of Pembina County were re-defined, and the counties of Grand Forks, Cass and Richland were carved out of the former Pembina, together with a number adjoining them on the west. The new boundaries of Pembina County were thus given:

Section 1. That all that district of country included within the following boundary lines, to wit: Beginning at the northeast corner of the Territory of Dakota, on the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude; thence running west on said parallel of latitude to a point where the same is intersected by the eighth guide meridian; thence running south on said guide meridian to its intersection with the fourteenth standard parallel; thence running east on said fourteenth standard parallel to the western boundary line of the State of Minnesota; and thence northerly on the said boundary of said state to the point of beginning, shall be, and the same is hereby declared to be, and is constituted the County of Pembina, the county seat of which shall be and is hereby located at the Town of Pembina, and the county and precinct officers elected for Pembina County, at the last election, who shall qualify according to law, shall be the county and precinct officers of Pembina County, save in such case where a vacancy in either of such offices may be created by the provisions of this act, in which case such vacancy shall be filled by appointment by the majority of the board of county commissioners of said county.

In the latter part of the summer of 1856, Dr. J. M. Staples of Dubuque, Iowa, while on a tour of the Upper Mississippi, obtained a copy of "Nicollet's Travels in the Northwest in 1839," in which was a description of the Big Sioux, called by the Indians "Te-hau-kas-an-data," or the "Thick Wooded River." The doctor was immediately struck by Nicollet's graphic description of this favored region, and the land and town speculative fever at that time running high, he at once set about forming a company to secure so desirable a location. The result was the organization of the Western Town Company of Dubuque, Iowa, composed of Dr. J. M. Staples, Mayor Hetherington of Dubuque, Dennis Mahoney, editor of the Dubuque Herald; Austin Adams, afterward Judge Adams of the Iowa Supreme Court; George P. Waldron, William Tripp, W. W. Brookings, Dr. J. L. Phillips, and possibly some others.

In October following, Ezra Millard of Sioux City, later president of the First National Bank of Omaha, was employed by this company to go in quest of these remarkable falls and to make a townsite claim contiguous to them of 320 acres. Mr. Millard, in company with David M. Mills, also of or near Sioux City, started from this latter place in September, 1856, to explore the Big Sioux River and find these remarkable falls described by Nicollet. They were several days journeying along the Iowa side of the stream, examining it closely and following all of its multitudinous windings, apprehensive that the locality they were in search of was concealed in the woods and heavy underbrush that frequently dotted the margin of the river. At the expiration of the tenth day, as near as these explorers can estimate, they reached the summit of the bluff bordering the Sioux, about a mile below the island, where the great falls of the Sioux and the beautiful wooded island near the foot of the cascades burst like a magnificent vision upon their view and fairly entranced them as they sat in their wagon and silently studied the splendors of the scene. They realized for the time that they had found one of Nature's grandest marvels, that would become famous among the scenic splendors of the world.

These delightful sensations were, however, of brief duration, for even as they sat there drinking in the enchanting beauty of the scene, a band of red-skinned men, bedecked in the scant and hideous apparel of warriors, rose before them, and before our explorers could speak or had overcome a bit of their astonishment, two of the stalwart savages seized the horses by their bridles, wheeled them around with their backs to the magnificent picture, and, pointing south, spoke out in angry and sullen tones an order to the intruders to depart without a moment's lingering and go back where they came from. The situation was one that appealed very strongly to discretion and not at all to valor. The discoverers did not need a second order. The flashing eyes, the fiercely sullen expression, and the stifled gruffness of the command to "go," uttered with clenched teeth and with threatening gestures, were evidences that the Indians would admit of no parleying—not a word was uttered in reply—not even a backward look—but urging their weary animals into a double-quick they did not halt in their journey southward until they reached Split Rock River, some twelve miles away, and here they were compelled from sheer exhaustion to camp and spend the cheerless night. Early the following morning they were up and on the trail, and the second day after reached Sioux City, unimpaired in limb and loud in voicing the grandeur and value of their magnificent discovery, but somewhat reticent regarding the abruptness of their departure. Mr. Mills appeared to have been of that mold who would not easily accept defeat, particularly when the reward was great and the risk no greater than the menace of a few angry Indians, and a few weeks later found him alone on the trail again, bound for the Falls of the Sioux, which he reached. Having no unpleasant experiences, as pioneers view it, he took up a claim and built a sort of cabin, where he says he resided for a year, but it is more probable that he took a vacation for the winter and returned to his home further down the river or at Sioux City. His name does not appear among the settlers who came in during the year following and who are all presumed to be mentioned in the records.

Mills also took a personal claim, covering the northwest quarter of section 16, township 101, range 49, which included Brookings Island, and built himself a small 10 by 12 cabin on the island. (This land, the reader will understand, had been ceded by the Sioux treaty at Lake Travers and Mendota in 1851 and was open to settlement.)

In May, 1857, Jesse T. Jarrett, Barclay Jarrett, John McClellan, James Farwell and Halvor Oleson, employees of the Western Town Company of Dubuque, reached the falls. Jarrett (Jesse) was in charge of the party, and they took up 320 acres bordering the falls in the name of the Western Townsite Company for townsite purposes. The tract selected for the townsite was described as the northeast quarter of section 16 and the northwest quarter of section 9, township 101, range 49, to which they gave the name of "Sioux Falls."

In June following, Messrs. Franklin J. Dewitt, Alpheus G. Fuller, Sam A. Medary, Jr. (son of the governor of Minnesota Territory), J. K. Brown, W. K. Noble, S. F. Brown, J. L. Fiske, Artemas Gale, James M. Allen, James McBride, James Evans, James McCall, William Settley and Arnold Merrill, representing (as owners and employees) the Dakota Land Company of St. Paul, came to a point on the Minnesota River by steamboat—probably New Ulm—where they divided into two or three parties and pursued their journey overland to the Big Sioux River, the party headed by Dewitt striking the river the farthest north, where they located and improved a townsite which they named Medary. Another party struck the river farther south and located the Town of Flandreau, while the third party, headed by Smith and Fuller, with Noble, Gale, Allen, Kilgore and Fiske, made their way to Sioux Falls, arriving about June 20th, and were greatly surprised to find another party in possession, who had already made choice of and located the Dubuque company's townsite.

However, the St. Paul people concluded to make the best of conditions, and selected the 320 acres immediately adjoining the "Sioux Falls" townsite, and gave the title of "Sioux Falls City" to their selection, the Dubuque people having appropriated the title of "Sioux Falls."

This most important part of their mission accomplished—a townsite secured—the St. Paul people returned home, leaving their interests in charge of James L. Fiske and James McBride. There were five men in the Dubuque party, viz.: Jesse Jarrett, the superintendent; Barclay Jarrett, John McClellan, Farwell and Oleson, who with these two representatives of St. Paul, constituted a force of seven. These pioneers were then confronted with the growing antipathy of the Indians who had annoyed them by their presence and importunate attentions from their earliest arrival, but in July their conduct betrayed symptoms of extreme ugliness which culminated in an order to the whites to abandon their settlement and leave the country, or they would be driven off. The Indians were much more numerous than the whites. They claimed that the land was theirs, that they had not been consulted when the alleged treaty was made and did not recognize it. It is supposed that "Drifting Goose," a Yanktonnais chief, was at the head of these belligerently inclined redskins. He was recognized years later as the leader of a serious trouble in the James River country. An attempt was made to pacify the Indians with presents of blankets, sugar and bacon, but the truce induced by this means was of short duration, and finally the palefaces were informed that they must leave "before another sunset" or there would be trouble of a serious character. The settlers had become convinced that the Indians had imbibed the war spirit, and as they were outnumbered and not prepared for a battle or even a safe defense, they concluded to evacuate the place, which they did, taking with them their property. The Indians did not molest their persons, and had evidently concluded that the best way to avoid a visit from the soldiers, which they dreaded, was to get rid of the whites without a resort to arms. The Dubuque party loaded their portable goods into skiffs, and returned by the Big Sioux and Missouri rivers to Sioux City. The St. Paul parties returned home. The Dubuque representatives reported the hostile attitude of the Indians to the officers of the Western Town Company, who urged them to make another effort, prepared to defend themselves at the point of a gun, and also to construct fortifications that could afford protection in case the situation demanded it. It was the opinion of the leaders that the Indians would back down if they found that the whites were prepared to defend themselves.

Accordingly, supplied with abundant provisions and weapons of defense, on the 23d day of August, 1857, Jesse T. Jarrett, superintendent of the company, John McClellan, Dr. J. L. Phillips, W. W. Brookings, D. M. Mills, S. B. Atwood, A. L. Kilgore, Smith Kinsey, Mr. Godfrey, and James Callahan, all in the employ of the Western Town Company, reached the Falls from Sioux City, where they encamped, and began to make improvements upon the townsite which the company had taken. They had with them a sawmill, and the necessary mechanics' tools for constructing buildings, with a span of horses and a number of oxen. A little later Dr. Staples, president of the company, arrived, and soon after he deposed Mr. Jarrett from the superintendency, and appointed the young attorney, Mr. Brookings, to the position. Brookings was then twenty-four years of age, and had displayed the qualities of enterprise, energy and courage that recommended him for the leadership. The first work performed was the construction of a building and the installment of the sawmill; then followed a good stone building and also a frame store building. Indians annoyed them by running off their stock. Three dwelling houses were constructed. Early in the fall James M. Allen, William Little, James W. Evans, James L. Fiske, James McBride, James McCall and C. Merrill, superintendent, representing the St. Paul company, arrived, and these parties, with the Dubuque representatives, remained during the winter, during which season they erected a blockhouse near the island

The Legislature of Minnesota Territory created the County of Big Sioux in 1857, covering the same boundaries afterwards defined by a Dakota legislature as Minnehaha County, and also Midway County, adjoining on the north, with Medary, county seat, and in the year 1857 Governor Ramsey of Minnesota Territory appointed the following named officers for the new County of Big Sioux: County commissioners, William Little, James McBride, A. L. Kilgore; register of deeds, James M. Allen; sheriff, James Evans; judge of probate, James L. Fiske; district attorney, W. W. Brookings; justices of the peace, Dr. J. L. Phillips, James McCall.

The Legislature of Dakota Territory at its first session in 1862 passed an act legalizing the official acts of Allen and McCall that had been performed after the State of Minnesota was admitted into the Union in 1858.

Early in the summer of 1858 a band of Yanktonnais or Sisseton Indians, numbering about 100, appeared at Medary and demanded the immediate evacuation of the place. It is claimed that there were fourteen in the Medary party who remained there during the winter of 1857-58 and who built a few cabins and a blockhouse and began to prepare for farming in the spring of 1858. The Yanktonnais tribe, or a portion of it, had refused to recognize the treaty of cession made with the Sissetons and others, claiming that the Sioux Valley belonged to the whole Sioux Nation, and no tribe had any authority to cede it without the consent of all the tribes. These Indians had destroyed all the settlers' improvements in that portion of the valley, and informed the Medary people that they intended to burn their village, but would give them time to pack up their necessary raiment, and provision sufficient to last them until they could reach the white settlements in Minnesota. Major Franklin J. Dewitt, afterwards and for many years a prominent citizen of Yankton, was at Medary at this time, and was in favor of resisting the demands of the marauders; but the majority of the inhabitants, numbering a dozen in all, having made no preparation for suitable defense or protection, and taken wholly by surprise, felt compelled to submit. The Indians made no attempt to molest their persons, but burned the improvements that had been made, and then sent word to the settlers at Sioux Falls, by a half-breed Indian, demanding the immediate evacuation of the country; that they were on their way to the Falls and any white people found there would be driven off.

There were between thirty and forty settlers at Sioux Falls at this time, and after a council of war in which all participated, including the lone woman, Mrs. Goodwin, they resolved to remain and fight it out. They immediately set to work and constructed a substantial fortification of logs and sod enclosing the Dakota Land Company's buildings, named it Fort Sod, and prepared for a siege; but the Indians did not appear, having doubtless heard of the preparations made to receive them, and abandoned their hostile expedition at Flandreau. The incident, however, served to increase the uneasiness and anxiety prevalent among a portion of the people, and when the threatened war clouds drifted past, and the danger was over for the time, the Sioux Falls settlement lost nearly one-half its population.

In 1858, the Sioux Falls colony was increased by the arrival of John Goodwin and his wife, Charles S. White and wife and daughter Ella; also Amos Dooley (or Duley) and wife, all from Minnesota. Mrs. Goodwin may be claimed as the first white woman to settle in Dakota. Later the same year William Stevens, with a number of others, came in. The Mr. Dooley and wife above named returned to Lake Shetek, Minnesota, the following year, and were all taken prisoners by the Indians during the Little Crow massacre of 1862. Dooley was probably tomahawked and killed. His wife and one daughter were driven with other captives across to the Missouri above Fort Pierre and ransomed in December by Major Charles E. Galpin, brought to Yankton and sent back to Minnesota and Iowa.

In the fall of 1858 the settlement was augmented by the arrival of Samuel Masters, of New York; J. B. Greenway and wife, of Kentucky; George P. Waldron and wife, two daughters and a son, from New England; and Margaret Callahan, Mr. Waldron being a member of the Western Townsite Company. J. B. Barnes and Miss Callahan were soon afterward married, which was the first wedding in Dakota. J. W. Amidon and family, Henry Masters and son Samuel, John Lawrence, George Frosphonridge, J. B. Barnes, A. G. Fuller, John Rouse and B. C. Fowler and wife reached there the same year. Fuller was a member of the Dakota Land Co. In 1859 these were joined by Amos F. Shaw, S. J. Albright with a newspaper plant, James W. Lynch, Jefferson P. Kidder and Samuel F. and N. R. Brown.

The leading spirits in this Sioux Falls settlement were resourceful men of good ability and tireless energy, and the St. Paul parties represented some of the leading capitalists of New England. They were also backed by a number of the leading politicians of that day. The representatives of each company had come to Sioux Falls for the purpose of acquiring the water power and land adjoining in the interest of their companies, and to labor for the organization of the territory with the view of making Sioux Falls the capital. The political situation in the United States at that time apparently favored their plans and they went to work as men always do when they feel that their success is well assured.

They began in 1858 to make substantial improvements. W. W. Brookings had been appointed general manager of the interests of the Western Land Company and built a sawmill, a cornmeal grist mill and a stone dwelling. The Dakota Land Company built a large stone store building and a second stone building which was used for a printing office. The next important step taken by the Sioux Falls pioneers was a political movement. The settlers proceeded to organize what is called a provisional government for the purpose of promoting the early organization of the territory and securing its capital at Sioux Falls City. An election was held in October, 1858, and prior thereto certain notices were issued and posted, as is the usual custom. The first notice for the election in 1858 read as follows:

ELECTION NOTICE

At a Mass Convention of the People of Dakota Territory, held at the Town of Sioux Falls, in the County of Big Sioux, September 18th, 1858, all portions of the Territory being represented, it was Resolved and Ordered that an Election should be held for Members to compose a Territorial Legislature. In pursuance of said Resolution, notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 4th day of October, next, at the house of (John Smith) * in the town of (Sioux Falls,) in the County of Big Sioux, an Election will be held for (two) Members of the Council; and (five) Members of the House of Representatives, for said Legislature. The polls will be opened at 9 o'clock in the morning and close at 4 o'clock in the afternoon of said day.

The above notice would indicate that the plan at this time was to elect a Legislative Assembly only, the Legislature so elected to meet, elect a governor, and take steps to set the provisional government in motion. An election was duly held at Sioux Falls, but it is doubtful whether there was another poll opened in the territory, certainly none west of the Big Sioux. Encouraged by the precedent established at the time Wisconsin was admitted as a state, and its western connection left without a government, the Sioux Falls parties had some foundation for expecting the favorable recognition of Congress, and there was enough at stake to induce the Sioux Falls leaders to expend every effort that was made in behalf of their enterprise.

Nearly a year later, or in 1859, the prospect for recognition having possibly brightened, and possibly urged by the necessities of their situation, it was resolved to hold a special election and a notice, of which the following is a copy, was published:

TERRITORIAL CONVENTION

A convention of the Citizen of Dakota Territory will be held at the town of [blank], Sioux Falls City, on Saturday the 3d day of September next, for the purpose of nominat[blank]

* The words enclosed in parentheses indicate a blank, to be filled in as circumstances may require.

a Candidate for Delegate to represent the said Territory in the Congress of the United States during the ensuing two years.

Sioux Falls City, August 10th, 1859.

This was a territorial convention, and in accordance with the action thereof, Jefferson P. Kidder, who had come into the colony from St. Paul in 1859, was duly nominated for delegate to Congress.

The next was an election notice, and the plans appear to have undergone some modification since 1858, for now provision is made for the election of territorial, legislative and county officers. This formal notice was issued:

ELECTION NOTICE

Notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 12th day of September, 1859, at the several Election Precincts in the County of Big Sioux, an Election will be held for the following named officers, to-wit: A Governor; Secretary of the Territory; A Delegate to Congress; four Members of the House of Representatives; two Members of the Territorial Council; Judge of Probate, a District Attorney, three county Commissioners, a Sheriff, a Register of Deeds, a County Treasurer, a Coroner, two Justices of the Peace, two County Assessors, and two Constables. Election to be held in the First Precinct at the Dakota House; Second Precinct at the house of Henry Mathers; Third Precinct at the House of Charles Philbrick.

J. M. ALLEN,

Dated this 6th day of August, A. D. 1859.

Clerk Board County Commissioners.

The clerk omitted in this notice to state at what hour the polls would be opened and closed, which, however, was not a matter of serious importance under the circumstances.

Alpheus G. Fuller had been appointed a delegate to Congress from Dakota Territory by the officers of Midway County, at Medary, immediately after the admission of Minnesota into the Union in May, 1858, and had gone to Washington for the purpose of taking his seat. At Washington he was confronted by a formidable obstacle in the person of Delegate W. W. Kingsbury, who had been elected delegate from Minnesota Territory prior to the state's admission, and who was permitted to hold the seat for the term for which he was elected as delegate from the portion of the former Minnesota Territory not included within the boundaries of the new state; and who might therefore be held to have been the first delegate from Dakota. His term would not expire until the following March. Mr. Fuller, however, remained in Washington, and labored in behalf of the organization of the new territory.

The election at Sioux Falls was duly held on the 12th of September. The principal contest was between Jefferson P. Kidder and Alpheus G. Fuller. The election was not participated in by the settlers west of the Big Sioux River, and there is no evidence that these people knew there was an election; but the inhabitants of the Sioux Valley at Sioux Falls and north all participated and a full vote, practically, was secured, as will be seen from the following abstract issued after election by the provisional secretary of state:

Office of Secretary of Dakota Territory.

Abstract of Votes cast at the General Election held September 12th, 1859, for the Election of Delegate to Congress as per Return from the various Counties now on file in this office:

Big Sioux County, 1st Precinct,	J. P. Kidder,	287 votes
	A. G. Fuller,	28 votes
2d Precinct,	Kidder,	108 votes
	Fuller,	5 votes
Vermillion County,	Kidder,	52 votes
	Fuller,	none.
Midway County,	Kidder,	973 votes
	Fuller,	114 votes
Rock County,	Kidder,	60 votes
	Fuller,	none.
DeMott County,	Kidder,	110 votes
	Fuller,	none.
Total	Kidder,	1689 votes
	Fuller,	147 votes

It was claimed that Mr. Fuller was aggrieved at the action of the Sioux Falls convention in setting him aside and nominating Judge Kidder, deeming it a reflection upon his official course; and he came out as an independent candidate. The vote shows that Mr. Fuller was in the field; but the subsequent proceedings of the Sioux Falls colony were not disturbed by any manifestations of inharmony among the leaders.

Candidate Kidder seems to have enjoyed great popularity, and Midway County must have astonished even its most sanguine friends in getting all its voters to the polls. Medary, the county seat of Midway, was not a populous town, but it was surrounded by a region capable of sustaining a large population.

From one of the parties who participated in these exciting events it was learned that the Minnesota party, or at least a portion of it, made an earnest effort to promote the Town of Medary. The settlers there had a county organization, given them by the Legislature of the Territory of Minnesota, called Midway County, and Medary was the county seat.

Mr. Kidder received the certificate of election, repaired to Washington and made a very earnest effort to secure admission to the House as a delegate from Dakota. To sustain his claim, provided he had been properly elected and accredited, there were abundant precedents, but these precedents were all supported by a numerous body of people who were actual residents and citizens; while in this particular Dakota case it is questionable whether there were over fifty white people in the entire region described in the table of returns. Gen. William Tripp, at that time a member of the Western Town Company and a resident of Sioux City, visited Sioux Falls a few weeks after this election was held, and found about thirty people there, while the country north of the Falls was understood to be practically uninhabited. At this time the Yankton Treaty had been ratified, and the Indian title extinguished to all the land west of the Big Sioux, and north of the Missouri as far west as Medicine Knoll Creek, and settlements had been made at Big Sioux Point, Elk Point, Vermillion, James River, Yankton, Bon Homme, and opposite Fort Randall. These settlers do not appear to have participated in this election, and it was claimed that they were not consulted or even apprised of what their neighbors on the Upper Sioux were engaged in. Congress was aware of this situation and it doubtless had an influence in determining that body to refuse recognition to its accredited representative.

The Dakota Land Company located a number of towns in Dakota in 1858-59. The Dakota Democrat, the official organ of the company at Sioux Falls, printed a list of these locations as an advertisement. First was:

Renshaw, at the mouth of the Upper Coteau Percee, connecting with the Sioux at the Big Walnut Timber, twenty miles north of Medary and near Lake Preston. This location embraces 320 acres, well improved.

Medary, the county seat of Midway County, the first organized county in Dakota, situated on the Big Sioux at the crossing of the government road and twenty-five miles due west of Mountain Pass. Two hundred and twenty acres are script here.

Flandrau is the county seat of Rock County, at the junction of Coteau Percee with the Sioux, fifteen miles south of Medary. Six hundred and forty acres.

Sioux Falls City, established seat of government of Big Sioux County and the recognized capital of the territory, at the Falls of the Big Sioux, the head of navigation on that river, terminus of the Transit Railroad west, sixty miles south of Mountain Pass and 100 miles up from the Missouri. Three hundred and twenty acres.

Eminija is the county seat of Vermillion County, at the mouth of the Split Rock River and Pipestone Creek, on the Big Sioux, thirteen miles below the falls and at the most practicable head of navigation for large steamers. Six hundred and forty acres.

Commerce City is situated at the Great Bend of the Sioux on the Dakota side, half way between Sioux Falls City and the Missouri, a natural site for a town. Coal and timber plenty. At a point to which steamers of any class may ply in any stage of water. Three hundred and twenty acres.

In addition to the foregoing, the statement or report contains the operations of a party that had been sent over into the Missouri country to locate townsites. According to the report:

The expedition in charge of Messrs. Brawley and Smith, which left this city in June, have ere this time planted the flag of the Dakota Land Company on each valuable site that can be found between the mouth of the Big Sioux and old Fort Lookout on the Missouri, and on the James, Vermillion and Wanari (Choteau Creek) rivers. They have sounded to the points to which steamers may practically run, and there have also commenced the nuclei of towns. Their movements will be seconded by the more timid and adventurous, and the way being paved, a lively emigration will follow up. This party went down the river from Sioux Falls City by boat in the latter part of June on their way to the Upper Missouri. There are more than two thousand miles of navigable waters within the ceded portion of Dakota, and this company will have already secured the most desirable centers for trade and commerce, and governmental organization on all these rivers.

Any explanation of this unwonted activity in the location of townsites lies in the then prevailing speculative fever in western towns and lands. The new western states and territories had been the theater of exciting and profitable ventures in real estate, the market for the property being found in the eastern states. The Dakota Land Company located its selections with half breed scrip. This speculative interest had grown up during the early settlement of Kansas and its border war between the free state and pro-slavery parties. The people of all the states were warmly interested in this struggle, and this caused a large western emigration out of which real estate, whether farming lands or townsites, was in great demand.

The members of the Sioux Falls Legislature elected in September met at Sioux Falls in October and elected Samuel Masters governor, and passed a memorial to Congress praying for the organization of the territory. The proceedings of the Sioux Falls government were quite extensively published and must have led many people to believe that Dakota was duly organized and may have induced the immigration to the Missouri Valley during that year which came in only to be driven off by the military later.

Mr. S. J. Allbright of St. Paul established a weekly newspaper at the Falls in 1858 which he called the Dakota Democrat. It was the first newspaper published in what afterwards became Dakota Territory. As Mr. Allbright declares, his purpose in starting a paper at that time was in order to be on the ground when the territory was organized and Sioux Falls made the capital, in order to get the public printing, which he estimated would be worth several thousand dollars a year.

The Sioux Falls Legislature met again during the fall of 1859 and Governor Masters having died, Wilmot W. Brookings was chosen governor. The treaty with the Yanktons had been ratified and settlers were coming in to the Missouri slope country and taking up land. Already the population of the Missouri Valley was far ahead of the Big Sioux. It was apparent that if Sioux Falls was to succeed in her ambition, "delays were dangerous" and much depended upon the territory being organized at the earliest day possible, because of strong indications that there would be a change in the political complexion of the administration and in Congress at the election the following year, 1860, which in all probability would retire from influential positions a number of the prominent friends of Sioux Falls.

Strenuous efforts were made by those interested during the fall and winter of '59 but no results were obtained, and grave misgivings took the place of hope among the stout-hearted pioneers on the Sioux. It may be that the influence of the Yankton and Sioux City "rings" had been used to its detriment, for shortly after this failure the contest seems to have been dropped; the townsiters in great part returned to their former abiding places and the newspapers ceased to be published for a time. There were a number of the early settlers, however, who refused to acknowledge defeat, including W. W. Brookings, Dr. J. L. Phillips, Amos F. Shaw, John McClellan, George P. Waldron, Henry Masters, and

J. B. Amidon and family, who held on to their property and remained until compelled to leave during the Indian raids of August and September, 1862, following the Little Crow massacre.

There were even in these earliest days, as shown by the newspapers, manifestations of rivalry between Sioux City and Sioux Falls, and it would seem that the leading interests of the Iowa town were not in sympathy with the ambition of the active pioneers at the Falls of the Sioux.

DAKOTA'S FIRST DELEGATE, W. W. KINGSBURY

When Minnesota was admitted into the Union as a state in 1858, with its present boundaries, there was left a large portion of the former Territory of Minnesota outside the state on the west, including all of the present Territory of Dakota east of the Missouri River, that was left in a chaotic political condition. Minnesota had, while yet a territory, in 1857 elected Hon. W. W. Kingsbury as her delegate in Congress for two years, or until March 4, 1859, and Mr. Kingsbury was holding the seat at the time the state was admitted in 1858. About this time (1858) Mr. Alpheus G. Fuller appeared in Washington claiming that he had been appointed delegate to Congress from the aforementioned outlying territory, which his credentials designated as the Territory of Dakota. As Mr. Kingsbury disputed the Fuller title, and claimed that he was the delegate from the Territory of Minnesota which still existed in the portion not included within the boundaries of the state, the matter was taken up by the House, and Mr. Cavanaugh, a member, on May 28, 1858, presented a resolution reading as follows: "Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be authorized to inquire into and report upon the right of W. W. Kingsbury to a seat upon this floor as delegate from that part of the Territory of Minnesota outside the state limits."

Mr. Harris, of Illinois, presented the credentials of Alpheus G. Fuller as delegate from the same territory.

As reported in Volume 46 of the Congressional Globe, the whole matter was referred to the Committee on Elections. On June 2d Mr. Harris, chairman of the committee, submitted the majority report, holding that Mr. Kingsbury was legally elected delegate, on October 13, 1857, and that the admission of a state formed out of a part of that territory did not annul the election. The case of H. H. Sibley was cited. Mr. Sibley was elected delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin after the State of Wisconsin was admitted. He was elected from that portion of the territory not included in the state, and was allowed to take his seat by a vote of 124 to 62. In concluding, the report recommended that Mr. Kingsbury be allowed to retain his seat, and that the memorials of Mr. Fuller be given no further consideration.

A minority report, signed by Messrs. Wilson, Clark and Gilmer, decided in favor of Mr. Fuller. This report stated that Mr. Kingsbury was elected by the voters of the territory now comprising the state, and that those living in that part of the territory not included in the state were not allowed to vote. (This was denied by the majority report.) It was also held by the minority that Mr. Kingsbury lived in the State of Minnesota, not in the part of the territory left outside the state.

Mr. Fuller, in the course of his petition for a seat, said that he came "without form of law, but on the inherent principle of self government and protection."

Mr. Harris contended that it was not necessary for the delegate to live in the territory which he represented.

Israel Washburne, of Maine, supported Mr. Harris, declaring that there was both a state and a territory of Minnesota.

Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, held that there was no Territory of Minnesota, and hence that no one was entitled to a seat as delegate.

After much discussion, the majority report was adopted as before stated, and Mr. Kingsbury held his seat until March 4, 1859. He was therefore the first delegate to represent that portion of Dakota Territory east of the Missouri River that had formed a part of the Territory of Minnesota.

Sioux Falls had postal facilities as early as 1858 and received a mail twice a month from Henderson, Minnesota. Byron M. Smith was postmaster. About the 1st of March, 1859, a change for the better was made when the service was transferred from Henderson to Sioux City and thereafter the mail was delivered once a week by a man on horseback.

The effort to secure the organization of the Territory of Dakota in the interest of the Big Sioux Valley continued intermittently during the winter of 1859-60, but relaxed during the latter year, and the settlement made no progress during that or the following year of 1861.

In 1862, in August, the Little Crow Indian outbreak occurred in Minnesota, which was followed by a general Indian war. The hostile savages, being driven from Minnesota into Dakota, separated into small war parties and made a descent upon the Dakota settlements. Sioux Falls received the first fatal blow, losing two of its most valuable citizens, Judge J. B. Amidon and his son, who were killed while at work cutting hay.

These persons had gone out from their home in Sioux Falls in the morning intending to spend the day in the field. Night came and they did not return, which gave Mrs. Amidon much uneasiness and alarm, and she notified Lieutenant Bacon, who immediately instituted a search. The oxen were discovered fastened to the wagon, but neither Amidon nor his son could be found that night. At daybreak on the 20th the search was again undertaken and soon resulted in finding the bodies of both. The judge was found lying upon his face with a bullet wound in a vital place, and his son some distance away in a field of corn, to which he had probably fled upon being attacked. His body was perforated by ten or twelve arrows, which he had evidently pulled from his flesh and laid beside him before he died. The circumstances of the killing could only be conjectured. It was supposed that the Indians were concealed in the cornfield and by some device decoyed the son near their hiding place and then poured a volley of arrows into him; the father hearing the cries, started to his relief and was shot down with a bullet. The savages then made off without disturbing the oxen and wagon, their object having been attained apparently in the killing of the palefaces. The soldiers made an ineffectual effort to find the Indians, and their camp near town was fired into by a small band of mounted warriors, while the troops were out on this search. The Indians then made their way into the river bottom, which was covered with grass as high as a man's head, and with young timber, and were able to successfully elude the troops. At this time nothing was known at Sioux Falls of the Minnesota outbreak. This intelligence reached Yankton, however, and led Governor Jayne to dispatch two couriers to Lieutenant Bacon apprising him of the hostilities, and ordering him to evacuate the place and move the inhabitants to Yankton forthwith, it having occurred to the governor that the Indians who were driven out of Minnesota would strike for the Dakota settlement, which proved to be the case. This evacuation order was received on the 28th, and was put into execution the same day, the settlers reaching Yankton on the 30th, and bringing with them most of their personal effects. The Indians entered the Village of Sioux Falls very soon after the whites left and burned and destroyed all the improvements they were able to demolish and burn. The stone buildings defied their destructive efforts, though fires were kindled in all of them.

The Sioux Falls settlers who removed to Yankton at this time were W. W. Brookings, George P. Waldron and his family, Berne C. Fowler and wife (Mr. Fowler had been carrying the mail from Yankton to Sioux Falls during the summer), James W. Evans, Barclay Jarrett, Charles S. White and family, William Stevens and John McClellan.

Amos Shaw went to Vermillion and Dr. J. L. Phillips and Henry Masters and wife to Dubuque.

Lieut. James Bacon, of Company A, Dakota Cavalry, was in Sioux Falls at the time the Indians attacked and killed Judge Amidon and his son. He was in command of forty men of his company, and according to his own statement was encamped on the present site of the Cataract House. The Amidons were massacred in a cornfield adjoining the settlement on the north. Mr. Bacon relates the incident:

The shots which killed the men were plainly heard by myself as I was sitting at the lower fall in the river fishing, but thinking it some of my men hunting ducks in the slough, I paid no attention to it. About 10 o'clock that night, Mrs. Amidon came to my tent and reported the absence of her husband and son, expressing a fear that they had been killed by the Indians. At that time those here knew nothing of the Minnesota massacre. Search was made for the missing men that night, but owing to the intense darkness it was postponed until daylight when the bodies were found. The son, who was a hunchback, had a dozen arrows sticking in his hump. After removing the bodies to his camp, the lieutenant, with twenty-five men, took the trail of the raiders, who were a band of a dozen warriors from the Minnesota hostiles. The trail led around the north side of the penitentiary bluff, and upon reaching a point in view of the present site of the city, the Indians were discovered firing upon the boys in camp. We went to the relief of our comrades, and the Indians, who were afoot, struck west, crossing Covell's slough, and by that means escaped, as we were mounted and unable to follow. The Indians returned the same night and attempted to stampede our horses, but we were prepared for them and they abandoned the effort.

Next day I received orders from Yankton to evacuate Sioux Falls, and bring all the settlers to Yankton. The civilian population of the city on that date embraced only three families, namely, Mrs. Judge Amidon's remaining family, Capt. George P. Waldron and family, and a man named Foster and his family. Judge Brookings had left the place the day before the raid.

While the occupation of the country in the Sioux Valley by the whites, including Sioux Falls, and the initial settlements in the Missouri Valley at Yankton and opposite Fort Randall was contemporaneous, there appears to have been no concert of action between the communities, nor does it appear that either section was aware that there existed any other settlement in the proposed territory. Even as late as 1859, when the Sioux Falls parties were straining every energy to secure the organization of the territory, and even went so far as to hold an election and elect a congressman and territorial officers, the communities then existing on the Missouri at Elk Point, Vermillion, Yankton and Bon Homme appear to have been totally oblivious of these proceedings, while Sioux Falls, where a newspaper was occasionally published, was apparently in blissful ignorance of what was transpiring on the Missouri, and laboring under the impression that the Missouri country was an uninhabited wilderness, sent a party of men representing the Dakota Land Company to explore the Missouri Valley for the purpose of locating townsites. We infer from this adventure that the Sioux Falls people must have looked upon the Missouri Valley at that time as unoccupied.

It is probable, however, that the leaders of each section who were engaged in promoting the organization of the territory before Congress were informed of the ambition of a rival, and used "all honorable means" to checkmate him.

Sioux Falls and the Big Sioux Valley country north were made the Second Representative District by the proclamation of the governor calling the first election in 1861. At the election held in September of that year George P. Waldron received ten votes for member of the House of Representatives and James McCall one. Waldron was declared elected. W. W. Brookings, for councilman, received 9 votes; Cole, 5; and Wixson, 3, indicating that there were less than twenty votes in the representative district at that time.

In the Minnesota Historical Society Collections, 1895-98, will be found a sketch of the "First Organized Government of Dakota," written by Samuel J. Albright, then of New York, at the solicitation of Judge Charles F. Flandrau, of Minnesota, prefaced by an explanatory note by the judge, who says that the Sioux Falls settlement "presents the only actual attempt (except one earlier instance) to form a government on the principles of 'squatter sovereignty,' pure and simple, that has ever occurred in this country." Judge Flandrau then proceeds with his preface:

When Wisconsin was admitted into the Union of States, in the year 1848, the St. Croix River was chosen as its western boundary, leaving out the part of the County of St. Croix which lies between the St. Croix River and the Mississippi. Within the large territory so abandoned were the towns of Stillwater, St. Paul, St. Anthony Falls, and several other settlements. The inhabitants of this region at once set about finding some government for themselves, and decided that the remnant of Wisconsin Territory so deserted was still the Territory of Wisconsin. Governor Dodge, who was the governor of the territory, had been elected United States senator of the new State of Wisconsin, which left Mr. John Catlin, secretary of the territory, ex-officio governor of what was left of it. Mr. Catlin lived at Madison, and was invited to come to Stillwater and proclaim the territory still existent. He did so, and called for the election of a delegate to Congress. Henry H. Sibley was elected and when he arrived at Washington was acknowledged and given a seat as delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin, after which the Territory of Minnesota was, on March 3, 1849, duly organized, with its domain extending from the St. Croix to the Missouri.

When Minnesota, on the 11th day of May, 1858, was admitted into the Union, its western boundary was fixed by the Red River of the North and a line extending south from the foot of Big Stone Lake to the north line of Iowa, thus leaving out all the land extending west of this line to the Missouri River, which now belongs to the two Dakotas. The situation was identical with that presented on the admission of Wisconsin. Anticipating this condition, a number of enterprising men, a year previous, had determined to improve the opportunity of organizing a new territory out of the remnant which would be left of Minnesota, and to avail themselves of the advantages of being proprietors of the capital city and several lesser ones that might become the seats of the university, penitentiary, and other public institutions of the new territory. They did not adopt the plan that was so successful in the case of Wisconsin, by calling upon the governor to order an election for a delegate, for the reason, undoubtedly, that until the year 1857 there were no inhabitants of the remnant, save those residing at Pembina at the extreme north, who could hardly claim to be of sufficient importance to ask that they be recognized as a separate government, but, instead, they boldly took possession of the country with the determination of creating an entirely new government with the aid of Congress.

It must be remembered that Mr. Buchanan was then President, and that Minnesota was strongly democratic in its politics; but the republican party, then in its infancy, had gained great strength in Congress, and entertained hopes of electing the next President, which it did in 1860. This condition of things militated against the organization of a new territory, the officers of which would be democratic, and prevented the realization of the hopes of the adventurers who first settled in Dakota.

When the Sioux Indian war broke out in 1862, the remaining settlements on the Big Sioux were abandoned, and all the improvements were destroyed by the Indians. Shortly after the termination of the Indian war, a military post was established on May 11, 1865, at Sioux Falls for the protection of the surrounding country. This post, which was called "Fort Dakota," consisted of one company of cavalry at one time, and of infantry at another time, and was maintained until June 18, 1869, when it was abandoned, nothing remaining but the quarters occupied by the troops, and two men, Mr. C. K. Howard and Ed Broughton, who had acted as sutlers for the post. They operated a small trading house and dealt with the Indians. Broughton lived in the stone house on the river bank, which was built by the settlers from Minnesota. A few settlers found their way into the valley while the troops were there—a Mr. Jephtha Douling and his family, and several others. They supplied milk and vegetables to the soldiers.

This state of things continued until about June, 1869, when R. F. Pettigrew located at the falls. He found lying upon the rocks the platen of the newspaper press that had been used in the issue of the "Dakota Democrat" and has preserved it until the present time. Mr. Pettigrew has been very prominent in the progress of Dakota. He represented it in Congress as territorial delegate, and is now serving a second term as United States senator from South Dakota. I am indebted to him for some of the facts in this narrative.

About the year 1871, a brother of Senator Pettigrew found his way into the valley of the Big Sioux and located on the old site of Flandrau, about thirty-five miles above Sioux Falls, which town the old company had named in my honor. There was then no vestige of the former settlement. But a few Sisseton Indians were living there, and a man named Lew Hulett, a trapper, had built a shack in which he carried on a small trade with the Indians.

The site of Medary, one of the old locations, still farther up the river, was lost, and a new town by the same name was started a few miles from the old one; but that has also disappeared and the present town of Brookings, on the railroad, about six miles away, has taken its place. Since the second settlement of the valley of the Big Sioux, which may be said to have commenced about the time of the arrival of Mr. Pettigrew in 1869, the growth and progress of the country has been marvelous, and the success of the principal selections of sites for cities made by the original settlers—Sioux Falls, Flandrau and Brookings, the successor to Medary—proves conclusively the sagacity of these pioneers, as they are now all prominent localities in South Dakota.

The following letter, written by Charles E. Flandrau, of the Dakota Land Company, regarding the operations of that organization, will prove of interest:

St. Paul, Minn., September 3, 1879.

Edward Ely, Esq.,
Winona, Minn.

Dear Sir:

In response to your letter of August 15, 1879, asking me for information concerning the origin and early history of the Town of Flandrau, in Dakota Territory, I am glad to say that I am in possession of the facts you seek to know and that I give them to you with pleasure because there seems to be a good deal of misapprehension among the people of that place about its origin. Being somewhat of an "old settler," I take great interest in all that concerns the history of this portion of the Northwest, and like to see the facts correctly stated. It happened thus: In the early part of the year 1857 we all felt pretty sure that the State of Minnesota would be admitted into the Union upon what we then called the "north and south" line of division, which was the line finally adopted. There was a strong party in favor of a state upon the "east and west" line of division which would, if adopted, have cut the territory in two upon a line just north of Minneapolis, making the state out of the south portion and leaving the territory or remnant north of that line.

You will remember that when Wisconsin was admitted on the western boundary of the St. Croix River, it left all the country west of that river in an unorganized condition, and that the inhabitants held a convention and elected Gen. H. H. Sibley as a delegate to Congress as an experiment, and that he was admitted to a seat and the act of Congress of 1849 was soon after passed organizing the Territory of Minnesota. We anticipated just such a condition of things on the admission of Minnesota, and concluded we would occupy the territory west of the new state, send a delegate to Congress, secure the capital, university, penitentiary and other public buildings at our own towns and make a good speculation out of the enterprise. To enable us to accomplish this a corporation was organized, under an act of the Legislature of the Territory of Minnesota, passed May 23, 1857, which was entitled "an act to incorporate the Dakota Land Company." The original incorporators were W. H. Nobles, J. R. Brown, A. G. Fuller, S. A. Medary, Samuel F. Brown, James W. Lynch, N. R. Brown, F. J. Dewitt, and F. Freiderich. The corporation was vested with full powers for the purchase and entry of land, and the doing of anything that was necessary to establish towns and cities anywhere in the territory or future state.

Under this organization agents were sent into the Southwest and sites for several cities selected, among which were Sioux Falls City, Medary, and Flandrau, all on the Big Sioux. Sioux Falls was designated for the capital of the future territory, and the other places were to share the government prizes. Mr. A. G. Fuller was selected a delegate to Congress and went to Washington, but was never admitted to a seat, notwithstanding the precedent of General Sibley's admission in 1848 from Minnesota. Sioux scrip was laid upon lands, but at a subsequent date was withdrawn. Very considerable improvements were made by the company at all places, but especially at Sioux Falls City, where a capitol building was erected, a hotel built and a printing office established, with Sam Albright as editor, and a very handsome newspaper was published there called the Dakota Democrat, of which I now have a copy of the issue of August 5, 1859, being Vol. 1, No. 2 of the paper.

The efforts of Mr. Fuller in Washington and of other friends of the organization, failed to procure a territorial government for Dakota for several years, and my opinion has always been that the delay was on account of all of the members of the Dakota Land Company being democrats, and Congress, expecting a change of administration in 1860, desired to postpone the erection of a territorial government until the other party could control it. At any rate they did postpone it until March 1, 1861, when the act was passed organizing Dakota Territory and leaving the selection of the seat of government to the governor.

During this delay, however, a serious state of things existed. The people of the territory becoming impatient at the delay, organized a state government, elected first Henry Masters, then Sam Albright, governor, chose a Legislature which assembled at Sioux Falls and passed laws, which were duly printed and approved by Governor Albright, and demanded admission to the Union, "on an equal footing with the original states," but Congress was inexorable, and all the time and money spent by the company in this direction was lost.

When the Sioux outbreak occurred, in August, 1862, all the improvements at Sioux Falls, Flandrau and Medary were burned by the Indians and the places were virtually abandoned by the company. The United States Government made reparation to the company for its losses, which enabled it to make its first and only dividend on its capital stock. This is briefly the history of the Town of Flandrau up to the time when its present title was made by new comers and about which I know very little. Sioux Falls City, as its name indicates, was called after the falls in the Big Sioux, at which place it is located. Medary was named after Gov. Samuel Medary, who was then governor of the Territory of Minnesota, and the Dakota Land Company did me the honor to name the Town of Flandrau after me.

The facts given you are largely from recollection, but they are substantially correct in all essential particulars. I would suggest, however, that Mr. Alphens G. Fuller, who now resides at or near Yankton, Mr. L. J. Dewitt, who I believe also resides at Yankton or somewhere on the Missouri in the territory; Captain Fish, who is now in Pembina; Daniel F. Browley, who I believe resides in Winnipeg, all were intimately connected with the operations of the Dakota Land Company, and can undoubtedly give you accurate information as to the history of the Town of Flandrau, and being old settlers, will willingly recount the experiences of the past.

Respectfully yours,

CHAS. E. FLANDRAU.

Judge Flandrau, of Minnesota, having given out a statement regarding the earliest settlement of Sioux Falls, in which errors were alleged by one of the pioneers who made up the very earliest company of settlers, Judge Wilmot W. Brookings, who participated in that settlement, took occasion to correct the erroneous statements of Judge Flandrau. It can be stated as a historical fact that Judge Brookings was better qualified to give a correct statement of that pioneer settlement, because he was on the ground and prominently identified with the work that was accomplished, overseeing much of it himself and participating in all of it, while Judge Flandrau was but a stockholder in the Dakota Land Company, the St. Paul incorporation, and was never at Sioux Falls or in the Sioux Valley during the years included in the history of this first occupation. Inasmuch as the statement of Judge Brookings corroborates, in every particular, the version of this important event, already a part of this history, it is given entire, as follows. Mr. Brookings addressed his communication to the Sioux Falls Press:

The letter of Judge Flandrau, taken from the Winona Republican, and published in your issue of the 15th of December, 1888, inclines one who knows the actual facts to the belief that much of what is called history is probably fiction. Perhaps the best way to point out the many errors of the judge would be to give the facts as known by one who was living at Sioux Falls at the time, and was part of the history that is endeavored to be related.

What the judge says about the organization of the Dakota Land Company is undoubtedly true, and certain members of the company came to Dakota as he related, in the spring of 1857, and for the purpose probably as he states. Their first townsite on the Sioux was Medary, named after the governor of Minnesota Territory. Their second, Flandrau, named after the judge himself, but when they arrived at Sioux Falls they found the site of the falls occupied by a party sent out by the Western Town Company of Dubuque, Iowa. Among the members of the latter company were the then Mayor Hetherington of the City of Dubuque, Iowa; Hon. S. P. Adams, since chief justice of Iowa; Dr. George M. Staples, Gen. William Tripp, Hon. George P. Waldron, and Colonel Mahoney, afterwards editor of the Dubuque Herald. This company had been organized for about the same purpose as the Dakota Land Company. It had, as early as the month of October or November, 1856, employed Ezra Millard, late president of the Millard National Bank of Omaha, to proceed to this section of Minnesota Territory and to take up a townsite of 320 acres at the falls of the Big Sioux. Mr. Millard, accompanied by D. M. Mills, who now lives on the Sioux River about sixteen miles above Sioux City, visited Sioux Falls late in the autumn of 1856, arriving late one rainy evening, but still rejoiced that they had found the coveted spot. They came up on the east side of the river, through what is now the Village of Brandon, following the course of the river so that the first full view of the falls was from the high bluffs near the present brewery. Their mode of conveyance was a light two-horse wagon. After viewing the picturesque beauty of the falls for a moment they concluded to drive down the bluffs and camp for the night near the lovely islands at the head of the falls. But to their astonishment they had no sooner reached their beautiful resting spot than a party of Sioux Indians appeared on the scene, took their horses by the bits, turned them around, and in the Indian language indicated so strongly that safety depended upon their immediately retracing their steps back to Iowa, that Messrs. Millard and Mills, without any ceremony, concluded to let the Sioux roam over the valley of the Sioux for a while longer unmolested by the pale face, and traveled back twelve miles that same evening. Some two months later Mr. Mills returned and built a small log cabin on the island, and then returned to his home on the lower Sioux for the balance of the winter.

In May following (1857), Jesse T. Jarrett, John McClellan, and Messrs. Farwell and Olsen arrived in Sioux Falls in the interest of the Western Town Company, and were here when the members of the Dakota Land Company arrived. The prospect was so inviting that the latter company concluded to take up 320 acres immediately south, and upon the river near the falls, secured by the Western Town Company. These parties from both companies were driven off early in July following by the Indians.

On the 25th day of August, 1857, a party of nine persons came to Sioux Falls in the interest of the Dubuque party, among whom were Dr. J. L. Phillips and W. W. Brookings, who afterward became permanent settlers. A month later the St. Paul party sent out seven men and during the winter of 1857-58, eighteen persons wintered at the falls. In the spring following enough came in to make the number sixty or seventy. Two women came in the summer of 1858—Mrs. Goodwin and Mrs. White, the latter having a daughter some three years old, the first white child ever in Sioux Falls.

In the latter part of October, 1858, an election was held for members of the Legislature and delegate in Congress, and A. G. Fuller was elected to Congress, although at that time his home must have been at St. Paul. The Legislature, a few days after the election, assembled here. Henry Masters was elected president of the council, and S. J. Albright, speaker of the House, and passed a memorial to Congress, praying that this portion of the Territory of Minnesota, not included in the State of Minnesota, might at once be organized into the Territory of Dakota. Also passed a law extending the laws of Minnesota Territory over the proposed Territory of Dakota (although they must have been in force without any such act), and also passed a few other acts and memorials. Thus far there had been no governor, and by a joint resolution the president of the council was declared the ex-officio governor. So Mr. Masters became governor, and the first session of the squatter Legislature for Dakota adjourned.

In the following autumn, 1859, a new election took place, and Hon. J. P. Kidder was elected delegate, although he lived in St. Paul, and Henry Master was nominated for governor, but died a few days before election, and S. J. Albright was elected governor. He was in St. Paul at the time and refused to serve, and had himself returned as a member of the lower house, which was easily done, although he may not have received any votes for the Legislature. He seemed to have a strong desire to be speaker of the lower house, which was the height of his ambition. The Legislature met about the same time in 1859 as in the year preceding. W. W. Brookings was elected president of the council and Albright speaker of the House. The only business done was again to memorialize the new Congress to organize the Territory of Dakota, and also pass a few more unimportant memorials. At the close of the session the president of the council was again declared governor ex-officio, and W. W. Brookings acted as governor instead of Albright, and the only acts that the writer remembers of the second governor signing was a certificate of election as delegate to Congress for J. P. Kidder, and several memorials to Congress, and after the Legislature of 1859 adjourned, no more were held.

When Judge Flandrau says laws were passed, which were duly printed and approved by Governor Albright, and demanded admission to the Union "on an equal footing with the original states," he draws wholly upon his imagination, for no such demand was ever made or desired, but the entire effort was to secure a territorial organization. The reason why a territorial organization could not be secured was that the House was republican and wanted a clause inserted in the organic act or law prohibiting the taking of slaves into the territory. This the democrats opposed and the Senate was democratic. So that no bill passed until the southern members left Congress, which left a majority of republicans in the Senate. However, after the southern members seceded, the organic act was silent on the slavery question.

Where the Dakota Land Company made the mistake was when Minnesota was admitted to statehood they did not induce the territorial officers to move to that portion of the territory not included in the state boundary and continue the government of Minnesota Territory. Had they done this they would undoubtedly have been recognized by Congress, for Buchanan, who was Polk's secretary of state, favored the recognition of Wisconsin Territory after the State of Wisconsin had been admitted to the Union as a state, and this was the ground taken by many republicans. The writer at the time received a letter from Hon. Israel Washburn, then a prominent republican member of Congress, saying it was the President's duty to appoint all the usual territorial officers of the Territory of Minnesota, as the state enabling act did not interfere with the territorial organization outside of the state limits.

The vote of the House of Representatives to admit J. P. Kidder was about equally divided, he being defeated by only a few votes, and this was brought about by the persistent opposition of Gen. J. B. S. Todd of the Missouri slope, and General Frost of St. Louis, who had large interests at Yankton, and were fearful that if Kidder should be admitted as delegate, the capital would go to the Sioux Valley instead of the Missouri. So that then, as at present, jealousies kept back our recognition.

When Judge Flandrau says a capitol building was erected, he again draws on his imagination or received his information from someone who misinformed him, as no such building was ever erected. The Dakota Land Company constructed a log house here, one story, about sixteen by twenty; a stone house about eighteen by twenty, one and one-half stories in height, set in mud or mortar. Also a printing office building of stone about twenty feet square, one story, with shed roof, all their buildings not exceeding the value of $1,500. It would be interesting to know how much they received from the Government for their improvements, a better sale probably than could have been made to any one else.

Originally, it was evidently the intention to make Medary the capital, consequently it was then named for the then governor of Minnesota Territory, but in 1858, both the Medary and Flandrau settlements had ceased to exist, consequently the squatter Legislature was compelled to meet at Sioux Falls City, as they called their site here. Our impression is that but one issue of the Dakota Democrat came out in 1858, and that was filled with argument in favor of a territorial organization. The next season a number of issues were printed.

In 1860 the paper was printed by Mr. Stuart, now of the Chicago Times staff, and the name changed to Western Independent for the reason that Mr. Albright had taken the heading away with him, and the changed heading was found in Sioux City. The errors of the republican editorial correspondent of the 15th inst. are the result of Judge Flandrau's retutation and one disposes of the other.

Like Judge Flandrau, "I take great interest in all that concerns the history of this portion of the Northwest, and like to see the facts correctly stated," and having been a resident of Sioux Falls from 1857 to 1862, ought to have a better knowledge of them than the judge. This is my only excuse for sending you this communication, although I was once solicited to write up the history of that attempt at government for the Minneapolis Tribune. The main facts are given here, and all that seems worth preserving.

W. W. BROOKINGS.

Mr. Alpheus G. Fuller remained in the territory and removed to Yankton agency in 1860, where he kept the hotel and boarding house and also engaged in Government contracting at Fort Randall; J. P. Kidder returned to St. Paul and to the practice of his profession and in 1865 was appointed associate justice of Dakota Territory; and F. J. Dewitt and B. M. Smith also went to St. Paul, both coming to Yankton later.

Regarding the publication of the newspaper at Sioux Falls and the date of certain settlements, a letter is hereto appended which tells the whole story. The writer of the letter was on the ground at the time, and among the most active of the colonists:

Yankton, D. T., November 1, 1882.

George W. Kingsbury, Esq.

Dear Sir: In reply to your inquiry of this date, I will say that the first settlements, at Sioux Falls, Flandrau and Medary, were made during the months of May and June, 1857. The Dakota Democrat was first published at Sioux Falls City (now Sioux Falls), July 2, 1859. It was issued once or twice a month from that time until March, 1860, by Samuel J. Albright, editor and proprietor. Editor Albright went East in March, 1860, hence the publication was suspended until December, when it was revived under the name of the Western Independent and published semi-occasionally until March, 1861, by I. W. Stewart.

F. J. DEWITT.

The writer, Major Dewitt, referring to the first settlement of Sioux Falls, must allude to the first settlement by the Dakota Land Company, the Western Land Company of Dubuque, having erected a cabin there in December, 1856, and its representatives were there in 1857, when the representatives of the Dakota Land Company arrived.

As there has been some controversy regarding the time when the first settlement of Sioux Falls was made, the following excerpt from a letter written by Hon. David M. Mills, in January, 1868, who was at that time a member of the Territorial Council from Union County, is the best authority on that point. Mr. Mills, who was writing of the natural resources of the Big Sioux Valley and of Sioux Falls, says:

One very prominent feature in the Big Sioux River is its innumerable mill privileges. It would be speaking within the bounds of truth to say that there might be one mill put in operation on every mile of the river from Sioux Falls to the mouth of the Rock River, a distance by the river of over one hundred miles, and in many places. I doubt not, more than one. Before closing, I desire here to notice in a brief manner the famous waterfall on the Sioux River, nine miles west of the point where the Iowa state line touches the Sioux River. In the month of October, 1859, the first settlement was made at this place by myself. I continued to reside at the place, a portion of the time, for about one year.

D. M. MILLS.

AN INDIAN LIGHT AT SIOUX FALLS

About the 1st of November, 1862, Captain Miner, with a detachment of eleven men from Company A, escorted a part of the Sioux Falls people who had been compelled to evacuate that town in August, from Yankton to Sioux Falls, for the purpose of securing some household goods and other property belonging to them which they were unable to carry away at the time of their hurried departure and which they endeavored to secrete in the most secure buildings of the town. The civilians of the party were George P. Waldron, B. C. Fowler, J. W. Evans, Barclay Jarrett, W. W. Brookings and A. G. Fuller. The party reached Sioux Falls the evening of the second day and camped out on the outskirts of the village. The next morning they moved into Sioux Falls, and while breakfast was being prepared, Captain Miner discovered a number of men on horseback on a hill about a mile away, but he could not distinguish whether they were Indians or whites. Taking with him Corporal Joe Ellis to act as interpreter, he rode out toward them and very soon discovered that they were Indians, who then galloped down the hill and into a ravine, at the mouth of which was a small tract of level prairie covered with tall grass. Miner beckoned to the Indians, giving them to understand that he wanted to talk with them, whereupon four of the redskins rode up within pistol range. The captain then asked through Interpreter Ellis: "Where did you come from?" The answer was, "The Minnesota River." He then asked, "What are you doing here?" The answer was, "What is your business here?" accompanied by language and gestures that meant defiance and trouble. The captain then fired his pistol, which was the signal for his men left in camp to join him. Meantime the Indians returned to the tall grass at the mouth of the ravine, and as the troops came up on a gallop they were received with a volley of rifle balls poured at them by ten or twelve Indians secreted near the entrance to the ravine. The order to charge was then given, when the hostiles scattered, firing and galloping off. Miner pursued them about two miles, but their ponies were swifter on the prairie than cavalry horses, and they escaped. One giant of an Indian, however, laboring under great excitement and anger, leaped from his pony during the pursuit and signaled to the others to do the same, but they gave no heed to his signal, and made off into a body of timber that skirted the river. Corporal Ellis was in the advance, and as he rode up the Indian discharged his gun at him, and then clubbing it, struck a vicious blow at Ellis in the saddle. The corporal parried the clubbed gun with his sabre, breaking the gun stock. Just then Privates Charles Wright and Josiah Gray rode up, and Wright sent a ball from his carbine into the enraged Indian that brought him to his knees but did not kill him. The Indian then drew his long knife and made a desperate lunge at Ellis, missing him but wounding the corporal's horse in the neck. Ellis then dispatched the plucky and desperate foe with his sabre. The remainder of the Indians were now in the timber, and the balls from their guns were flying about the troops, indicating that the Indians were getting the range and might become serious. Miner then concluded to retire and not risk a battle with a secreted foe, influenced by the responsibility he felt for the civilians whom he had escorted and who relied upon him for protection, and who would have become an easy prey for the redskins had the soldiers suffered a defeat. He therefore permitted the boys to take a lock of the dead Indian's hair, but would not suffer him to be scalped. Then firing the prairie grass, the soldiers galloped back to camp and breakfasted. The Indian who met his death had on a soldier's jacket, and two "civilized" bed quilts were rolled up and tied to his saddle. After breakfast the captain, with a portion of his men, visited the place where the Indians were first discovered at the ravine, found their camp and captured two light wagons, one harness and some camp utensils. Five newly slaughtered hogs were found, indicating that the Indians had also gone out to battle before breakfast. It was estimated that there were twenty Indians in the band, and that they composed a small war party that had cut themselves off from Little Crow and started on a pillaging expedition to the Dakota settlements. Little Crow had retired from Minnesota to Devil's Lake, North Dakota.

FRANKLIN J. DEWITT

This was the first time the boys composing this detachment had been under fire of the enemy, and their deportment was warmly commended by their captain, who mentioned Corporal Ellis and Privates Charles Wright, Josiah Gray, John Bradley, Robert Buckheart, R. Alderson, B. Bellow and J. Ludwig as deserving of especial praise. Privates Wright, Gray and Buckheart are citizens of Yankton at this time, 1904. John Bradley, now dead, was a brother of Henry Bradley, of Yankton.

This was the first conflict between the Dakota troops and the hostile redmen in which an Indian was known to be slain, though Sergeant English reported the supposed killing of one of the band which raided the settlements on James River early in September.

During the six years following, Sioux Falls remained unoccupied by the whites, save by a company of Iowa troops stationed there in a fort constructed by the general Government in 1865, named Fort Dakota, which was maintained until 1869, when the country was thrown open. Quite a number of settlers had made their way into the County of Minnehaha, outside the military reserve, during 1867-68, and had not been disturbed by Indians, and no further annoyance from this source was experienced.

In the year A. D. 1857 what is now known as the City of Yankton, in South Dakota, was an Indian village occupied by the Yankton tribe of Dahkotah Indians, and was the residence of its principal and most influential chief, Pe-la-ne-a-pa-pe, which, translated into the English, reads "Man that was struck by the Ree." Being the home of the head chief and the seat of the tribe's most important councils, this was the principal village, or capital, of the Yankton tribe. It was known among the whites at and before this time as "Struck by the Ree Camp," and this locality had been designated by traders and steamboatmen as the Yankton Valley. The great majority of the Indians, when not absent on the hunt or engaged in trapping, dwelt along the banks of the Big Sioux, Vermillion and James rivers, where their lodges were sheltered by the heavy timber, with fuel and water abundant and convenient. An Indian burial ground occupied a tract about midway between Yankton and the James, as the road is now located, situated in the vicinity of what Yankton people know as the Risling farm. The Yankton Indians claimed complete ownership of the soil in Southern Dakota west of the Big Sioux River, which claim was disputed by other tribes of the Dahkotahs, and was not finally conceded, if at all, until some time after the treaty of cession of 1859. While the Yanktons hunted and trapped over a large area, the great majority recognized Strike the Ree Camp as their principal village and their sachems assembled here whenever an important council was to be held, and here at least once a year an embassy from the "Great Father" at Washington was accustomed to visit them by steamboat, with gifts in token of the Great Father's paternal regard and evidence of his friendship and good will. The plains and streams of this Dakota country abounded in fur-bearing animals and the traffic in this merchandise brought independent traders among them, while a number of trading posts, representing various fur companies, had been maintained in their country for scores of years.

Strike the Ree, or "Old Strike," as he was called by the pioneers, the head chief of the Yanktons at the time this local history begins, was a very able Indian and chieftain, endowed by nature with many of the qualities of leadership, a consistent and lifelong friend of the white people, and a model ruler of his tribe. He had distinguished himself on the warpath when his tribe was engaged in conflict with the red men of other nations, but was esteemed more for his ful victories than as a warrior. He was regarded by the braves of his own and other tribes as a wise chieftain with a good, kind heart, who sought at all times to promote the welfare and best interests of his people. He seemed to realize that fate had decreed the subordination of the Indians to the civilization of the paleface, and was therefore a friend of the whites from motives of self-interest, or the interest of his people, as well as influenced by a nature genial and peaceful and an ambition to improve the condition of the Indians by emulating the virtues of civilization. He was the "Grand Old Man" of the aboriginal inhabitants of Dakota and possessed in a remarkable degree their confidence. He was inflexible in pursuing a policy of peace with the whites and cultivating the friendship of the "Great Father" at Washington, and was therefore not disposed to resist unreasonably the encroachments which the whites were making upon the Indian domain. He felt that this was inevitable, and if he did not invite it, he was too wise to oppose it by force, and was wise enough to make the best of it.

The Yanktons had other villages or camps under the rule of subordinate chiefs. One of these was situated in the immediate valley of the Missouri, about three miles west of the Western Portland Cement plant and was known as "Smutty Bear's" camp, the chief of that band being a celebrated warrior named Ma-to-sa-be-che-a, or, translated into the English, the "Smutty Bear." There was also a camp of the Yanktons on the east side of the James River near the present wagon bridge. This was the band under the command of "Feather-in-the-Ear," a redoubtable Yankton brave.

Another band, under "Mad Bull," had a permanent camp on the Vermillion, and there were two bands whose local habitations were on the Big Sioux and in the valley of Brule Creek. "Rain-in-the-Face" was located at Emanuel Creek, now in Bon Homme County, and there were others farther up the river, even as far away as Fort Pierre and above, who seldom visited this section and who took little part in the councils of the tribes.

On the 12th day of May, 1857, William P. Lyman, who had been connected with the military expedition of General Harney through Nebraska Territory in 1855, came down from Fort Randall and established a ferry on James River, near the site of the present wagon bridge, and near the military trail from Sioux City to Fort Randall. The ferryboat used by Lyman was built at Randall and by him floated down the Missouri and up the James to the crossing, where it formed a very useful link in the Government military highway between Sioux City and the fort. Before the Lyman ferry was put in, the Government road crossed the James at a fording place a few miles north of the ferry site, following an old trail made by Lieutenant Warren in 1855, along the high land and passing three or four miles north of Yankton. After the establishment of the ferry, that road was abandoned, and travel patronized the road by way of Yankton. Up to this time, May 12, 1857, there was not a "pale face" known to be living in what is now Yankton County, or west of the Vermillion River. Lyman must therefore be credited with the title of first white settler, because he continued to reside here with his Indian family until he was carried farther west by the Black Hills wave of emigration in 1876. He was in the employ of Frost, Todd & Company, composed of D. M. Frost, of St. Louis; J. B. S. Todd, of Fort Randall, and Lewis H. Kennedy and Edward Atkinson, of Sioux City, a mercantile association that held a permit from the Government to engage in traffic with the Indians at various points in the territory, and under the authority of this license Lyman superintended the construction of a ferry house and trading post on the east bank of the James River at the ferry crossing.

The firm of Frost, Todd & Company also kept a general store in Sioux City, and was evidently preparing to become more deeply interested in the fur traffic. A little later, during 1857 and early in 1858, the firm constructed other trading posts along the Missouri Valley between the Big Sioux and Fort Pierre, ostensibly at least, for the purpose of carrying on a traffic with the Indians, though in the light of subsequent events it would appear that these improvements were also designed to secure certain preferred privileges which were made to such parties under the treaty then in contemplation, under the leadership of Todd, Picotte, Strike the Ree, Brughier, Rencontre, and others—a treaty that was consummated two years later and which effectually and forever did away with the special license feature of trade in this country where these trading posts were being erected. Captain Todd, as he was then called, was the active representative and manager of the affairs of D. M. Frost & Company and Frost, Todd & Company, in Dakota.

The work of constructing the trading post on the James was completed during the month of June, Lyman being assisted by Samuel Mortimer (known among the pioneers as "Spot"), Samuel Jerou, A. B. Smith and Arthur C. Van Meter, a French-Canadian, whose residence a portion of the time was on the Vermillion River, and who later made a permanent settlement in Clay County, and who about 1880 removed to Fort Pierre, near which place he died many years later. Van Meter was connected with the Yankton tribe by marriage, his wife being a very intelligent half-breed; and about this time he was engaged in carrying the United States mail and express from Sioux City to Fort Randall, making a round trip once a week and using two horses in his journeys, one of which he rode, while the other was the pack animal.

The James River settlement, of which Lyman was the pioneer and patriarch, was the sum total of "civilized encroachment" in what is known as the Missouri Slope counties west of the Big Sioux at the close of the year 1857, and this settlement was made up of the persons above named. This little colony of frontiersmen spent the winter at the ferry house and trading post, and its members employed their time hunting, trapping, fishing and getting out cabin timber. An occasional trip to Sioux City relieved the monotony of pioneering in their bachelor quarters and enabled them to replenish their slender store with such viands as were almost indispensable to the social enjoyment of pioneers situated as they were. Many of the Yankton Indians had erected winter quarters in the shelter of the heavy timber along the river, preferring a wigwam in the forest to a dirt lodge on the prairie. About a thousand Indians of all sexes and ages were estimated to be in camp in that vicinity during the winter of 1857-58, and a more orderly and peaceful community could hardly be found in any part of the world, however civilized. Muskrat were abundant and thousands were taken. Beaver were quite plentiful and their furs this winter were uniformly of superior quality. The beaver had constructed an excellent dam across the river about three miles below the ferry house, exhibiting an intelligence almost human in the character of the work, which was formed by trees nearly a foot in diameter, through which the animals had gnawed and felled in such a manner as to support the wall of mud which they had applied in great abundance. This dam was on exhibition for many years after the whites occupied the country, and belonged to the preemption claim of Dr. Van Osdel.

In February, 1858, the Upper Missouri Land Company was organized at Sioux City, made up of J. B. S. Todd, D. M. Frost, Lewis H. Kennerly, Edward Atkinson, A. W. Hubbard (afterwards a member of Congress from Iowa), Dr. J. K. Cook, Dr. S. P. Yeomans and Enos Stutsman, who was the secretary and executive officer. Under the direction and with the support of this company a movement was set on foot having for its purpose the making of a treaty with the Yankton Indians for the cession of a large tract of their Dakota domain. A treaty delegation was selected, composed of Captain Todd, Charles F. Picotte (an educated Yankton half-breed), W. P. Lyman, Zephyr Rencontre, Theophilis Brughier, the last named a French Canadian who had married a half-breed Sioux wife, whose home just below the mouth of the Big Sioux had been a landmark for a quarter of a century, and continued to be occupied by himself and his quarter-breed descendants up to the beginning of the present century. There were with twelve or fifteen of the most influential warriors of the Yankton tribe, including "Old Strike," were sent to Washington for the purpose of effecting a treaty of cession, the details of which had been already practically agreed upon. This delegation set out at once for the national capital. The facilities for travel were very limited at that time, even through the great State of Iowa, and the party was obliged to make the trip to Iowa City, the nearest railroad point, or if not the nearest, the most convenient to reach, in three lumber wagons, and although all of them were accustomed to the privations that frequently beset the pioneer and inured to all sorts of weather, they all suffered intensely crossing the Iowa plains. It was a cold month and there had been considerable snow piled up in drifts along the road, which at times was no road at all. At one place on the route they encountered a big snowdrift near an open slough, and in their efforts to cross, Picotte's wagon upset and he found himself in the snow and mud at the bottom of the entire load and three or four stalwart Indians on top of him. Nearly a week was consumed when the delegation reached Iowa City and the cars, and from there to Washington the trip was without unusual incident. A long delay was met with at Washington, caused by the stubbornness of some of the Indian delegates, who had made up their minds that they did not want to sell their land. However, Picotte and "Old Strike" had made up their minds that they did want to sell it, and that they had come to Washington for that express purpose. Two months were consumed in wearisome negotiations, in feasting and in consultation, and one by one the obstinate were brought over. About the middle of April the last recalcitrant surrendered and the treaty was formally agreed upon and signed, on the part of the United States by the commissioner of Indian affairs, Hon. Charles E. Mix, and on the part of the Indians by the leading chiefs of the party. Before it became binding upon either party, however, it was required to be ratified by the United States Senate. In this case, however, all parties felt sanguine that the Senate would speedily approve it as soon as practicable after Congress assembled the coming winter, and the delegation returned to Dakota exultant over their success, and were received by the settlers at Sioux City and squatters along the upper river with a true frontier welcome. The Sioux City people realized fully the benefits to flow to them when Dakota should be peopled with a producing population.

The first settlement, or attempt at settlement, made on the Townsite of Yankton was that of C. J. Holman, of Sergeants Bluff, Iowa, who, with his father, W. P. Holman, and Johnson Burritt, Gilbert Bowe, Harry Narveas, Stephen Saunders, and a Mr. Tudor and Mr. Smith, came up from Sioux City on the Nebraska side, in March, 1858, and halted at a point six miles below Yankton at a place called Laneer, so-called by Mr. Holman, where the party, with the exception of W. P. Holman, crossed in canoes to the Dakota side. This band of young adventurers were supported by an organization at Sioux City, composed of Billis Roberts, a Mr. Lamb, who was proprietor of the Sioux City House, Ben Stafford, Judge Campbell, with Charles P. Booge, John H. Charles and others as silent partners, or members. This company, aware of the purpose of the Upper Missouri Land Company, also a Sioux City organization, to locate towns in Dakota, had resolved to be first on the ground at Yankton and locate the site for the coming metropolis and also secure a share of the surrounding country. Spring floods were heavy in 1858 and the bottom lands between the Missouri and James rivers below Yankton were partially covered with water and ice, in places four and five feet in depth. Holman and his men waded through the flood about five miles, carrying their provisions and equipment on their backs, and finally reached dry land on the first bench west of the James river. The party came on to the present townsite of Yankton the same day and found it vacant—not a vestige of human habitation, Indian or white—and Holman pitched his tent near the foot of Pine street. This date was about the 20th of March, 1858. Shortly after, as Holman claims, or about the 10th of April, George D. Fiske and Samuel Mortimer, representing Frost, Todd & Co., who had been living at the Ferry cabin on the James river, came over and pitched their tent near Holman's. Holman was then waited upon by a delegation of Indians and informed that his party were trespassers and would not be permitted to remain on this side of the Missouri. The Holman party thereupon withdrew to the Nebraska side. The delegation of Yankton Indians was in Washington at this time, with General Todd, Charles F. Picotte and others, arranging a treaty by which the lands of the southern portion of the territory would be ceded to the United States, and Holman's purpose was to make a settlement under which he could hold the land when the treaty was effected. Frost, Todd & Co., the licensed traders, were anxious to secure the same tract, and their employes were permitted to reside on the Indian lands. All other whites were debarred as trespassers. Early in May, Holman received word that the treaty had been made and, being joined by a reinforcement consisting of Ben Stafford of Sioux City and a man named Bonsell, who claimed to have a trader's license, Holman made a raft of logs he had been cutting on the Nebraska side, crossed them in the night to the Dakota shore and began the construction of a cabin near the foot of Pine street. Before completing his domicile he was set upon by a band of Yankton Indians under the direction of Mortimer, who partially wrecked the cabin, Holman and his men in the meantime trying to prevent the destruction. A fist to fist scuffle was indulged in, neither party being armed (the Indians had been instructed to use no weapons unless they were resisted with firearms, and the Holman party had left their guns in their Nebraska cabin). Holman claimed to have subdued the attacking force, and then by use of soft phrases and a liberal feast to have won over "Dog's Claw," the Indian chief, and despite Mortimer's protest, he or his representative was permitted to complete his cabin, which he did, and resided in it during the summer free from further molestation.

In March, 1858, George D. Fiske, an employe of Frost, Todd & Co., reached Yankton and pitched his tent near the river bank at the foot of the present Walnut Street. Mr. Fiske had charge of the mercantile affairs of that firm at Yankton, and was the first white man to take up his permanent abode within the present corporate limits of the city, though Holman was doubtless the first who made improvements. At that time there was not a structure of any kind except the tepees of the Indians west of James River within the boundaries of the present Yankton County. Holman must have reached Yankton shortly after Fiske's arrival at James River, as he speaks of meeting both Fiske and "Spot" and of having some trouble with them. In July following Fiske's arrival a trading post was built under Lyman's supervision, on the river bank just east of Walnut Street. This structure was composed of two log buildings, joined together by an open shed, one part intended to be used as a store and the other for living purposes. It was learned from the treaty making party on its return from Washington in May that the treaty agreed upon and signed at Washington ceded a tract of 14,000,000 acres, about twenty-five thousand square miles, of South Dakota land to the United States in consideration of $1,600,066, or a trifle over twelve cents an acre. In the tract so ceded the Yankton Indians reserved 400,000 acres (known as the Yankton Reservation in Charles Mix County), and were by the terms of the treaty allowed one year from the ratification thereof by the United States Senate to remove from their various villages and camps to their new homes. The treaty further provided that Charles F. Picotte should be entitled to select a tract of 640 acres of land at any point in the ceded portion he might elect; also that Zephyr Rencontre should have the same privilege; and that the traders (Frost, Todd & Co.) should have the privilege of purchasing, for $1.25 an acre, 160 acres at every point where they had trading posts.

In June, 1858, the treaty grants to Picotte, and also the selection made by Frost, Todd & Co., were surveyed out by Mr. George M. Ryall, of Sioux City. Picotte had selected his grant of one section soon after returning from his treaty making trip to Washington; it embraced the fractional section lying between Douglass Avenue and the line running south to the river from the State Farm on the old State Fair road. It took in all of College Hill, and east to the west line of the Stone farm. Frost, Todd & Co. selected a quarter section adjoining Picotte on the west and fronting on the river as the townsite of Yankton, and made other selections on the James, Vermillion and Big Sioux rivers. This selection of Picotte's covered all the land staked off by the Holman party, including their cabin, and as Picotte does not appear to have made any protest against the improvements made by Holman, it was presumed that he knew his title would be amply protected by the treaty and he was not therefore inclined to protest against a gratuitous improvement of his property, for he was in need of a cabin and would have unquestionably appropriated Holman's if the Indians and soldiers had permitted it to remain.

There are some very plausible reasons for believing that the firm of Frost, Todd & Co. had in view the location of townsites in Dakota when they formed that business association. It appears that the formation of this company was immediately followed by the active efforts of the firm to affect a treaty of cession with the Yankton Indians. The erection of the trading posts at certain points between the Big Sioux and Choteau Creek was being actively pushed at the same time that Captain Todd, Picotte and the Yankton chiefs were in Washington negotiating the treaty, and it is clear that the trading monopoly would be utterly destroyed as soon as this treaty was perfected and ratified. There seems to be no other inference than that the trading posts were built to secure the privilege of purchasing the land at $1.25 an acre, and not for the purpose of traffic with the Indians, for there could no longer be any trade monopoly nor a great deal of Indian traffic after the country was thrown open to settlers and the Indians removed to their reservation.

The formation of the Upper Missouri Land Company in February, 1858, composed of a portion, if not all, of the members of the trading firm, together with a number of prominent Sioux City men, is another movement corroborating this view of the matter. As all these movements were publicly known at Sioux City, Holman was well acquainted with them and this will explain his resolute persistency in clinging to his Dakota holdings, and might justify in a measure his determination to secure a foothold at this point. The treaty fully discloses that a few parties obtained valuable concessions and as this became known, especially to the body of Indians, it created a great deal of indignation among the Indians and was made the pretext for considerable complaint, as will appear from time to time.

In June, 1858, an enumeration of the white people in Yankton County would have revealed the presence of George D. Fiske, William P. Lyman, Samuel Mortimer (Spot), Samuel Jerou, A. B. Smith, Lytle M. Griffith, the first carpenter, Frank Chapel, James M. Stone, who had come in during the spring and was operating the ferry on James River which he had probably purchased from the trading firm or had built another boat, and Francis Dupuis. Mr. Dupuis was a skillful raftsman, and had convoyed a small raft of sixteen red cedar logs from Fort Pierre to Yankton, which were employed in the construction of the trading post. Dupuis was an Indian trader of wide experience but we cannot find that he remained except for a short visit, when he probably went on to Sioux City to purchase supplies. He has been seen by the reader once before at the demolition of Fort Pierre. The Holman party may also be counted, though it would appear that they kept aloof from the trading firm's attaches and usually spent their days on the Nebraska side cutting house logs and making canoes, lodging and cooking in their Dakota cabin. All the others named were in the employ of Frost, Todd & Co., the licensed traders, and hence were lawful residents. After completing the building of the trading post at the foot of Walnut Street, Lyman, with Mortimer, Jerou and Smith, removed to Smutty Bear's camp, about nine miles above, where they erected another log cabin for the traders. It is very doubtful, however, about its having been occupied as a trading post. According to the statement of an early settler who had occasion to pass through the territory on Government business in 1860, and who must have taken some pains to investigate, these trading posts for Frost, Todd & Co. were located as follows: One at Sioux Point on the Missouri, nearly west of the wagon bridge which crosses the Big Sioux; one near the future Town of Elk Point; one at Miles Hall's Point, about half way between Elk Point and Vermillion; one at the Vermillion crossing; one at the Government ferry on the James River, where the bridge over the "Jim" is located; one at Yankton at the foot of Walnut Street; and one twenty miles west of Yankton at Bon Homme. This statement omits the one at Smutty Bear's camp. The firm of D. M. Frost & Co. which was engaged in the trade prior to 1857 had a post, and probably two, on the upper river.

While these events were transpiring in the Lower James River Valley other portions of the Missouri slope country below Fort Randall were invaded by the intrepid pioneers. Bon Homme Island, with its ancient ruins of a stockade and citadel, and it was directly opposite the island on the north side that Lewis and Clark observed the wonderful growth of vegetation on the highlands, the plains being covered with native grasses which grew so tall that a man standing was nearly concealed by them.

BON HOMME AND BEYOND

Bon Homme County is carved out of that portion of Dakota famed for its natural riches. It was opposite Bon Homme Island, on the Dakota side, that Lewis and Clark observed the wonderful growth of vegetation on the highlands, the plains being covered by the native grasses that grew so high that a man standing was nearly concealed by them. It was Bon Homme that attracted the admiration of the colony from Mantorville, Minnesota, in May, 1858, while on its way to Pike's Peak, and influenced a change in their plans which made them the first settlers of that section. The settlement and development of the county has fully justified these early impressions. It is now one of the richest agricultural counties in the Northwest and owes its prosperity and substantial position altogether to its soil, for it contains no large towns and has no manufactories or industries of more than local importance, but its lands are sought for their fertility, and some of the most complete farm homes and ranches within the Dakotas are found within its borders. It embraces nearly seventeen congressional townships, nearly four hundred thousand acres. It is well watered by numerous streams and as a consequence its surface is more broken than the average prairie country in neighboring counties, and has always possessed an abundant supply of native timber.

The first trading post in this section of the Northwest built for traffic with the Yankton Indians was built at the mouth of Emanuel Creek in what is now Bon Homme County, by Emanuel Disaul, a French-Canadian, for whom the creek was named. He was for a long time the solitary white occupant of the country, and the date of the settlement is set down at about 1815. He treated the Indians honorably and won their confidence and friendship. He was never molested. He finally removed, but where to or the date of his leaving can not be ascertained.

Maj. Robert Dollard, of Scotland, had been to some pains to collect the traditional history of Bon Homme County. In an address delivered at Olivet a few years ago he said:

Bon Homme Island in the Missouri River received its name from a young man who was captured by the Indians about 1830, and who, after his release from captivity which was given him because of his good qualities, located on the island and lived there the remainder of his life; he died about 1848. He subsisted by hunting wild turkeys and buffalo, supplying the fur traders who called upon him in their boats, with robes and turkey meat. He was known to the Indians as well as whites as a good man because of his many acts of kindness to the savage as well as civilized people. It is related of him that between 1838 and 1850 he saved the lives of a number of white men who were prospecting for coal along the bluffs on the Nebraska side of the river where a thousand savage Indians held them imprisoned in the Devil's Nest. He was famous for his hospitality. He was called "The Good Man," in English; "Bon Homme" in French, and "Washta Pale Face" in Indian. The county takes its name from the island in the river along its southern border.

This explanation of the origin of the name "Bon Homme," while commendable, must be incorrect as to the matter of time, as Lewis and Clark, a quarter of a century earlier, speak of Bon Homme Island. Mr. Dollard's tradition probably relates to an incident of much earlier date than he gives it.

The first settlement of importance in Bon Homme County was made by a small colony, nearly all young men, from Mantorville, Dodge County, Minnesota. This company started for the gold fields of Colorado, Pike's Peak, in 1858, and struck the Missouri River at Sioux City, where they crossed the stream and continued their journey along the south bank of the river to Bon Homme Island. Here they halted, having been favorably impressed with the beauty and apparent fertility of the land on the Dakota side. They finally resolved to investigate, and for this purpose constructed a large canoe from a cottonwood log, and two or three of the leaders crossed to the Dakota side and landed at the future site of the Village of Bon Homme. The "lay of the land," the deep, rich soil, the heavy growth of grass, all justified their first impression and the result was that the trip to Pike's Peak was abandoned, and they decided to locate at Bon Homme. They crossed their people and their effects in the Gentle Annie, the name given to the cottonwood canoe, swimming their animals. The first necessary work of providing suitable shelter for their people was set about with no delay, and soon comfortable log buildings were erected for habitations, and a townsite located and a townsite cabin constructed. This company was led by John H. Shober, a lawyer, a man of energy and ability, and it was made up of John Remme, Edward and Daniel Gifford, Fred Carman, John Mantle, John Tallmann, Thomas J. Tate, W. W. Warford, George Falkenberg, Lewis Jones (colored), Aaron Hammond, wife and one child, Reuben Wallace and H. D. Stager.

Another party came from Dodge County, Minnesota, under Mr. Shober's leadership, who had returned for them, that also settled in Bon Homme County, and arrived there on the 12th of November, 1859, consisting of thirteen wagons and considerable loose stock. This party was made up of C. G. Irish and family, who, I think, left Dakota in the spring of 1881; John Butterfield, who returned to Minnesota; Jonathan Brown and family, the family returned to Minnesota, Mr. Brown died in Meade County a few years ago; Francis Rounds, who died at Yankton in 1901; Cordelia Rounds, now Mrs. W. T. Williams, Shawnee, Oklahoma; and George T. Rounds, Stoneville, South Dakota. Joseph and Charles Stager left in 1865, and Nathan McDaniels and family, C. E. Rowley and Laban H. Litchfield arrived in Bon Homme on the 26th of December, 1859. Mr. McDaniels died in Meade County a few years ago; his widow and three sons, Daniel, George and Joseph, live in Meade County. The rest of the family is scattered and some dead.

A frontiersman of some repute named William M. Armour located in what is now Bon Homme County, near Choteau Creek, in 1858, and in the same fall or the following spring went out to the newly discovered Pike's Peak gold fields.

George L. Tackett, an early settler of Sioux City and the first sheriff of Woodbury County, of which Sioux City is the capital, removed to the western border of Bon Homme County in 1859, and built a very large and substantial log building for hotel purposes. It was bullet proof and "Tackett's Station" became a famous stopping place for military men, freighters and frontiersmen.

Daniel P. Bradford and son Henry arrived in Bon Homme from Fort Laramie, Wyoming, on the 2d day of January, 1860; his family was then in Sioux City and came to Bon Homme the following spring. Miss Emma Bradford taught school during the summer of 1860, in a log schoolhouse at Bon Homme built by Shober, Warford and others. The school consisted of nine pupils, namely: John, Ira and Melissa Brown, Anna Bradford, Anna, Mary and George McDaniels, George and Delia Rounds. It was the first schoolhouse built in Dakota and claimed to have been the first school taught in the territory.

The school building was a log structure 14x15 feet on the ground. It had no floor other than the prairie soil, one window, six panes, 8x10, plastered with ordinary frontier plaster. The desks were made from the lumber in a discarded wagon box, and the seats were three-legged stools. But it served every purpose, was really an ornament to the little settlement and its settlers who had shown such a commendable interest in hastening the beginning of educational facilities.

In the fall of 1858 the Bon Homme settlement met with a serious reverse, resulting in its few pioneers being driven from their primitive abodes and compelled to remove across the Missouri River into the Territory of Nebraska. Mention has already been made of the edict sent out by the Department of the Interior warning all trespassers to remove forthwith from Dakota, and following this came the order to the military commander at Fort Randall to use his troops for the purpose of effectually executing the order. Accordingly, Captain Lovell, with a company of infantry, came down from the fort and summarily ejected the trespassers. These trespassers included all white settlers who were in Dakota without authority of law, and this authority covered only the military people, the officers and employes of the Indian agent at Yankton agency, and those white men who had obtained Yankton Indian wives and were living in the territory, and the officers and employes of the licensed traders, who at this time were Frost, Todd & Company. The Bon Homme settlement was about the first point where the soldiers encountered the proscribed class, and they literally drove them down the bank of the river and across the stream, at the same time applying the torch to their cabins and improvements, and that material that would not readily burn was dragged down and thrown into the river. The work of destruction was made complete. The refugee colony was made up of W. W. Warford, a half-brother of George T. Rounds, John Mantle, Fred Carmine, John Talman, William Young, Aaron Hammond, his wife and one child, Daniel Gifford, Edward Gifford and George Falkenberg. Mrs. Hammond was the first white woman to settle at Bon Homme. The colony built a log house on the Nebraska side and lived there until the early spring of 1859, when they again removed to Bon Homme, and rebuilt their cabins near the site of those destroyed.

The writer has much of this information from George T. Rounds, one of the party who reached Bon Homme from Mantorville in 1859. As to what became of this party later in life, Mr. Rounds says:

Mr. Shoher remained at Bon Homme until 1865, when he went to Helena, Mont. John Renne went to Colorado in 1860; do not know what became of him. Fred Carman, John Mantle and some others went to Colorado. Edward Gifford went to Colorado in 1865 and was killed by an accident in the mines. John Tallaman enlisted in Company A, First Dakota Cavalry, and was frozen to death in the timber near Vermillion during his term of service. T. J. Late is at the soldiers' home, Hot Springs, this state. George Falkenberg has a cattle ranch in the southern Black Hills country. W. W. Warford died at Bon Homme in 1862. Lewis Jones was killed in Yankton by Burns Smith, about 1860. Mr. Hammond and wife had a child born in 1860, supposed to be the first white child born in the territory. They afterwards moved to Iowa.

Mr. D. P. Bradford died in Bon Homme. Miss Emma Bradford became Mrs. John Swobe and resides at Hartington, Neb. Mrs. John Kountz, widow of Samuel Grant and eldest daughter of Mr. Bradford, resides in Pittsburg, and the youngest daughter, Anna, who is married, lives in Scotland. There are a good many whom I have lost track of that came in during the first two years, as the most of the settlers left during the Indian troubles of 1862. Mr. McDaniels and family, D. P. Bradford and family, and Francis Rounds and family being the only families that returned to Bon Homme County from the fortifications around the old Ash Hotel at Yankton, at the close of the Indian raid in September, 1862. George M. Pinney came in the spring of 1860, and Charles N. Cooper and Richard O. Johnson laid out the town of Springfield in 1860. Mr. Johnson is still living in Ford, Lincoln County. These facts have been mainly secured from George T. Rounds, who said that he was one of the Bon Homme pioneers. Regarding the fortifications on Bon Homme Island, Mr. Rounds says there were marks of a fortification near the foot of the island consisting of an embankment which covered about five acres, also a small fortification near the fortification was a place marked as the grave of the man called "Bon Homme." His real name I cannot remember. A Frenchman by the name of John McBride told me that he was one of the party who buried him. Mr. McBride's now dead. I have been in enquiry in regard to his burial from relations who lived in St. Louis. Mr. McBride, twenty years the river has completely cut away the spot and in the island, such as it is, if there remains any trace of the old fort. Hugh Prader, and his son, John Prader, were to Bon Homme in the spring of 1861. There was a Miss Gifford (Charlotte), I think, who taught school in Yankton during the spring of 1862. My recollection is that Charles T. McCoy came to Bon Homme in 1867 from Olmsted County, Minn.

CHARLES P. BOOGE NOMINATED

The first formal political movement in Bon Homme County was a mass convention held in 1861, when the following proceedings were had:

Pursuant to a call, the electors of Bon Homme district met in mass convention in Bon Homme, September 5, 1861, for the purpose of nominating one councilman and two members of the Assembly.

The convention was called to order by D. C. Gross, chairman of the convention. W. W. Warford was chosen secretary, after which a motion was made by Moses Herrick that the convention proceed to nominate by acclamation. Carried.

The following persons were then nominated without a dissenting vote: For Council, John H. Shober; for representatives, George M. Pinney and Reuben Wallace. After which the following resolutions were introduced and unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we recognize Charles P. Booge as a representative man of the people, one of the first settlers of the Territory, and has ever had at heart the best interests of the people of Dakota Territory, and if elected to Congress we have every confidence he will fulfill any pledge made in his Platform.

Resolved, That we, the electors of Bon Homme District, in Mass Convention assembled, do hereby pledge our undivided support to the nominees of this Convention and to Charles P. Booge for delegate to Congress.

D. C. GROSS, Chairman.

W. W. WARFORD, Secretary.

Bon Homme embraced the Fifth Council District and the Seventh Representative District, under the governor's proclamation of 1861, and at the election in September elected John H. Shober, councilman, by fifty-two votes, no opposition; and for representative chose George M. Pinney, by fifty-three votes, and Reuben Wallace, by fifty-one votes.

At the session of the Legislature in 1864-65 a bill was passed through both houses of the Legislative Assembly, late in the session, changing the name of Bon Homme County to Jefferson; Charles Mix to Franklin; and Todd to Jackson; but it did not reach the governor until the last day of the session. It was not approved and the old names have been retained and will be to the end of time.

The original Town of Bon Homme was laid out in the summer of 1860 by a company composed of John H. Shober, Reuben Wallace and Moses Herrick. The last named built a hotel building and opened a public house. This was the first structure erected on the townsite after the town was surveyed. The Town of Wanari, about eight miles west of Bon Homme, was laid out at the same time by a company made up of R. M. Johnson, Henry Hartsough and C. N. Cooper. Both these towns were incorporated by the first Legislature, which convened in 1862, and the name "Wanari" was changed to Springfield.

The treaty of cession between the Yankton Indians and the Government provided that certain Indians and half-breeds should be given a tract of land at any point they might select from the ceded lands not otherwise reserved. Under this provision of the treaty Zephyr Rencontre, a Yankton half-breed, took up a 640-acre tract adjoining and probably including the Shober townsite at Bon Homme. A large tract of this he sold a few years later to Dr. W. A. Burleigh and Gov. A. J. Faulk, who laid out a townsite which was afterward incorporated. It was already the county seat by act of the Legislature; was also the seat of the United States Court, and had a postoffice with Mrs. Francis Rounds as postmistress. Its first hotel keeper was Moses Herrick, who afterwards moved to Yankton, thence to Vermillion.

A number of stores were built, a blacksmith shop and dwellings, until quite a village had sprung up. The land surrounding for several miles (five or six) was all taken by settlers and much of it already producing sod corn, oats and potatoes. The village began to decline later, but was not entirely abandoned as a town until 1885, when the county seat was removed to Tyndall. It was cut off from all railway facilities, and a number of other towns had grown up in the county and had taken away its trade.

The early settlement of Bon Homme County was greatly retarded because of the proximity of the Yankton Indian reservation, which joined it on the west. But as a matter of fact the county was singularly exempt from Indian raids and depredations. It is not intended in this sketch to give any facts later than 1861; but as appropriate to this subject of settlement, will state that in the widespread Indian excitement of August and September, 1862, known as the Little Crow outbreak, the county was entirely abandoned by its white settlers, who came to Yankton, and when the alarm had subsided there were but three families who returned to their claims.

In the journal of the Lewis and Clark expedition is found the first historical mention of a conspicuous landmark in South Dakota, that of Spirit Mound, Clay County, and the reader is referred to the first chapters in this book for the description of the mound given by Captain Lewis, who personally visited and measured it. We have in this visit the first introduction of white men to the Valley of the Vermillion, of date, 1804. The explorers, however, called the river the Whitestone and again Redstone.

Fort Vermillion was undoubtedly the first improvement made by white men in what is now Clay County. This was a trading post built by the American Fur Company of St. Louis about the year 1830, and stood on the bank of the Missouri River, about two and a half miles below the present Village of Burbank. Its site was dimly discernible in 1859, when this territory was thrown open to settlement, but since then the ground it covered has been swallowed up by the Missouri River, with hundreds of acres of adjoining soil, which has cut away the banks of the stream with its swift current. Audubon, the ornithologist, visited the fort in 1843 and described it as a square, strongly built, and without portholes. Larpenteur, a fur trader of many years' experience and a historian, was in charge of the fort as late as 1850. It was abandoned in 1854. In August, 1844, a colony of Mormons, numbering ninety persons, with thirty wagons, left Hancock County, Illinois, to explore the Rocky Mountain country and select a new location for their church. They spent the winter following at Council Bluffs, Iowa, and in that fall they reached Fort Vermillion and spent the winter of 1845-46 at and near the trading post. The next spring they marched up the Missouri, passing near "Strike-the-Rees" camp (Yankton), crossed the Missouri at the mouth of the Niobrara Valley and reached Great Salt Lake about the first of August the latter year.

The Columbia Fur Company also built a trading post about the same time some two miles east of the present City of Gayville, on the bank of the river. The post is supposed to have stood very near the present farm of Mrs. S. C. Fargo. It was a small affair and was called Dickson's Post, named for Joseph Dickson, an old trader, who had been in the country since 1804. It survived for a few years only, the American absorbing the company that built it.

Alexander C. Young came to Dakota in 1834, or rather to old Fort Pierre, then a new trading post of the American Fur Company of St. Louis, and was in the employ of that company; he frequently associated with William Sublette and Henry Vanderburg, two quite famous frontiersmen. He followed trading and traffic until about the time of Harney's expedition to Fort Pierre in 1855, when he abandoned trapping and settled near the Vermillion, or old Fort Vermillion, with his Indian family, he having taken a wife from the Yankton tribe. He built a dwelling at or near the present Village of Burbank, in 1855, and his place was known among the early settlers as "Aleck C's Point." In 1857 Charles V. Cordier joined the Young settlement, which was the first in what is now Clay County, Cordier residing there a number of years, and finally died there; but the year of his death cannot be stated. Young removed to the Yankton Indian Reservation about the time the Indians removed from Yankton, or the year succeeding, and abandoned his possessions at "Aleck C's Point." He there renewed his relations with the tribe. In the year 1858, Frost, Todd & Company built the cabin known as the "trading post" near the mouth of the Vermillion River, and Henry Kennerly, of St. Louis, a young man about twenty-four years of age, resided there and was the agent of the company up to the time when the country was opened to settlement in 1859. It does not appear that the company kept any goods at this place for the purpose of traffic with the Indians or whites, and the impression among the settlers was that the main object of erecting the cabin was to secure the location for town-site purposes. When the territory was thrown open to settlement, Frost, Todd & Company made claim to two quarter sections, embracing a large part of the old Vermillion townsite, but their right was contested by settlers and the company was defeated, not being able to establish title to any portion of their claim.

A rope ferry was put in across the Vermillion in 1857, before the trader's cabin was built. It was known as Van Meter's ferry and was located at the "trading post." A. C. Van Meter lived at the cabin part of the time. He also carried the mail from Sioux City to Fort Randall at that time; but he called the Vermillion cabin his home, and claimed a tract of land at that point. His wife was a half-breed Yankton, a very intelligent woman, and an excellent wife and mother, as many white people among the early settlers could testify. It is conceded by Clay County's pioneers, though it would appear from the best evidence now obtainable, that Kennerly and Van Meter were at least contemporaries. An old shack of a building perched on a side hill not far from the trader's cabin had been abandoned before the settlers came in 1858, and this rude structure is thought to have been erected by Van Meter some time anterior to the building of the trading post, with the view of making claim to the land when it was opened to settlement, and a few years later Van Meter's Addition to Vermillion appeared among the recorded town plats in that county.

Following Kennerly and Van Meter, a small company of Norwegians came into the Vermillion and Missouri valleys in the early summer of 1859. These were Ole Olson, father of the first white child born in Dakota, and Halvor Swenson, with their families, who came from North Bend, Nebraska, and took up land not far from the present Village of Meckling. These may have been the first farmers to settle in the Vermillion or Missouri Valley in that section. Mr. Hans Myron, then a boy of twelve years, now of Gayville, was in company with these people, though his father, Syvert H. Myron, with the remainder of his family, arrived a few days later.

James McHenry, of Nebraska, moved across the Missouri to Vermillion in 1859, built a store building and became the first merchant. About August 1, 1859, George and Parker V. Brown, brothers, and Marcellus Lathrop, all from or near Ponca, Nebraska, moved across the Missouri and settled in Vermillion, and a little later the colony was increased by the arrival of Miner Robinson and his family and John Listrop. Mrs. George Brown and Mrs. Marcellus Lathrop were the first white women who settled in what is now Clay County. George Brown, mentioned above, was the father of the first wife of Hon. D. T. Bramble, who died at Ponca prior to Mr. Bramble's removal to Yankton. Parker

Brown was known by the name of Deacon, but this name was a misnomer, for he was reputed to be the most proficient in profanity of any man in the settlement. The Brown brothers built a log structure near the old trading post, which was afterwards bought by Captain Miner and used as a hotel. The Browns remained in this new location but a year or two. The moccasin tracks were fading out; they felt the restraint of so much civilization and removed early in the fall to a beautiful and sightly location ten miles west of Yankton, where they erected a comfortable and rather commodious log hotel building and prepared to entertain the traveling public. They called the new location Lakeport because of a number of romantic sheets of water that environed their new home and gave to the atmosphere the odor of a fresh water watering place. These were not all permanent lakes and their number has since been materially decreased.

In the year of 1859 there was quite a large increase of settlers in the Vermillion Valley and at Vermillion. A large increase at that time was not an overwhelming number, but the immigration of that year brought in a number of men of the most substantial and resolute character.

Among the new comers were Aslak Iverson, Ole Bottolfson, a born leader, John Aalseth, August Bruger, Alexander Lancrease, John Gidross, Miles R. Hall, Franklin Taylor, L. E. Phelps, Chris Larson, Lewis Larson, Cornelius Andrews and Nelson Cusick, nearly all farmers.

Mr. W. W. Benedict, late a resident of Springfield, Bon Homme County, left Minnesota as early as 1854, and with a prairie schooner crossed the plains to Nebraska and finally settled at North Bend, a small village on the Nebraska shore just above Vermillion. Here he remained until March, 1860, when he crossed the Missouri and took a preemption on the Missouri bottom near Vermillion. The Vermillion settlement made numerous accessions during 1860, among the new comers being John W. Boyle, Henry D. Betts, Jacob A. Jacobson, Bligh E. Wood, Nelson Miner, A. W. Puett, S. B. Mulholland, who built the first hotel on the site that was afterwards used for the St. Nicholas. Jacob Deuel and Hugh Compton came in February and built and operated a sawmill near the west bank of the Vermillion River in a heavy timber bordering the Missouri.

The first child born in Vermillion was Viola Van Metre, daughter of the old pioneer, A. C. Van Metre. The birth occurred in 1859. The first white child born in Dakota was Ole Olson, of Meckling, then called Lincoln. He was born in 1861. This statement is generally accepted as correct, but John and Mary Stanage, children of Hon. John Stanage, whose widow still resides in Yankton County, were born at Fort Pierre, and two of General Todd's children were born at Fort Randall, prior to 1861, and later than 1856. The first death in Vermillion or in that vicinity was that of Judge J. A. Denton, which occurred in December, 1859.

George and Parker Brown, with Marcellus Lathrop, settled at Vermillion in July or August, 1859, being the first settlers on the townsite after the territory was opened for settlement. They came from near Ponca, Nebraska, where they had been among the earliest settlers of Dixon County. They erected a building near the log cabin known as the trading post. This building was bought by Captain Miner soon after he came to Vermillion and used as a hotel, known as the Miner House.

In the year 1861 the population of Vermillion and its surrounding country was further increased by the arrival of Hon. A. J. Harlan, an ex-member of Congress from Indiana; William Shriner, G. B. Bigelow, N. V. Ross, Henry S. Kelley, A. J. Bell and E. M. Bond. The little Presbyterian Church, known as Father Martin's Church, was built at Vermillion in August, 1860. It was the first church edifice erected in Dakota, and was a log structure. Prior to this and as early as March, 1860, Rev. Charles D. Martin, who was called Father Martin, held religious services in the village. At the time the church building was erected a religious organization was perfected, presumed to be Presbyterian, and in September following a Sunday school was organized. A bell for the church was also procured by Father Martin, and Vermillion claimed to be the locality of the first religious meeting directed by a minister of the gospel within the territory; it also claims to have built the first structure for church purposes exclusively; also to have had the first bell to call its people to divine worship and holy thoughts; also to have organized the first Sunday school in the territory. The church building was torn down in September, 1862, and its logs used in erecting a fortification on the bank of the river, as a defense against the hostile Indians. The first school was taught in this church building near the close of 1860 by the first physician, Dr. James Caulkins, and it has been claimed to be the first school taught in Dakota, but that claim has been abandoned in favor of Bon Homme. On the 22d of October, 1860, Jacob Deuel and Miss Robinson were the principals in the first marriage celebrated in Vermillion, which was solemnized by Rev. C. D. Martin. The Dakota Republican, Vermillion's first newspaper, was founded by T. Elwood Clark and James Bedell, and the first number was issued September 6, 1861.

The term of court held at Vermillion the first Monday in August, 1861, was the first term of court held in the territory. Judge Williston presided, and A. F. Eckles was the clerk. A grand jury was impaneled which investigated some offenses for cutting timber on Government land, but found no indictments. Franklin Taylor was clerk of the court.

THE PIONEER METHODIST CHURCH

Rev. S. W. Ingham was appointed to the Dakota Mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church by the Iowa Conference, in the fall of 1860, and reached Vermillion on the 12th day of October, coming in on horseback. At that time there were few Methodists among the settlers, and not one was discovered at Vermillion, though the settlers turned out Sunday morning to listen to the message of the young divine who had come so far on horseback to cheer and enlighten them. Services were held in the Mulholland Hotel dining room.

The following Sunday Mr. Ingham was in Yankton, and there he was more fortunate in finding members of his denomination, but did not have as large a congregation in the morning as that which greeted him at Vermillion. He found at Yankton two of his church people in William Thompson, the carpenter who came in with Moses K. Armstrong from Minnesota in 1859, and Mr. Huston, who was styled by the old settlers as the "Old Yank." At the morning service four men and two women attended—a steamboat having arrived in port which proved a superior attraction. In the evening he held services at General Todd's town office, which was a frame building and something of a rarity. It was located on the corner of Broadway and Second streets, southwest, where he had a congregation numbering twenty-five.

Mr. Ingham went from Yankton to Bon Homme, where he performed a marriage ceremony, uniting Samuel Grant, a printer-farmer, and Miss Anne Bradford, the eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Daniel W. Bradford. He found two Methodists in Bon Homme, Mr. and Mrs. Nathaniel McDaniels, but he received a hearty welcome, and the entire settlement turned out to hear him preach. These were the first Methodist services held in Dakota, and in the year preceding the organization of the territory. The person reporting these incidents mentioned the singing at the different meetings. It was fairly melodious and indicated that our early inhabitants were more or less familiar with gospel hymns.

The following statement, which shows probably the date of the first assembling of Methodists for organization in the territory, was written in their records by Rev. J. L. Payne, who succeeded Mr. Ingham in the fall of 1862 and resided on Brule Creek, in Cole County:

The class of Yankton, D. T., was formed on Thursday evening, January 1, 1863, at the home of Bro. Bligh F. Wood, where the friends of religion had assembled for prayer. Seven joined that evening and two more the next day. As far as can be ascertained this is the furthest up the Valley of the Missouri of any religious society yet organized.

The earliest Norwegian settlers came in from Nebraska and settled on the Vermillion bottom between the James and Vermillion rivers. This was in the summer of 1859, when Ole Olson and Halvor Iverson and Syfert H. Myron, with their families, took claims near the old Lincoln stage station, about three miles east of the Yankton County line. Hans Myron, now a prominent citizen of Gayville, was then a young lad and the only boy in the settlement. In 1860 in the spring, another small colony, headed by Ole Sampson, accompanied by his twelve-year-old brother, Louis Sampson, with Ole Bottolfson, John Aalseth and Aslak Iverson, Halvor Brydelson, Halvor Anderson and Peter Anderson, also from near North Bend, Nebraska, moved across the river and nearly all of them took land in the neighborhood of a locality called The Lakes, near the present thriving Village of Gayville, in Yankton County. Bottolfson and possibly some others, however, went further east and settled near the Vermillion River. Still another settlement was made about six miles north of Gayville on Clay Creek, or on a small tributary called Plum Creek, from the abundance of wild plums that grew along its banks. Nearly all these people were Lutherans, and it was a custom among them to meet at some one of the settlers' cabins on the Lord's day and hold religious services by reading the Scriptures, singing hymns and listening to short addresses. The first ordained clergyman to visit these settlers was Rev. Abraham Jacobson, in the fall of 1861, who came out with a body of Norwegian immigrants from Iowa and remained several months, holding frequent services. He officiated at two weddings during his stay and baptized a number. Mr. Jacobson had not come with any intention of locating, but more as a matter of recreation, and during the winter he returned home. The first Lutheran Church to be established was organized at the home of Jacob Jacobson, not far from the present Town of Meckling. It was called the "Norwegian Lutheran Congregation of Dakota Territory." This was in January, 1864, and resulted in securing the services of a Chicago divine, Rev. J. Krohn, who came out the following fall, and entered actively into the work of organizing the field. The officers of his Congregational society were Ole Sampson, Helge Mathiason, Peter Nilson, Aslak Iverson and Lars Olson Fannestol, and his parish included the entire country west of the Big Sioux and east of the James River. Reverend Krohn baptized a large number of children and held services throughout the field during the winter, but returned to Chicago in the spring of 1865. Another visit was made by him after harvest, when he held divine services at the home of Hon. Torger Nelson near Mission Hill, who had taken land there the year before. The first settled pastor was the Rev. Emil Christenson, of St. Louis, who came up in 1867 in answer to a call that had been given him by a body of Lutherans who had held a meeting in February of that year at Syvert Myron's residence. Mr. Christenson divided his large and widely scattered congregation into three districts, named Brule Creek, Bergen and Vangen. The Vangen district included Mission Hill, and here the first Lutheran Church edifice was erected in 1869, and the Bergen Church a year later. These were the first Lutheran churches in the territory. Mr. Christenson proved to be an industrious, as well as an able clergyman, and in addition to attending thoroughly to his own field, he laid the foundations for the churches in Lincoln, Minnehaha, Moody and Brookings counties, and when the Black Hills emigration aroused the country in 1876 he felt that he could do better or more profitable work in that and other mountainous countries then being occupied, and much to the regret of his people, resigned and removed. He finally settled in Washington and Oregon, doing valiant work in the Master's service.

EARLY SCENES IN YANKTON AND VERMILLION

The first Norwegian Evangelical Lutheran Church edifice in the Territory of Dakota was built in Yankton County about two miles east of the modern and sightly Village of Mission Hill. The time of its erection was 1869-70. For ten years prior to this date, or since 1859, the Norwegians of Yankton and Clay counties who resided on the Missouri bottom had held religious services at the private homes of the farmers, and as early as 1861 a young clergyman named Abraham Jacobson, of their denomination, came out from Iowa and lived for a time in the settlements, preaching and baptizing. Among the very earliest Norwegian settlers in that section were Halvor Swenson and Ole Oleson, Sr., who became the father of the first white child born under the Dakota sky after the Yankton treaty and cession in 1859. Hans Myron, a young lad, came with these people, who arrived in midsummer, 1859. A week or two later Syvert H. Myron, the father of young Hans, arrived and took up a claim about midway between the Vermillion and James rivers. The following spring (1860) a colony of Norwegians, led by Ole Sampson, crossed the Missouri River from near St. Helena, Nebraska, and formed the Lake Settlement, which is near and possibly partly within the thriving City of Gayville. With Mr. Sampson were Ole Botolfson, Aslak Iverson and John Alseth. A large number of Norwegian settlers came in during the years 1862-63-64. Torger Nelson made the first settlement on the highland north of the James River ferry in 1864, and it was in this year that efforts were first made to organize for the building of a Lutheran Church edifice. A minister from Chicago, Rev. J. Krohn, was sent out in the fall and remained a short time, baptizing forty-five children at one service near Vermillion. On October 8, 1864, a meeting was held at the home of Anders Ulven, near Vermillion, and the "Norwegian Evangelical Lutheran Congregation of Dakota Territory" was organized and the following elected trustees: Helge Mathiason, Aslak Iverson, Ole Sampson, Peter Nilson and Lars Oleson Fanestol. This organization included about all the country embraced in the Missouri bottom from the Big Sioux to James River. In 1865 Reverend Krohn, who had returned to Chicago, came out again and held services at the home of Torger Nelson in Yankton County. In 1866 a minister was called, the Rev. Emil Christensen, of St. Louis. He came up in August, 1867, and went at his work with great energy and intelligence. The congregation grew and prospered, and soon became so large as to be unwieldy. It was then divided into Vaughn, Clay Creek, Lodi, Brule Creek and Bergen. Brule Creek soon formed an independent church. The Vaughn district embraced eastern Yankton County and in 1870 erected a church edifice east of Mission Hill at a considerable cost, the building material having to be hauled by wagon from Yankton and Sioux City. Rev. Mr. Christensen remained the pastor until 1876, and built up a strong and permanent congregation, extending his labors into other sections of the territory. In the year named he accepted a call as missionary to the Pacific coast, and removed to Washington or Oregon.

Capt. Nelson Miner opened the Dakota House in Vermillion in the spring of 1861, but a few months later entered the service of the United States as captain of Company A, Dakota Cavalry.

Franklin Taylor, who up to a few years ago was the only survivor of the handful of earliest pioneers that occupied what is now Clay County, is a native southerner, having been born in North Carolina, August 3, 1827. He is still living on his pioneer claim near Vermillion which he has entitled "Wayside Farm." Mr. Taylor was the first register of deeds of Clay County, and a member of the Territorial Legislatures of 1863-64, 1865-66, and again in 1874-75. He had always been an old-time democrat, popular with all classes, and an exemplary and useful citizen.

Vermillion was the Second Council District under the governor's proclamation of 1861 and elected John W. Boyle and H. D. Betts to the Council. The vote stood: Boyle, 30; Betts, 34; Nelson Miner, 25; Miles Hall, 12.

Vermillion also constituted the Fourth Representative District, electing Lyman Burgess and A. W. Puett representatives. The vote stood: Burgess, 44; Puett, 32; Hans Gunderson, 24.

West Vermillion was a separate political division, being the Third Council and the Fifth Representative districts. Jacob Deuel was the only candidate for the Council, and received 43 votes. For the House of Representatives, Jacob A. Jacobson received 41 votes; Bligh E. Wood, 27; Christian Lawson, 12; and Ole Bottolfson, 4.

The following letter from a well-known gentleman of Madison, this state, will explain conditions at Yankton and vicinity in the summer of 1858:

Dear Sir—Your kind letter of the 3rd inst. has been lying on my desk since its receipt, while I have been hoping to find time to dust off my memory and bring to view some of the events connected with my early trip to Dakota. It was a sort of a "wild goose chase" anyway. I was but a green boy, having only one year before come from my father's home in New Hampshire to seek my fortune in the then almost unknown "out West." The opening of the Territory of Dakota for settlement was expected early in 1858, and in company with two young men, I. Todd and F. Joss, on the 5th of May, 1858, we took passage on the Minnesota Bell, at Red Wing, Minn., bound for St. Louis. At St. Louis we found the American Fur Company's boat Spread Eagle nearly ready to start on her annual trip for Fort Benton. We took passage on her to Sioux City, starting out on the 15th of May. Among the passengers was one Charles Chouteau (don't know as that is spelled right), of the fur company, Charles Picotte, well known later in Yankton, and eight or ten Indians, among whom was Mad Bull and Strike the Ree, if I remember correctly, also a Frenchman, Boyer (or Brughier), who had a shack near the mouth of the Big Sioux and I think owned considerable land in and near Sioux City. [The Indians were returning from a treaty-making embassy, having been to Washington and treated for the sale of the Yankton Indian lands in the new Territory of Dakota that was not then organized.] We were on the river between St. Louis and Sioux City nine days, a tedious trip with a mixed cargo. Sometimes we would make headway up stream, sometimes stick for hours on a sand bar and usually tied up at night. This was the regular program with but little variation, except as would sometimes occur a flow of too much whiskey in the cabin, a flash of diamonds and the shuffle of the gambler's cards. The towns along the river from St. Louis up gave little promise of what they are today. Kansas City seems only a few straggling maver huts; Omaha with its white "State House" on the hill was considered the "castle in Spain" of some crack brained enthusiast. Our party left the boat at Sioux City where we found some two or three hundred people, two hotels, a city with a New Hampshire Yankee, Colonel Means, its mayor. After spending several days around the city, strolling along the bluffs of the Big Sioux overlooking the promised land of the Dakotas, we decided to still go west, bought a pack mule, crossed the Big Muddy and took the trail up the western bank of the river. We passed the town site of Logan (since washed away, I think), St. Johns, Ponca, and made a stop of several weeks at St. James, in Cedar County, Nebraska. From this point we took observations of the situation, making several trips across the river to the Dakota side, and waited impatiently for the country to be opened for settlers.

On July 6th we went up the river to what the boys called "Strike the Ree's Camp" on the river, just opposite Yankton. Here we found several white men who had claims in view around the Yankton town site and who were waiting as we were for a chance to squat on the land. We crossed the river in a dugout and stayed that night in a log house, the only building in Yankton. The next day we strolled over the hills nearest the log house and ventured to cross the Jim to some Indian tepees where we found dogs and squaws, the latter busy drying buffalo meat. The only unexplained thing we discovered on this trip was a pole stuck in the ground on the ridge between the town and the Jim with a little sack of tobacco suspended from it. What this meant I never knew.

I think there were some twenty men at this time interested in claims at Yankton, but I am unable to give any names. It was not thought quite safe to remain on the Dakota side of the river, but these boys with their big cottonwood dugout for a ferry were anxiously waiting for Uncle Sam to give them permission to add another state to the Union. I know nothing of the history of any of these boys, but I hope you will be able to bring some of it to light. That they were of good stuff goes without saying, but I doubt much if their reward was commensurate to their risk and privations endured.

When it became generally known that the country would not be opened for settlement, our party concluded to return to Minnesota. We bought four oxen, a covered wagon, and made our return trip overland to Red Wing, travelling nineteen days, passing through the counties of Woodbury, Cherokee, Clay, Dickinson, where we visited the scene of the Spirit Lake massacre, which occurred in February, 1857. Thence we went through Brown, Fairbault, Waseca, Steele, Rice and Goodhue counties, some days swimming our oxen, and floating our prairie schooner across the swollen streams not less than three times and going to camp at night without a dry thread to our backs.

This was my second year's experience out West and it seemed to work no bad results, but, friend Kingsbury, you and I were younger in 1858 than we are now.

Yours truly,

H. P. SMITH.

In August, 1858, Joseph R. Hanson, Horace T. Bailey, John Patterson, Kerwin Wilson, and Henry and Myron Balcom reached a point opposite Yankton called Green Island. They had come from Minnesota looking for a location, and learning of the opening of the Dakota country, had resolved to get in early and secure favorable locations. As the treaty was not in effect when they reached Green Island, not having been ratified by the Senate, the Hanson party was not permitted to locate on the Dakota side of the Missouri, and remained in Nebraska, where some of the men took up land. They visited the whites on the Yankton side occasionally and found the two cabins of Holman and Frost, Todd & Co., which were the only structures on the townsite.

Some time in September the Indians made a second attack on Holman's cabin and tore it down while he and his men were across the river, and the following day a detachment of troops from Fort Randall, under Major Lovell, reached the place, intending to destroy the structure, having been so ordered by the war department. Lovell ordered Holman and his men to leave the territory, it being an Indian country. Holman made no resistance, but withdrew with his men to Nebraska, and shortly after abandoned the projected settlement, returned to Sergeant Bluffs, going out to Pike's Peak gold fields a year later.

The Hanson party made no attempt to settle in Dakota during 1858, but remained at Green Island with Saby Strahm, and provisions being limited, subsisted through the following winter on Mr. Strahm's corn and potatoes and Missouri River catfish.

In the early years the frontiers were infested by small bands of roving Indians, whose principal purpose was the purloining of horses and cattle from the settlers. The Nebraska settlers opposite Yankton were obliged to keep a continuous watch and guard over their oxen and horses to prevent them from being run off by some one of the pillaging bands who would resort to violent and deadly measures only as a last resort. In Hanson's Nebraska party was a man named Hank Balcom, who had exhausted all of his resources in getting to Green Island and who had worn his only suit of clothes until it was a mass of strings and ribbons, veritably threadbare. He had but one good eye and the sightless ball of the other was a frightful object; it was usually open, giving to his face an unnatural and very forbidding appearance. Around his waist he wore a rope for the purpose of confining the strings and ribbons into which his raiment had been worn. His hair was black and very long and had been a stranger for months to comb and brush. His head was surmounted by a slouch hat that had parted company with its crown, and a portion of his long hair protruded through the opening and lent a frightful feature to the man in perfect harmony with his other apparel. Taken as an entirety he was a person that a law-abiding citizen would not care to meet in an uninhabited country. He was abroad one day and wandered into a patch of wild rose bushes, where he gathered and ate the wild rosebuds. These were very palatable and at the same time served to eke out the very narrow rations to which the party had become reduced. As he stepped out of the patch of bushes into the narrow trail that led up on the highland bordering Green Island he confronted a band of mounted Indians, ten or twelve in number, who had come in on a depredating excursion. Balcom was terribly surprised, but his surprise was nothing compared to the terror which suddenly seized upon the Indians, who looked upon him as an unearthly being, and the chief, who was in the lead on the trail, agitated and terror-stricken, gave vent to his alarm in a loud "Whoof," wheeled his horse and fled at a racing gallop back along the trail, followed by the band, who kept up their rapid pace until lost to view. Balcom returned to the cabin and related the incident, which satisfied his companions that he could be of valuable service in affording protection from these thieving marauders. These terrified redmen never visited Green Island again during the stay of the Hanson colony, and spread a report among the Indians that the place was haunted by the evil spirit; that they had seen him and described to their superstitious hearers the weird and awful appearance of this frightful incarnation.

In October, 1858, Enos Stutsman, of Sioux City, the first lawyer, Frank Chapel, also of Sioux City, and J. S. Presho, of New York, reached Strike the Rees camp. Stutsman and Chapel were connected with the Upper Missouri Land Company as directors, and Presho was an employe of the traders; David Fisher, a blacksmith, and the first of that craft, also came in and opened a shop, also Lytle M. Griffith, the first carpenter, equal to the best that have followed him even to the present day. Frost, Todd & Co. had selected their 160-acre trading post tract fronting on the river and adjoining Picotte on the west, and this became the original townsite of Yankton. At this time 1858, October, James M. Stone selected his claim adjoining Picotte on the east and David Fisher squatted on a quarter north of Stone's. Presho, Stutsman, and Griffith took claims west of the townsite and adjoining it. There was a feeling amounting to certainty, that the Senate would ratify the treaty at the approaching session of Congress and then the lands would be thrown open to settlement and pre-emption. These early claim takers understood that the selection of claims gave them no legal right to the land, and in order to secure possession until the ratification of the treaty, they banded together as "squatters," calling their organization the "Yankton Claim Club," and mutually agreed to protect the members from claim jumpers. Mr. Stone's claim is now the "Stone farm" and the State Fair Grounds were located on one of the subdivisions of the Fisher claim. Stutman's claim was afterwards platted as an addition to the city and called "West Yankton." Hanson had also selected a claim south of Stone's which he occupied in 1859 after the ratification of the treaty.

In November, 1858, a party of business men made a trip from Sioux City to Smutty Bear's camp, inviting a young Sioux City lad named Marcus M. Parmer, to accompany them. Mark was then twelve years old and fond of novelty and exciting adventure, and he accepted the invitation. The business gentlemen were partners of the firm of Frost, Todd & Co., named Edward Atkinson and Lewis H. Kennerly. The party had its own conveyance and as game was plentiful, they took along their guns and a liberal supply of ammunition. They left Sioux City early in the morning and were ferried across the Big Sioux River by Paul Pacquette, proprietor of the famous Pacquette Ferry which figured liberally in the annals of early Dakota. Paul was a French Canadian and a popular man. On the 14th of September previous he had been married to Miss Roselle Sanguemette at the residence of the bride's parents on the Big Sioux, Judge John P. Allison, a Sioux City justice, performing the ceremony. Paul was in the midst of his honeymoon, when young Parmer and party came up, but he gave prompt attention to his business.

Herd of buffalo and antelope grazed and fattened on the nutritious prairie grasses of the Dakota plains; mink and beaver abounded along the streams and furnished profitable employment to scores of whites, French Canadians mostly, who had intermarried with the Yanktons; while water fowl literally swarmed in the lakes, sloughs and streams during the season of fall and spring. This was truly a hunter's paradise. The Sioux City party of which young Parmer was a delighted and enthusiastic member, drove along the military trail made by the freighters carrying supplies to Fort Randall, stopping now and then to test the accuracy of their marksmanship on the wild fowl which were abundant, and to quench their thirst at the little watering places which the Government expeditions had dug along the way. The party reached the east bank of the Vermillion River near the present bridge about nightfall, where they were hospitably entertained by a young man named Henry Kennerly, a brother of one of the party of traders. Kennerly had for companions at that time Arthur C. Van Meter and Van's Indian wife. They occupied a small new cabin, designed for a trading post for Frost, Todd & Co. Young Farmer mentions that they had passed three or four cabins during the day but he does not recall that there was any sign of habitation at the point where the old City of Vermillion was built a year later and was washed away during the flood of '81.

The following morning the party was ferried across the Vermillion in a flat boat, and reached Jim River about 11 o'clock without seeing a vestige of human habitation. On the east bank of the Jim they came upon the ferry house occupied by James M. Stone. This ferry house was situated very near the present wagon bridge. Stone ferried the party across and they drove on to the proposed new townsite reaching there about noon, and dined at the trading post with Mr. Fiske. This was a large double cabin and Farmer thinks there were two other cabins in the same vicinity. There were about one thousand five hundred or two thousand Indians camped on the banks of the Missouri, overlooking the river at the time of this visit. After dinner the party drove up the Smutty Bear Valley about a mile and a half to Major Lyman's cabin where they had supper, remained over night with Lyman and started on their return to Sioux City after breakfast the next day. Flour was selling at 10 cents a pound at that time, purchasable at the trading post.

In the fall of 1858 a party of Sioux City hunters made up of John Currier, William Treadway, Martin Nelson, Isaac Reynolds, Silas Marr, Robert Williams, James Buchanan and Louis Kennerly came out with a complete hunting and camping outfit and went over on the James River to hunt buffalo, which were very abundant. Their hunting grounds lay in the vicinity of Walshtown and from there east to the Vermillion. They found hundreds of buffalo besides antelope, grazing on the prairies, and enjoyed a royal hunt for three days. Every man in the party slew his buffalo, most of them took several, and returned to Sioux City burdened with hides and choice cuts of buffalo meat. The hides were tanned and each member of the party had a coat and a robe made for his own use.

BIG SIOUX AND ELK POINT SETTLEMENT

On the 12th day of October, 1835, Theophile Brughier left his home in Canada, and on the 14th of the same month he left Montreal for St. Louis. He arrived in St. Louis on the 15th of November, and on the 19th set out for Old Fort Pierre, where he arrived on the 13th of January, 1836. He lived with the Indians in the vicinity of Old Fort Pierre for nearly fourteen years; married a Dakota woman of the family of a chief, and came down the Missouri and located near the mouth of the Big Sioux River on the Iowa side, on the 15th of May, 1849. Mr. Brughier received his first contract from the Government in 1855, for furnishing supplies to the Sioux, and was also granted a license to trade with the Indians on the Missouri at the mouth of the Big Sioux. Thereafter he conducted a very profitable mercantile and freight carrying enterprise which in the course of time brought him a large fortune.

A settlement comprising a number of families of white men who had married into the Yankton tribe had been made at Big Sioux Point on the Dakota side of the river about the time of Brughier's coming to that vicinity where he established his trading house. John McBride and Christopher Maloney, who became members of the first Legislature, belonged to this settlement. Also James Somers, Antoine Fleury, Adolph Mason, Robear Primeaup, Archie and Gustav Christy and Joseph La Plant. La Plant claimed to have settled there in 1849 and was regarded as the first white settler in Cole or Union County.

Paul Paquette located in the Big Sioux River in 1854, and operated a Rope Ferry on the Sioux City and Fort Randall Wagon Road in 1856 and later, near where the present wagon bridge is located. Paquette resided on the Iowa side. It is probable that the ferry enterprise grew out of the demand for improved crossing facilities created by the establishment of Fort Randall. Austin Cole is credited noted with having been one of the first white settlers. He was a resident of Sioux City in 1857, but was frequently at Paquette's Ferry, and no doubt had his land selected and occupied soon after the ratification of the treaty, as he himself claimed in 1859. The county was first named Cole County, and he represented that district in the first and second Legislative Council. Colonel Carson had a ranch on the west bank of the Sioux as early as February, 1859, and a Frechman named Lefleur lived with him. Eli B. Wixson, of Sioux City, came into the county July 22, 1859, and selected land and built a commodious log cabin at a place which he named Elk Point, where he opened and kept the first hotel and traded with the Indians who were trapping on the Big Sioux and tributaries.

Explaining why he came to select that location and how it came to be named Elk Point, Mr. Wixson relates:

In the spring of 1856-57 we had very high water. From a point northwest of Sioux City, on the bluff, one could behold a vast body of water covering nearly all the land in sight on the Dakota side of the Big Sioux. When the water subsided my brother, the doctor, and myself, with a third party, made a prospecting trip through the land that had been submerged, and we discovered that the locality where Elk Point is located had passed through the flood and remained above water. This, and the distance from Sioux City, were strong arguments in favor of locating here. The name of the place was given by the Indians long before the whites came in, and was derived from the fact that it was a runway for elk between two points of timber, one on the Sioux and the other on the Missouri.

SPECIAL INDIAN AGENTS—WHITE TRESPASSERS

Alexander H. Redfield, of Detroit, Michigan, was appointed United States agent for the Upper Missouri Indians in 1857. The Dakota Indians had no agencies at that time and were accustomed to meet the agent, who traveled by steamboat at some designated point on the river and receive the gifts and annuities sent to them by the "Great Father." There were a number of places on the river where the Indians would gather for this purpose. Yankton was one such point and Fort Pierre was one, and there were others beyond Pierre, extending all the way to Yankton. There were also some annuities paid under the Leavenworth and Harney treaties. Such a distribution was made at Yankton during the summer of '57 and the fall of '58 when there were assembled here about six hundred lodges, estimated to average three persons to a lodge. These were the Indians seen by young Farmer.

Quite a number of emigrants came in 1858, some with prairie schooners and a good outfit of household goods, farm implements and domestic animals, and others came afoot, just a good pair of stout legs supporting a healthy body. New cabins began to dot the bottom lands here and there from the Big Sioux to Emanuel Creek. The Indians viewed this trespass with much disfavor and the licensed traders were also displeased; but for a time there was nothing done beyond a mild protest and a notice given to the intruders that they were trespassing and would not be permitted to remain. These mild remonstrances were not sufficient to stop the encroachments, nor cause any abandonment by those who had made settlements, and finally resort was had to an appeal to the Government representing that the evil had grown to such proportions that there was imminent danger of a bloody collision between the new comers and the Indians. The result was that the military authorities at Fort Randall received orders to eject all settlers who were in the territory without legal authority and cause the destruction of their improvements. The exceptions included only the persons in the employ of Frost, Todd & Company, licensed traders, and the cabins built for this firm, and the whites connected with the Indians by marriage. Agent Redfield was deputized to accompany the troops and point out the trespassers and their illicit improvements. Late in August, 1858, Captain Lovell, with his command, consisting of Company I, second regular infantry, started out from Fort Randall and began the work of destruction and ejection. Near Bon Homme a large family named Young was found housed in a new cabin. They were driven out and compelled to cross the river into Nebraska, while the soldiers put the torch to the cabin. The logs being green refused to burn, and they were torn down and plunged into the river and left to float down stream. The people who were driven out were highly indignant. There were two families and the female members were with some difficulty restrained from pelting the soldiers with cobble stones. They upbraided the Government for permitting the outrage, stigmatizing it as a hypocritical fraud for preventing the white people from occupying a country that the Indians didn't need, and didn't use and didn't know enough to use. The soldiers, notwithstanding, continued their desolating march down stream. At Yankton they found that the Indians had preceded them in the destruction of one or two cabins which had been burned the day previous to their arrival. One of these was Holman's. The troops went on to the Vermillion Valley where the agent dismissed them, having extirpated every vestige of the habitations of the new comers and driven them out of the country. They were not numerous, however. Mr. Henry Bradley, late of Yankton County, was one of the young soldiers in Lovell's command.

The Yankton Treaty of Cession was not ratified until February, 1859, but its provisions would seem to be of service in understanding the movements of parties and conditions in 1858, and as it had already been made and was ratified without change, it is here given in full:

THE YANKTON TREATY

Treaty with the Yankton Sioux Indians made on the 19th day of April, A. D. 1858.

Ratified by the U. S. Senate February 17th, 1859.

Articles of Agreement and Convention made and concluded at the City of Washington this 19th day of April, A. D. One thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight, by Charles E. Mix, Commissioner on the part of the United States and the following named Chiefs and Delegates of the Yankton Tribe of Sioux or Dakota Indians, Viz:

Article I. The said chiefs and delegates of the said Tribe of Indians do hereby cede and relinquish to the United States all the lands now owned, possessed or claimed by them, wherever situated, except four hundred thousand acres thereof, situated and described as follows, to-wit: Beginning at the mouth of the Naw-izi-wa-koo-pah or Choteau River, and extending up the Missouri River thirty miles, then due north to a point ————?,¹ thence easterly to a point on said Choteau River, thence down said river to the place of beginning; so as to include the said quantity of four hundred thousand acres. They also hereby relinquish and abandon all claims or complaints about or growing out of any and all treaties heretofore made by them to other Indians, except their annuity rights under the Treaty of Laramie, of September 17, A. D. 1857.

Article II. The land so ceded and relinquished by said chiefs and delegates of the said Tribes of Yanktons, is and shall be known and described as follows, to-wit: Beginning at the mouth of the Te-han-kas-an-da-ta or Calumet or Big Sioux River; thence up the Missouri River to the mouth of the Pa-hah-wa-kah or East Medicine Knoll River; thence up said river to its head; thence in a direction to the head of the main fork of the Wadush-kah-for or Snake River; thence down said river to its junction with the Tchau-sau-sau or Jaques or James River; thence in a direct line to the northern line of Lake Kampeska; thence along the northern shore of said lake and its outlet to the junction of said outlet with the said Big Sioux River; thence down said Big Sioux River to its junction with the Missouri River. And they also cede to the United States all their right and title to and in all the islands in the Missouri River from the mouth of the Big Sioux River to the mouth of the said Medicine Knoll River. The said chiefs and delegates hereby stipulate and agree that all the lands within the said limits are their own, and that they have full and exclusive right to cede and relinquish the same to the United States.

Article III. The said chiefs and delegates hereby further stipulate and agree that the United States may construct and use such roads as hereafter may be necessary across their said reservation by the consent and permission of the Secretary of the Interior, and by

The reader will note that the next direction was southeasterly to Choteau Creek. The selection was probably defined after the treaty was ratified, for the Indians did not know positively that they would make the treaty when they went to Washington, where the treaty was drawn.

first paying the said Indians all damages, and the fair value shall be ascertained and determined as the said Secretary of the Interior may direct. And the said Yanktons hereby agree to remove and settle and reside on said reservation within one year from this date, and until they do remove (if within said year), the United States guarantees them in the quiet and undisturbed possession of their present settlements.

Article IV. In consideration of the foregoing cession, relinquishment and agreement, the United States do hereby agree and stipulate as follows, to-wit: First. To protect the said Yanktons in the quiet and peaceable possession of the said tract of 400,000 acres of land, so reserved for their future homes, and also their persons thereon during good behavior on their part. Second. To pay for them or expend for their benefit, the sum of $65,000 per annum for the period of ten years, commencing with the year in which they shall remove to and settle and reside upon their said reservation; $40,000 per annum for and during ten years thereafter; $25,000 per annum for and during ten years thereafter; and $15,000 per annum for and during twenty years thereafter; making one million six hundred thousand dollars in annuities in the period of fifty years, of which sum the President of the United States shall, from time to time, determine what proportion shall be paid to said Indians in cash, and what portion shall be expended for their benefit, and also in what manner and for what objects, such expenditures shall be paid, due regard being had in making such determination to the best interests of said Indians. He shall likewise exercise the power to make such provision out of such sum as he may deem to be necessary and proper for the support and comfort of the aged or infirm, and helpless orphans, of the said Indians. In case of any material decrease of the said Indians in number, the said amounts may, in the discretion of the President of the United States, be reduced and diminished in proportion thereto, or they may, in the discretion of the President of the United States, be discontinued entirely, should said Indians fail to make reasonable and satisfactory effort to advance and improve their condition, in which case, such other provision shall be made for them as the President and Congress may judge to be suitable and proper. Third. In addition to the foregoing sum of one million and six hundred thousand dollars, as annuities, to be paid to, or expended for the benefit of said Indians, during the period of fifty years, as before stated, the United States hereby stipulate and agree to expend for their benefit, the sum of fifty thousand dollars more, to-wit: $25,000 in maintaining and subsisting the said Indians during the first year after their removal to and permanent settlement upon their said reservation, in the purchase of stock, agricultural implements, or other implements of a beneficial character, and in breaking up and fencing land, in the erection of houses, store houses or other needful buildings, or in making such other improvements as may be necessary for their comfort and welfare. Fourth. To expend ten thousand dollars to build a school house, or school houses, and to establish and maintain one or more Normal labor schools (as far as the sum will go) for the education and training of the children of said Indians in letters, agriculture and mechanic arts, and house-wifery, which school or schools shall be managed and conducted in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior shall direct. The said Indians merely stipulating to keep constantly thereat, during at least nine months of the year, all the children between the ages of seven and eighteen years; and if any of the parents or those having the care of children, shall refuse to send them to school, such parts of their annuities as the Secretary of the Interior may direct shall be withheld from them and applied as he may deem just and proper. And such further sum in addition to the said ten thousand dollars, as shall be deemed necessary and proper by the President of the United States, shall be reserved and taken from their said annuities and applied annually, during the pleasure of the President, to the support of said schools and to furnish said Indians with assistance and aid and instruction in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, including the working of the mills hereafter mentioned, as the Secretary of the Interior may consider necessary and advantageous for said Indians; and all instruction in reading shall be in the English language. And the said Indians hereby stipulate to furnish, from amongst themselves, the number of young men that may be required as apprentices in the mills and in the mechanics shops, and at least three persons to work constantly with each white laborer, employed for them in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, it being understood that such white laborers and assistants as may be so employed, are thus employed more for the instruction of the said scholars, than merely to work for their benefit; and that the laborers so to be furnished by the said Indians may be allowed a fair and just compensation for their services, and to be paid out of the shares of annuity of such Indians as are able to work, but refuse to do so. And whenever the President of the United States shall become satisfied of a failure on the part of the said Indians to fulfill the aforesaid stipulation, he may at his discretion, discontinue the allowance and expenditure so provided and set aside for said scholar or schools, and said assistance and instruction. Fifth. To provide the said Indians with a mill suitable for grinding grain and sawing timber, one or more mechanics shops with the necessary tools for the same, and dwellings houses for an interpreter, miller, engineer for the mill (if one is necessary), a farmer and the mechanics that may be employed for their benefit, and to expend therefor a sum not exceeding $15,000.

Article V. Said Indians further stipulate and bind themselves to prevent any of the members of their tribe from destroying or injuring any of the said houses, shops, mills, machinery, stock, farming utensils, or any other thing furnished them by the Government, and in case of any such destruction or injury of any of the things so furnished, or their being carried off by any member or members of the tribe, the value of the same shall be deducted from their general annuity; and whenever the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied that said Indians have become sufficiently confirmed in habits of industry, and advanced in the acquisition of a practical knowledge of agriculture and the mechanic arts to provide for themselves, he may at his discretion cause to be turned over to them all of the said houses and other property furnished them by the United States, and dispense with the services of any or all of the persons hereinbefore stipulated to be employed for their benefit, assistance and instruction.

Article VI. It is hereby agreed and understood that the chiefs and head men of the tribe may, in their discretion, in open council, authorize to be paid out of their said annuities, such sum or sums as may be found necessary or proper, not exceeding in the aggregate $150,000, to satisfy their just debts and obligations, and to provide for such of their half breed relations as do not live with them, or draw any part of said annuities of said Indians; Provided, however, that their said determination shall be approved by their agent for the time being and the said payments be authorized by the Secretary of the Interior; Provided also, That there shall not be so paid out of their said annuities, in any one year, a sum exceeding $15,000.

Article VII. On account of their valuable services and liberality to the Yanktons, there shall be granted in fee to Charles F. Picotte and Zephyr Rencoutre, each, one section of 640 acres of land, and to Paul Doram one half a section, and to the half breed Yankton wife of Charles Renlo and her two sisters, the wives of Eli Bedard and Augustus Travers, and to Louis Le Count, each, one half a section. The said grants shall be selected in said ceded territory, and shall not be within said reservation, nor shall they interfere in any way with the improvements of such persons as are on the lands ceded above by authority of law, and all other persons (other than Indians of mixed blood), who are now residing within said ceded country by authority of law, shall have the privilege of entering 160 acres thereof, to include each of their residences and improvements, at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

Article VIII. The said Yankton Indians shall be secured in the free and uninterrupted use of the Red Pipestone Quarry, or so much thereof as they have been accustomed to frequent and use for the purpose of procuring stone for pipes; and the United States hereby stipulate and agree to cause to be surveyed and marked, so much thereof as shall be considered necessary and proper for that purpose, and retain the same and keep it open and free to the Indians to visit and procure stone for pipes so long as they shall desire.

Article IX. The United States shall have the right to establish and maintain such military posts, roads and Indian agencies as may be deemed necessary within the tract of country herein reserved for the use of the Yanktons. But no greater quantity of land or timber shall be used for such purposes than shall be actually requisite; and if in the establishment or maintenance of such posts, roads and agencies, the property of the Yanktons shall be taken in, injured or destroyed, just and adequate compensation shall be made therefor by the United States.

Article X. No white person unless in the employment of the United States, or duly licensed to trade with the Yanktons, or members of the families of such persons, shall be permitted to reside or make any settlement on any part of the tract herein reserved for said Indians, nor shall said Indians alienate or in any manner dispose of any portion thereof, except to the United States; whenever the Secretary of the Interior shall direct, said tract shall be surveyed and divided as he shall think proper among said Indians, so as to give to each head of a family or single person, a separate farm with such rights of possession or transfer to any other member of the tribe or of descent to their heirs and representatives, as he may deem just.

Article XI. The Yanktons acknowledge their dependence upon the Government of the United States, and do hereby pledge and bind themselves to preserve friendly relations with the citizens thereof, and to commit no injuries or depredations on their persons or property, nor on those of any other tribe or nation of Indians; and in case of any such injuries or depredations by said Indians (Yanktons), full compensation shall as far as possible be made thereof out of their tribal annuities, the amount in all cases to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior. They further pledge themselves not to engage in hostilities with any other tribe or nation, unless in self defense, but to submit, through their agent, all matters of dispute and difficulty between themselves and other Indians for the decision of the President of the United States, and to acquiesce in and abide thereby. They also agree to deliver to the proper officer of the United States all offenders against the treaties, laws or regulations of the United States, and to assist in discovering, pursuing and capturing, all such offenders as may be within the limits of their reservation, whenever required to do so by such officer.

Article XII. To aid in preventing the evils of intemperance, it is hereby stipulated that if any of the Yanktons shall drink, or procure for others, intoxicating liquors, their annuity of the tribal annuities shall be withheld from them for at least one year; and for a violation of any of the stipulations of this agreement on the part of the Yanktons, they shall be liable to have their annuities withheld, in whole or in part, and for such length of time as the President of the United States shall direct.

Article XIII. No part of the annuities of the Yanktons shall be taken in payment of the debts, claims or demands against them, except such existing claims and demands as shall herein provided for, and such as may arise under this agreement, or under the trade or intercourse laws of the United States.

Article XIV. The said Yanktons do hereby fully acquit and release the United States from all demands against them on the part of said tribe, or any individual thereof, except the before mentioned right of the Yanktons to receive an annuity under said Treaty of Laramie, and except also, such as are herein stipulated and provided for.

Article XV. For the especial benefit of the Yanktons, parties to this agreement, the United States agrees to appoint an agent for them who shall reside on their said reservation, and shall have set apart for his sole use and occupation, at such point as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, 160 acres of land.

Article XVI. All the expenses of the making of this agreement, and of surveying the said Yankton Reservation, and of surveying and marking the said Pipestone Quarry, shall be paid by the United States.

Article XVII. This instrument shall take effect and be obligatory on the contracting parties whenever ratified by the Senate and the President of the United States.

In testimony whereof the said Charles E. Mix, Commissioner, as aforesaid, and the undersigned Chiefs, Delegates and Representatives of the said Tribe of Yankton Indians, have hereunto set their hands and seals at the place and on the day first above written.

This treaty was ratified by the Senate in February, 1859, and became the law of the land. And while this general fact became well known in the new West, few of the people understood the provisions of the agreement, but believed the ratification was conclusive as opening the ceded portion to settlement, and a number of new settlers came into the territory early in that year and squatted here and there near the timber tracts and began putting up their log structures. Major Redfield, the new agent of the Yanktons, was given as authority that the treaty was in effect and the country open to settlement. On the other hand the clause in the treaty giving the Indians one year in which to remove to their reservation was interpreted by them as continuing their control of the land for one year after the ratification, and led the Indians to oppose very earnestly the incoming and settlement of the whites. A great deal of ill feeling was engendered early in the year 1859 between the Indians and the new comers, and in some instances the red men took the liberty of demolishing the improvements of the whites, threatening them with more serious injury if they did not cease their trespass; and but for Picotte's friendly offices they might have resorted to forcible means to get rid of those whom they regarded as unlawfully intruding upon their domain. It would seem from this clause in the treaty that the intention was to give the Indians ample time to collect their effects and remove to their new home, but that they were no longer to exercise any authority to restrain the settlement or prevent the improvement of the country. Fortunately no scalps were taken and as the Indians practically withdrew in July when their first agent came to them and brought the first installment of their annuities, the one year claim ceased to be a bone of contention, and although hundreds of the Indians returned to their favorite camps on the James and Vermillion rivers, and remained during the succeeding fall and winter fishing and trapping, there was no further interference with the new settlers.

YANKTON INDIANS REMOVE

The lower valley of the James River and the country intervening between the valley and the proposed Town of Yankton extending also some distance up the Smutty Bear bottom, was occupied during the late spring and early summer of 1859 by about two thousand Yankton Indians including women and children, and a small number of pale faces.

The Indians had come in from Big Sioux Point, from the Vermillion and James river valleys, and from a number of smaller camps extending all the way from the Big Sioux to Choteau Creek. They numbered about two thousand two hundred men, women, children and papooses. The grand encampment at Yankton extended along the base of the highlands west and north of town to about where the Rhine crosses Capital Street, thence down that stream some distance and then to the Missouri, and thence up the bank of the Missouri to the base of the hill which is crowned by the Ohlman residence, forming an irregular circle of tepees from three to four miles in circumference.

About six hundred Indian lodges were within this semi-circle. Peace brooded over all, and preparations indicated that an important event in the career of these people was rather anxiously expected. The time was approaching when the Indians were to surrender their dominion and remove to their new homes on the reservation, and although lacking the cultivation and arts of civilization, there is little doubt that many of them were oppressed by a feeling of sadness similar to that which would render joyless the spirits of civilized people, if called upon to surrender a magnificent home in which their ancestors and themselves had been born and reared, and accept in its stead a paltry tenement, illy equipped and furnished, compared with the one surrendered. The unquestioned liberty to roam and hunt over the plains and through the valleys was to be theirs no longer. They were to be banished from the streams and forests to which they had become attached through lifelong association. And they must, too, have felt that they were making this sacrifice not of their own untrammelled will, but at the demand of a force they were powerless to resist, and that force they must have recognized as the white people. Considered from the savage point of view, can it be thought strange or remarkable that the Indians have not been able to regard the friendly professions of the pale faces as sincere?

In July following, the good steamboat Carrier reached the port of Yankton having aboard Maj. A. H. Redfield, the first United States agent of the Yankton Indians. The boat was heavily laden with food supplies, certain bales of gaudy calico, great piles of blankets, and also a number of plows, wagons, mowers, rakes, and a saw mill and grist mill combined, with boiler and engine, all to start the Indians off in good form in their farm work and housekeeping at their new homes. A party of Sioux City people, including a few ladies, were passengers on the Carrier going up as far as Fort Randall on a pleasure trip. The agent was furthermore burdened with a large sum of money—many thousands of dollars in gold and silver coin, which he was to pay over to the Indians at their new reservation as the first installment under the treaty.

At that time and for many years before and afterward, the main channel of the river ran quite close to the Dakota shore, and boats could effect a landing at any point as far west as McIntyre's Hill, now Ohlman's. The Carrier tied up near the trading post at the foot of Walnut Street.

A few days before the arrival of the boat the bands of Indians under Chief Smutty Bear located on the bottom lands a few miles above, began to entertain suspicions as to the coming of the boat, at least they professed to have grave misgivings. These bands had been in an unpleasant humor ever since the treaty was made, claiming that they were not present at the time it was signed, and severely criticized some of the treaty stipulations. There probably was a little sharp practice on the part of some of the braves by which they had secured some valuable perquisites; but the assent of these recalcitrants to the treaty had been freely given and Chief I-ta-ke-cha (C. F. Picotte) had been given full authority to sign their names to it. The dissatisfied braves claimed that Strike-the-Ree and Picotte were on too friendly terms with the whites to have proper regard for the interests of the Indians, and Smutty Bear sent a very curt message to "Old Strike" requesting him to forthwith move up to that village to receive his annuities, as he (Smutty) was now head chief of the Yanktons and intended to exercise the prerogatives belonging to that exalted station. Old Strike received the message very quietly and without any outward manifestation of ill humor, and returned answer to Smutty Bear that he, Strike, was the grand Sachem of the Yankton tribe; so recognized by the "Great Father" at Washington, and that if Smutty Bear and his followers desired any of the "loaves and fishes" from the boat they must repair without delay to the Yankton camp. This message the upper chief answered by summoning his braves and their families to forthwith proceed to the Yankton camp where the question of superiority would be settled, peaceably if it could be done with honor, forcibly if necessary. Accordingly they marched down with their tepees, dressed and painted for peace but ready for war. They threw their tents around the camp of Old Strike in the form of a crescent opening to the river. Stutsman, Presho and Chapel, white men in charge of the trading post, observing the unusual proceedings and anticipating a conflict, withdrew to the protection of the trading post, barricaded the door, and watched the movements of the contending forces from a cabin window. After considerable ceremony a council was held at which Smutty Bear aired his grievances concerning the treaty, though it was plainly manifest that his complaint was intended as an excuse for his refractory conduct, rather than to urge any real objection to the treaty. To this Strike-the-Ree made reply explaining away all of the former speaker's objections and complaints and good humoredly reprimanding him for assuming to be head chief. The council ended in a good old-fashioned Indian dog feast, typifying brotherly affection. Red Pipestone pipes were puffed, two oxen were slaughtered, cooked and devoured. The three pale faces then ventured forth from the cabin. Medicine Cow was made officer of the day. The Jim River bands came up without protest, so that when the steamboat with their agent Major Redfield was moored at the landing there were not less than two thousand bucks, squaws, little Indians and paposes, waiting on the bank of the river to give him a cordial greeting. Provisions and trinkets of various kind were distributed among the Yanktons by the wise agent who was anxious to make the first impression as favorable as possible, and the Indians were then notified that their goods and money would be turned over to them at the agency sixty-five miles by land, farther up the river. It was evident that the Indians had expected a much larger portion of this distribution would be made here at Yankton, and they would then be privileged to take their time about reaching their new home; but the agent was firm in his purpose, and insisted that they must remove at once to their reservation where he would make his arrangements and have the goods properly distributed.

Just before the Indians struck their camp preparatory to leaving for their reservation, a band of thirty-six painted warriors rode about the grand circle of tepees, vigorously whooping and brandishing their knotted riding whips, probably conveying the order to all that the hour of departure had come. A number of aged squaws went up the hill to the vicinity of Dr. Joel A. Potter's residence, where two celebrated braves had been laid away on scaffolds in the Indian fashion of disposing of their dead, where they indulged in some peculiar ceremonies of a mournful description and then buried the remains in the earth.

The boat departed near nightfall the same day and the Indians immediately folded their tepees and loaded their travois and without further ceremony many of them were on the march for Greenwood while yet the smoke from the Carrier's tall chimneys was visible in the gold of a Dakota July sunset. The many windings of the river and the delays incident to snags and sandbars made the distance covered by the boat about twice that which the Indians traversed, so that the latter were enabled to reach the agency and the point of disembarkation just about the hour the boat landed. No improvements had been made for the work of the agency, and the goods were temporarily stored under canvas. The agent had with him a force of overseers and mechanics, including William Bordino and T. A. McLeese. The work of putting up temporary structures was quickly completed and the Yankton Indians began their new life which was to be governed by their treaty obligations.

What followed is eloquently told in the subsequent career of these Indians, who from ignorance, idleness and barbarism, have steadily advanced in the scale of civilization until today those who are living and many of the descendants of that old stock are among the well-to-do farmers of Charles Mix County, attendants upon churches, patrons of schools, and upright industrious citizens of the United States. They have dissolved their tribal organization, own their own homes and farms, dress in the garb and live after the fashion of civilized people. Their numbers have decreased slightly—from 2,200 at that time, they now number 1,800. There is a greater proportion of the present generation mixed bloods, and the time may not be far distant when their descendants will become undistinguishably absorbed in the flesh and blood of the Anglo-Saxon.

Their reservation has practically disappeared, and is now covered by fruitful farms and occupied largely with the homes of Yankton Indians.

The "Upper Missouri Land Company" met at Yankton soon after the Indians withdrew, in July, 1859, and dissolved. The townsite was then surveyed into lots by John P. Culver, of Sioux City, under the direction of Enos Stutsman, who was the secretary of the "Yankton Land and Town Company," a new organization partially formed at that time, and fully organized the following spring, by the election of J. B. S. Todd, president; Patrick Robb, of Sioux City, trustee; John P. Allison, also of Sioux City, treasurer; and Enos Stutsman, secretary.

Up to about this date, however, 1859, the name "Yankton" had not been adopted. Steamboatmen and the traders and Government agents all spoke of it as the "Camp of Old Strike" in the Yankton Valley. The name Yankton was given to it by the town company above organized, and Mr. Holman claims that his party had previously bestowed upon it the same title.

In the absence of any government surveys of the newly ceded lands in the Yankton Valley, the beneficiaries of the grants under the treaty were not able to make their selections with accuracy as to boundaries; nevertheless the selections at this point were made and proved to be not very far out of the way when the lines were afterwards legally established.

The platted tract of the town included about three-fourths of a section, bounded east by Douglas Avenue, west by the east line of Prescho and Stutsman's claims, south by the river and north by a line running very near the south line of the present college grounds. A large portion of this tract was to be located with Sioux half-breed scrip, which at that time and for some years after was used by land speculators to secure choice pieces of the public domain in this and adjoining counties. There was a business or financial reason for the apparent haste shown by the townsite owners in getting their property in condition to place it upon the market.

STRIKES THE-REE, AT NINETY TWO YEARS OF AGE.

Chief of the Yankton, Sioux Tribe.

There had been since 1855 all through the western country a so-called "boom" in town lots and lands. For several years there had been a great stream of immigration pouring out from the east into Nebraska, Kansas, Minnesota and Iowa, and the speculative fever in western lands and townsites had spread throughout the entire nation. Real estate values were as high in a great many instances in the new West as they were a quarter of a century later and thousands of fortunes were won and lost by speculation in real estate during the years following 1854-55 until near the breaking out of the Civil war. Sioux City was a hotbed of this speculation and lots in that metropolis sold at very high figures. A dozen towns at least were laid out on the Nebraska side of the Missouri River and along its banks, between Sioux City and the mouth of the Niobrara River, land on that side having been in market, and town lots were sold at fabulous prices. Elegant and costly lithographed maps of these towns accompanied with a glowing description of their commercial advantages, which were usually exhibited by a fleet of steamboats moored at the levee taking in and discharging cargoes, were freely distributed through the central and eastern states; and townsite agents sold their elaborately engraved certificates of stock about as rapidly as the printing presses could furnish them. This booming state of affairs could not have been unknown to the leaders in the pioneer movements at Yankton, and it may have been a desire to get their property into market while the boom raged, that urged expedition in the preliminary work of building a metropolis at Yankton. But their haste availed little—in fact nothing at Yankton was realized from that period when values were so inflated. "Hard times" were already pressing sorely upon many industries; railway building received a decided check, and the "wild cat" banks with which the country was overstocked went down by hundreds, their currency rendered worse than worthless, entailing suffering and ruin upon thousands.

EARLY CLERGYMEN AND OTHERS

Rev. Melancthon Hoyt, an Episcopal missionary clergyman of Sioux City, and Rev. S. W. Ingham, a Methodist divine, who resided at Vermillion, but had an itinerary throughout the settlements, were among the clerical visitors of that day, holding services as best they could. The Rev. Chas. D. Martin, of Dakota City, Nebraska, preached the first sermon in Yankton County in February, 1859, but it is not known that he ever repeated his visit. William Houston, who was called the "Old Yank," sermonized occasionally on the uncertainty of life in a land of "Indians and vipers." And William Marslin, "the old Jew" who dropped in and dropped out in the most unexpected manner, discoursed on one occasion to a full gathering of the settlement on the sin of eating pork, which all the settlers indulged in when they could get it.

Marslin was an American who had embraced the Jewish faith. He was intensely religious and had credit among the settlers of knowing the Bible more thoroughly than the average of the clergy. He with his entire family resided on a farm near St. John, Nebraska.

The first death after the beginning of white settlement in Dakota occurred on the 16th of September, 1859, and was caused by a prairie fire. The grass was abundant and frosts came quite early, prairie fires lighting up the horizon at night in every direction. On the date named a squad of soldiers from Fort Randall with an ox team were passing over the trail made by Lieutenant Warren's expedition years before, about three miles north of Yankton, on their way to the Government ferry on the Jim, when they were overtaken by a prairie fire, and one of the boys fatally burned and another seriously. Armstrong, in his Yankton history tells us that "it was after dark when the party reached the ferry with the dying man and called for the boat. While crossing the river a groan was heard in the wagon, and the suffering man was dead. In the morning he appeared to be burned black as a coal, his skin cleaved from his flesh and his teeth dropped from his mouth. A rude coffin was constructed during the day and his charred remains placed in it and 'when the sun grew low and the hill shadows long,' he was borne away to a neighboring summit near the old Sioux Falls road, where his companions slowly and sadly lowered him into his grave and to a long unsuffering sleep." A rude board was put up to mark his final resting place but his name was not preserved by the settlers.

Downer T. Bramble, at the time a member of the Legislature of Nebraska from Dakota County, and who had been keeping a general store at Ponca, came up to Yankton early in the fall of 1859. Mr. Bramble had been contemplating a removal to Yankton as soon as the Indian question was out of the way, and made preparations while here for the erection of a building in which to conduct a general store business. He selected a site at the foot of Walnut Street, taking the southwest corner of that block, his structure fronting south. This was the first frame building erected in the town or county, and the lumber entering into its construction was hauled up from St. James, Nebraska. It was a one-story building, about 24 by 80. Mr. Bramble found it necessary to plaster it in order to render it comfortable and protect his freezable merchandise, and as a matter of experiment as well as necessity used a plaster made from the native chalk rock.

As the builders who came after him did not imitate his example, it is safe to conclude that the experiment did not result in recommending chalk rock for such purposes. But it served to keep out the cold. This building became somewhat historic. It was used for mercantile purposes until the fall of 1861, when the growing business of the merchant demanded more commodious quarters. It then became the executive office of Dakota and was the political head center of the ruling party for a number of years. It housed the surveyor general's office as well as the executive at the same time, and an addition was made to it which was occupied by the secretary of the territory and the territorial library. It was the meeting place for a few weeks for one of the early bolting Legislatures. At the time it was built the only other buildings on the townsite were the Indian trading post, so-called, and another log structure built by Charley Picotte in the neighborhood of Picotte Street and the river front, and occupied by himself and his Indian family; and the Ash Hotel, composed of a number of log buildings, at the corner of Broadway and Third streets.

On the 12th of October, 1859, Moses K. Armstrong, a surveyor and civil engineer and brother of the Thomas Armstrong who was later the lieutenant governor of Minnesota, in company with William Thompson, a carpenter and builder, and George Grafft, reached Yankton from Minnesota, making the journey with a big prairie schooner propelled by oxen, and went into camp on the east bank of the James River near the ferry landing. Water and feed for stock were both very convenient and very abundant, more so on the Jim than around the Yankton trading post, while the society was just as select and the Indians fully as numerous.

If the reader has never experienced the novelty of camping in the vicinity of a large body of Indians "at home" then he has got a very novel and entertaining experience in store for him. The Indians are superstitious and are by nature and habit early risers.

THE INDIAN IN HIS DOMESTIC RELATIONS

The dawn of day is an event in every well regulated tepee. It is then that the Indian arises and dons his abbreviated garment. He then speaks out in a loud voice, as though talking to some one inside the tepee, saying something after this fashion: "Wakan Sica!—Wakan Sica! Wakan Wakan, Wati etanhan, Kikoda Yo! Wakan Sica!" being translated means, "Bad devil, bad devil, devil; get you gone from my door. O, bad devil." No sooner has this jargon been started in one tepee than it is taken up and repeated by the neighbors and soon the whole camp resounds with a perfect babel of voices shouting this refrain with a good deal added to it. This however does not terminate the early rising exercise. The talking inside the tepees continues until it is fairly light, but not an Indian will be seen out of doors, and in the meantime hundreds of dogs have been aroused, yelping and barking and pouring forth a torrent of noise that it is impossible to describe. It is said that this early rising custom prevails largely among all barbarous and semi-civilized savages, and that its object is to drive away the evil spirits who during the night have entered the village and are gathered at the entrance of each tepee prepared to seize and destroy the first person who comes forth in the early morning. The noise is sufficiently terrifying to effectually accomplish this purpose, for when it gets light enough to enable one to discern objects out of doors, it is discovered that every devil has vanished out of sight. The Indians are now ready to begin the serious work of the day and the squaws are aroused for that purpose. They light the fires, and make ready the frugal breakfast.

This peculiar custom of the uncivilized savage can be remotely associated with the devotional morning service in all enlightened Christian households where the family gather to implore God's blessings through the day, and pray that He lead them not into temptation but deliver them from evil. Possibly this custom of the modern Indian is a relic of an ancient ceremony when their ancestors besought the Great Spirit to deliver them from evil.

Necessity had taught the Indian very little regarding the construction of a domicile or in furnishing it. Their domiciles are called "tipis," pronounced "tepees," and ordinarily are a conical structure, eight or nine feet high and twenty-five or thirty feet in circumference at their base, sloping to a pointed peak where an aperture a half foot in diameter is left through which the smoke escapes. The wall of the tipi is composed first of poles set on the ground in the shape of a circle and gathered together at the top, leaving the aperture before mentioned for chimney purposes. These poles support a wall of ducking or canvas fastened together with stout thread or sinews, and before these were procurable, the skins of the animals slain in the chase were used for this purpose and are yet to a limited extent by the chieftains.

These canvas or other coverings are fastened to the earth and also securely tied at the top with an opening left at one point for a low entrance. This completed the domicile proper. Inside the furnishings are of the plainest and simplest that can be suggested. Around the circle near the canvas were bestowed the sleeping quarters and it was surprising the number that could be accommodated with lodging accommodations in one of these primitive abodes. In the center of the room and directly under that small aperture in the roof are two forked stakes driven into the earth about three feet apart, a pole or an iron rod stretched across between the stakes supporting a good sized camp kettle in which the family cooking is done. Underneath the kettle the fire is kindled when it is needed. The squaw-wife has the management of the household, she also procures the fuel, builds the fires, and tradition informs us performs all the manual labor necessary to keep the establishment in proper order and free from debt. Her Hilinakee, as she designates her liege lord and master, does the fishing and hunting, and smoking and trading, and represents the family and its dignity on all occasions. As a rule there is peace in the family—there are very few domestic infelicities. The marital vows, in most tribes, are held sacred and the "Hilinakee" and his "Tawiau" move along in their allotted spheres in a quiet, peaceful, contented and reasonably happy way. The instances where this is not the case are the exceptions to the rule, and one case of infelicity never fails to attract much more attention than the straightforward and honorable course pursued by hundreds of others. That the women perform what we term the work or the drudgery is to a certain extent true, but it is not put upon her by a hard-hearted brute of a husband; it is the result of ages of custom, and is considered no hardship; for the Indian squaw residing in the tepee would not perform as much manual labor in a month as the ordinary domestic in a civilized white family would perform on a washing day or a cleaning house day. Where the Indian family were in situated that it could till a patch of ground, the squaw usually attended to the sowing, cultivating and harvesting, but there was not a great amount of it at any time to be done and the warrior husband would in the meantime be occupied in the chase or on the warpath, securing game or the spoils of a successful battle for the subsistence of his family.

The writer has no desire to defend the Indian custom of keeping the squaw in a menial situation and as using her simply as a bearer of burdens, which without any extenuation has obtained credence in the public mind; but where this matter is examined free from prejudice and also free from popular notions which have never had any legitimate ground to stand upon, it will be seen that the large majority of Indian women have much less to complain of in their domestic relations than the majority of white women who are subjected to a life of penury, toil and privation by their worthless husbands. Our ordinary police courts in all communities disclose a condition of marital troubles and hardships that you would search in vain to parallel or to approach among any tribe of Indians.

Regarding the influence exerted upon the Indians by the pioneer whites who intermarried with Indian women and thus practically became members of the tribe, there may be diversity of opinion, but observation must have taught that in the great majority of instances the white individual was not improved by the association and the same may be said of the Indian. The motives, ordinarily, that led the white person to abandon civilization and seek a domestic career among a savage people and cling to such life from choice were not such as sway the minds of men of good inclinations and ordinary ambition. There may have been a few instances where persons who were the victims of unrequited affection or had suffered some monstrous reverse of fortune, sought surcease for their afflicted minds among these strange, and to a civilized person, totally uncongenial people whom we call savages; but the great majority seemed to have taken to it because of predilection and possibly in verification of the theory that civilized man, or many of them, following their natural impulses and asking guidance from no higher power or more potent source, will retrograde and deteriorate rapidly to the savage state, divested of the environment and virtues of civilization; and obtaining no recompense by securing the virtues of the savage—leaving him virtueless—a moral wreck; if in fact he had not touched this condition before his association with the Indian squaw, for we know that he would not be led to his most abhorrent vices by any example or precept furnished him by the savage. The worst characters on the frontiers—the most reckless and violent—were white skinned men who had been trying to live and talk like the Indians and swagger and swear like brutes. The most calamitous evil growing out of this association was the lasting impression these examples made upon the mind of the untutored and unartful savage regarding the white race. The great majority of these aboriginal people had known nothing of the pale face—many of them may never have seen a white man except those who had obtruded themselves into their society—they could not journey to the abodes of the better and higher civilization, and that civilization had not come to them—so that this preliminary acquaintance with the white race left in his mind a prejudice hurtful and radically unjust toward all white people. The savage nature is not on that account unclean or impure. The Indian, almost as a rule, would be found as possessing sterling traits of character; high-minded, truthful; actuated by commendable motives; governed by good rules that might be termed principles, and while he could be extremely cruel and utterly merciless in dealing with a foe, his nature revolted at the coarse unbridled licentiousness and rank dissipation of his white tribal relative, and he was seldom found participating in his degrading conduct.

A large quantity of hay belonging to the pioneers was destroyed in the fall by the prairie fires which were quite fierce and swept over a large area. The settlers who had animals to feed through the winter cut a second supply in the marshes and lowlands in October. It was not merchantable hay, but it was much better than no feed.

ASH HOTEL, YANKTON, 1866.

Armstrong and Thompson, new arrivals from Minnesota before mentioned, had gone into camp on the James River upon their arrival in the territory, and remained there for a number of weeks before removing to the settlement in town. They were so encamped during the season of these prairie fires, and came very near losing their winter's stock of provisions and tent. The fire assailed them in the dead of night while they were sound asleep, and had eaten away a portion of the tent before the heat aroused them. Mad Bull's band of Yanktons were in camp near and the squaws who, after the Indian custom do all the hard work, were engaged in fighting the fire with wet blankets when Armstrong awoke. The Indian women in their strange and scant attire, in the glare of the furious flames which they were making frantic efforts to subdue, looked more like a band of Tam O' Shanter witches than human beings. Thompson, Armstrong's roommate, was awakened by the ridge pole of the tent falling upon his head. He glanced toward the blazing prairie and the squaws and, supposing the Indians had attacked their camp, sprang to his feet with a yell and started on a keen run for the river under the impression that he had been hit on the head with a tomahawk.

A census of the inhabitants of Yankton in October, 1859, would have shown the following named pioneers: W. P. Lyman, Chas. F. Picotte, Samuel Mortimer, James Witherspoon, James M. Stone, David Fisher, Lytle M. Griffith, Joseph R. Hanson, Frank Chapel, J. S. Prescho, Enos Stutsman, Moses K. Armstrong, William Thompson, Obed Foote, William Werdebaugh, Otis B. Wheeler, Horace T. Bailey, George Pike, Jr., A. B. Smith, Samuel Jerou and William Houston, an eccentric educated man who was locally designated as "Old Yank." And there were in addition the following named settlers in the valley of the lower James River: John Stanage, Felix LeBlanc, John Lefevre (Old Dakota), L. G. Bourret, F. Johnson, M. Minde, L. Hanson, John Alseth, John Betz, Henry Arend, Thomas Frick, William Neuman, Ole Olson and John Claude.

There were also three white women, wives of the settlers, Mrs. Stanage, Mrs. Frick and Mrs. Arend; five children, one son and one daughter of Stanage, John and Mary, two sons of Arend, Henry and Chris, and Mary, a daughter of Thomas Frick.

W. P. Lyman had taken a claim adjoining the townsite on Smutty Bear bottom which he improved and cultivated, and Judge Prescho had also taken a claim adjoining the town on the west.

In July, 1859, John Stanage with his wife and two children, John and Mary, with two yoke of oxen, two new wagons, a few cows, a breaking plow and a good supply of provisions reached the east bank of the James River near the Government ferry and went into camp. Mr. Stanage had been a soldier in the regular army but his term of five years ended in '57 at Fort Pierre, and he had then taken employment in the quartermaster's department after his discharge, and remained until '59, when he resolved to start out for himself; went down to Sioux City by steamboat, outfitted as above stated, and returned as far as the Valley of the James, where he soon selected a location, and fell to work getting out house logs and constructing a pioneer home. He was the first settler on the James, in fact he was the first farmer probably in the Territory of Dakota to settle upon his land and cultivate the soil as his sole occupation. His wife was then the only white woman in the territory outside of Fort Randall and Sioux Falls and Fort Abercrombie, and we know of none others in the territory west of the Big Sioux except those at Fort Randall. Their only neighbors were the Yankton Indians, a number of whom Mr. Stanage employed to help him in his building operations. The Indians were perfectly well disposed, and Mr. Stanage, having learned their language while in the military service, had no trouble in negotiating with them. About the same time Felix LeBlanc, who had been appointed blacksmith at the Yankton agency, selected his claim near Mr. Stanage and employed an old Frenchman named LaFevre who was better known as "Old Dakota" to open up the farm and improve it. LeBlanc was making $150 a month at the agency and for the time being concluded to run his farm by proxy, though his wife and children came down to the claim two or three times a year in order to keep within the law's restrictions as to residence, and during these visits Mrs. LeBlanc would do some cooking for the old Frenchman which he did not relish, because he didn't want any women around. He was an expert cook and a fine farmer and could see no possible use for a woman on general principles. He was a confirmed bachelor and quite an eccentric character. Henry Arend and Thomas Frick, John Betz, and Robert Buckheart took claims a little later on this side of the James River in the vicinity of the ferry. It would seem that Ireland, Canada, Norway, Germany and Dakota were all represented in these settlements. Stanage put in a good rope ferry at his place the same fall; this was about a mile below the first ferry put in by Lyman, and "Stanage's Crossing" became popular in after years and the major portion of the travel patronized him, especially emigrants and freighters who found the camping privileges much superior. LeBlanc a few years later built a bridge at his claim and the ferries were then sent farther north and west.

Henry Clay Ash, of Sioux City, a whole souled, genial Hoosier, born and bred, and possibly the most popular of all the early pioneers, came to Yankton early in October and put up two log buildings on the site of the present Merchants Hotel, and on Christmas eve following, at the close of a very cold day he came from Sioux City with his family, and the Ash Hotel was opened on Christmas, 1859, in the log structures. Mrs. Ash was the first white woman to take up an abode in Yankton.

The first jury trial in Dakota took place in Yankton in March, 1860. In the absence of local law, the "Yankton Claim Club" furnished the procedure and the rules. The case to be decided was a claim contest between W. P. Lyman and George Gillmore, a new comer. The land in dispute was a tract in Smutty Bear which a few years later became the home of Jacob Brauch and family. The judge was M. K. Armstrong, Enos Stutsman was Lyman's lawyer, while Gillmore, of Hanson's Nebraska party, seems to have appeared in his own behalf, there being no attorney, except Stutsman, among the settlers. The jury was composed of D. W. Whitmer, Robert Crippen and P. Dupuis. The witnesses who testified were J. R. Hanson, Horace T. Bailey, Chas. Picotte, and James Falkenberg. The case was given to the jury after able arguments by both parties, who returned a verdict in favor of Lyman, and that ended the case. There was no higher court for Gillmore to appeal to and the verdict seemed to be generally upheld by the settlers.

FIRST BLIZZARD VICTIM

The winter of 1860-61 was extremely rigorous, especially the closing weeks. No known record was kept but the cold was intense for a long time, snows were frequent, high winds prevailed, and the drifts were colossal. It was a long, blizzardy winter and Geo. D. Fiske, the first white resident of Yankton, was frozen to death on the night of the 10th of February, during a scathing, blinding blizzard. Mr. Fiske came to Yankton in 1858 in the employ of Frost, Todd & Company and for some time represented that firm at this point. He had not been in this employ, however, for about a year before his death, and had spent a good portion of the summer and fall of 1860 at the little settlement of Frankfort on the Nebraska side. He was stopping with Wm. Thompson at the latter's claim cabin that winter. This cabin was situated in the vicinity of Valentine's old home northwest of and adjoining Yankton, where Thompson had made a pre-emption. On the night Fiske met his death, he was down town, and during the evening and while the storm was fiercely raging he called at the Ash Hotel to rest awhile. He told Mr. Ash he was on his way out to Thompson's and he was met by a vigorous protest from that gentleman, who with great earnestness urged him to give up any such attempt for the night, as the chances were a hundred to one that he would perish. The wind was howling and the air was literally filled

MR. AND MRS. JOHN STANAGE

Settled in Yankton County on "Jim" River in 1879

MR. AND MRS. HENRY C. ASH

Mrs. Ash, the first white woman to come to Yankton, arrived on Christmas day, 1879. Mr. and Mrs. Ash built and ran the first hotel in Yankton.

with the flying snow. It would have been a dangerous storm to face in daylight, and in this case the way to Thompson's was a good three-fourths of a mile over a trackless prairie without a sign of habitation between, and the eddying and whirling snow so violent as to literally take one's breath away and to cause such confusion of the senses as to make it impossible to keep in any certain direction. The wind at times would seem to come with equal force from every point of the compass. Ash pleaded with him to abandon his intention, but the man was stubborn and determined to go. He told Ash he could make it and finally started out. He must have lost his way very soon after leaving the hotel, and instead of heading for Thompson's he made his way west up the slope of the hill until he reached a spot just north of Judge Presho's old cabin, where he fell exhausted and died. His body was found the next day after the storm by a searching party. Armstrong in his early history tells us that his funeral was the first in the county and in the absence of a clergyman the solemn ceremonies were performed by his young friends and companions. This was the first death in Yankton and the second in the county, both resulting from fire and storm. Mr. Fiske was a southern man but from what place or even state was not known among his acquaintances here. He was a good business man and popular with the settlers. He was buried in a plat of ground near Thompson's cabin, and here for a number of years those who died in Yankton were buried. Cemetery grounds were afterwards donated by Picotte on College Hill and these early interments were removed to the new burial place.

H. C. Ash was one of the searching party that discovered the lifeless remains of the unfortunate man and assisted in preparing his body for burial. Fiske had worn a pair of leather mittens the night he was frozen and when found his hands were tightly clenched and held a small ball of ice that had formed from the snow he had gathered in his mittens. These mittens were left at the Ash Hotel and as no one cared to take them away Mr. Ash placed them on a shelf where they would be out of the way, as he didn't feel like throwing them into the street. He never had any desire to interfere with them, and denies that he is in the least superstitious, but says that for a number of years after, these mittens would turn up before him in the most unexpected places and at the most unseasonable times, and he could never account for it.

ELK POINT AND COLL. COUNTY

The Town of Elk Point was first laid out on an eighty acre tract by the Elk Point Townsite Company, of which E. B. Wixson was president. There have been additions made to the town of which quite a portion was on Wixson's land. Frost, Todd & Company had nothing near this place. Doctor Burleigh bought 160 acres of Hastings Seamond and laid it out in town lots. The Pinckney and Carpenter additions were a part of Wixson's claim. The main street of Elk Point is the territorial road located by the Federal Government in 1865 when Colonel Moody or A. B. Miller was superintendent of that enterprise. Mr. Wixson is still living at Elk Point, which has grown to be a thriving and prosperous city, vindicating fully the promise it held out when Mr. Wixson made his settlement there nearly half a century ago.

Mrs. George Stickney was the first white woman to settle in that section. She came in 1860. Her husband was a prominent lawyer, legislator and politician of that county for a number of years. Early in the spring of 1860, John R. Wood and family, George Stickney and family, Wm. Adams, Myron Sheldon, Hastings Seamond, David Benjamin and Mr. Bartlett, settled near Wixson and N. J. Wallace came a little later, taking up land adjoining Michael Ryan's claim at Jefferson. J. A. Wallace, attorney at law, was an early settler.

According to the recollection of Mr. M. B. Kent and data that he has been collecting and preserving, the first settlers at Richland and on Brule Creek, beginning in 1860, were Myron Kuykendall, A. R. Stoddard, Amos Dexter, Orrin Fletcher, Milton M. Rich, John Reams, Thomas C. Watson, E. B. LaMoure, Judson LaMoore, Elmer and Lester Seward, Thaddeus Andrews, Carl Kingsley, Patrick Comfort and a brother, Thomas Olson, John Thompson, J. O. Taylor, Chris Thompson, J. E. Hoisington, W. H. H. Fate, James Fate, and their father, Thomas Fate, Ole Bottolfson. West of Elk Point were Hiram Stratton, E. C. Collins, William Flannery, K. P. Ronne, John Morris, Emory Morris, Joseph LaBarge, David Benjamin, Runyan Compton and M. D. Weston. South of Elk Point were Alvin Cameron, R. H. Langdon, David Pennell, Sherman Clyde, John Donovan, David Walters, R. R. Green, Howard Mosier, Solomon B. Stough, Daniel Ballinger, Silas Rohr, Hegeick Townsend, Anthony Summey, Josiah Bowman, Charles Patton. East were John R. Wood, Preston Hotchkiss, George Stickney, James Phillips, Benjamin Briggs, F. W. Smythe, Jacob Keplinger, Patrick Carey, Daniel Connolley, Michael Curry, Wesley McNeil, George Geisler.

Among the first settlers in Elk Point were Eli B. Wixson, J. W. Vandevere, Timothy Bryan, L. K. Fairchild, Henry Rowe, C. W. Briggs, C. M. Northrup, Hiram Gardner, William Baldwin, Frederick Stroble, D. M. Mills, W. W. Adams, Joseph Dufraw, M. U. Hoyt, J. P. Bennet. The early settlers at Jefferson (the twelve mile house) were Michael Ryan, Charles LaBreche, Joseph Yerter, Desire Chaussee, the Beaubeans, Antonia Remillards and the Fountains. This vicinity was known as the French settlement.

In 1859 a large colony of French Canadians who were excellent farmers, exceedingly industrious, moved in and formed what was called the French Settlement between Elk Point and the Big Sioux in the central portion of the future Cole County. For many years following, this settlement was famous for its well improved farms, the superior quality of its products, including live stock, its substantial improvements, and the hospitality and enterprise of the inhabitants. So attractive was it that pleasure parties from Sioux City made it daily visits during the growing seasons; and the most enterprising of the pioneer real estate dealers and agents conveyed their customers there to exhibit the improvements and to show them what could be done with Dakota soil in the hands of skillful farmers. This was in the early years of Dakota's settlement when its agricultural value was an unproved problem—when even its friends shook their heads in doubt as to its fitness for general farming; when frequent drouths afflicted, and myriads of hungry shark-teeth grasshoppers paid the Dakota settlements annual visits. Chiefly among American settlers this skeptical feeling was prevalent and bore most heavily and it was remarked as the seasons grew better that during the years when these scourges were most serious, the Scandinavians, Irishmen, Germans and Canadians were seldom known to complain.

The first political convention held in the future Cole and later Union County, convened at Big Sioux Point some time after the governor's proclamation was issued in 1861, when the following proceedings were had:

Big Sioux Point, Aug. 17, 1861.

Pursuant to notice the voters of the First Council District in Dakota Territory met in Mass Convention at the house of Mr. Ryan, the Fourteen Mile House.

The Convention was organized by electing Dr. R. Phillips, Chairman, and Judson LaMoore, Secretary.

The Chairman then stated the object of the Convention to be the nomination of two Councilmen to represent said District in the First Territorial Legislature.

Mr. Brookings, of Sioux Falls, asked permission to address the Convention, which being granted, he spoke at some length on the policy of allowing one Councilman to the Red River of the North.

By permission, Mr. Cole addressed the Convention on general topics, after which the Convention proceeded to the nomination of Councilmen, voting for one at a time. A ballot being had, it appeared that Austin Cole had received a majority of all the votes cast and was declared duly nominated.

On motion the Convention proceeded to ballot for the second Councilman, which resulted in Eli B. Wixson receiving a majority of all the votes polled, and was declared duly nominated for Councilman.

No further business appearing, on motion the Convention adjourned.

JUDSON LAMOURE, Secretary.

R. PHILLIPS, Chairman.

At the first election held under the Governor's proclamation in September, 1861, the first council election district extended from the mouth of the Big Sioux River to Pembina or to the 49th parallel, a distance in an air line of about four hundred and thirty miles, probably the longest legislative district ever defined. The nominees for the two council positions were W. W. Brookings, of Sioux Falls, and Austin Cole, E. B. Wixson and William Matthews, of Elk Point, Big Sioux Point and Brule Creek. Another candidate, James McFetridge, was in the field in the Pembina section. There was no effort made by the candidates from either end of the district to stump the entire territory covered by the legal boundaries, so that Mr. McFetridge had everything his way at St. Joseph and Pembina and received more votes twice over than all his rivals received added together. McFetridge had 158 votes at St. Joseph and 15 at Pembina, giving him 173. Cole received 27 votes at Big Sioux Point; Wixson, 15; William Matthews, 15; and Brookings, 13. And at Elk Point Cole had 16; Wixson, 15; Matthews, 12; and Brookings, 12. At the Sioux Falls precinct Brookings had 9; Cole, 5; and Wixson, 3. Cole and Brookings were elected and owing to the failure of the Red River returns to reach the governor, the candidates named received the certificates from the governor, to whom the election returns were made.

The first representative district included only a small fraction of the Sioux Valley. The vote for representative at Elk Point gave A. R. Phillips 12 votes; John McBride, 4; Christopher Maloney, 10; and John R. Wood, 18. At Big Sioux Point the vote stood for Phillips, 10; McBride, 23; Maloney, 25; and Wood, 11; electing McBride and Maloney after an exciting contest.

In June, 1859, it having been officially stated by one of the early exploring parties that the Big Sioux River was a navigable stream, the steam ferry boat at Sioux City called the Lewis Burns, with a party of ladies and gentlemen from that town, made a voyage up the Big Sioux to the mouth of Rock River. The Lewis Burns was a good sized boat and this trip was very successful as a social affair and as demonstrating the practicability of navigating the Big Sioux for that distance for light draught boats. The subsequent settlement and development of the valley does not show that the experimental trip was of any practical value. We do not learn that a similar voyage has ever been undertaken since the pioneer trip was made, and it is safe to presume that there was not sufficient business prior to the advent of railroads, to warrant the construction of a light draught boat for that forty miles of river.

The first death in Cole county (now Union), that there is record of, occurred May 25, 1862, and was that of Susan Oleson, a young girl of fourteen years of age, and was occasioned by drowning in Brule Creek. She was residing in the family of William Frisbie, and had been sent on some errand to the creek near the house, and not returning search was made, and the lifeless body discovered some distance below where she had accidentally fallen in. Efforts were made to revive her, and Doctor Phillips was summoned, who tried to resuscitate the unfortunate child, but all efforts were unavailing. She was buried in a plot of ground selected with reference to a permanent location for cemetery purposes.

Unlike the other sections that were settled about the same time, the early comers to Union County did not center at one point, but located and built up four and perhaps five central or trading points for as many farming communities. These were Big Sioux Point, Elk Point, Richland, Jefferson and one other not far west of the Big Sioux bridge, which was called Willow P. O. and afterwards McCook.

CHARLES MIX COUNTY

That portion of Dakota called Charles Mix County was the home of a few white men as early as 1858, and in 1861 had a population of about fifty white persons, nearly all contractors and their employees, who furnished supplies to the garrison at Fort Randall.

A French Canadian named Antoine Bijou established a trading post in the upper portion of that county and conferred upon that long stretch of rugged eminences that run parallel with the river for forty miles the name of Bijou Hills. These hills are bold irregular bluffs, much more elevated than the country surroundings. His settlement is supposed to have been made in 1813. He had serious trouble with the Indians, who finally compelled him to abandon his post, and some of his trading stock. He was doubtless the first white man to settle in that section.

Just above the Yankton reservation line in Charles Mix County was the Pease settlement, with F. D. Pease, E. M. Wall, Felicia Fallas, Colin La Mont, John Mallert, Ed Fletcher, G. A. Fisher and Joe Ellis. About twenty miles beyond was Pratt Creek, the seat of the Hamilton settlement, and the actual jumping off place of civilization. Here were Joseph V. Hamilton, a lifelong frontiersman who had been for thirty years connected with the American Fur Company. He was the leader and patriarch of this settlement, with Paul Harol, Napoleon Jack, Colin Campbell, William Bartlett, Abel Forceess and John Archambeau as companions. The Pease settlement was also somewhat famous in early days as being the home of Mr. Cardinelle Grant, who was the oldest white man in Dakota, and so far as known the oldest in the West. He was born in 1765, in the Canadian Province of Quebec.

Lake Andes, in Charles Mix County, is the largest lake in the southern portion of Dakota. It is shaped somewhat like a new moon and has a length of fifteen miles, with an average width of one and a quarter miles. It was surveyed a number of years before Dakota was settled by a surveyor named Edward Andes, an employe of the American Fur Company, and bears his name. It has a depth of about fifteen feet. No species of fish are indigenous to its waters, but the experiment is being made of planting some of the ordinary varieties. Two creeks empty into it draining a large section of the country. Its outlets are concealed beneath its surface. Its waters are good and it was a famous buffalo watering place during the first half of the eighteenth century and prior. It is now the most popular resort in the southern part of Dakota for hunting parties in quest of water fowl, a number of the varieties abounding there in great numbers.

Maj. J. V. Hamilton, founder of what was known as the Hamilton settlement on Pratt Creek, in Charles Mix County, died at Fort Randall, where he had been taken for medical treatment, on Friday, the 23d of August, 1867. He had been on the frontiers since his boyhood, and was one of the oldest of western pioneers at the time of his death. He was appointed agent of the Omahas and Pawnees, at Council Bluffs, by Pres. Andrew Jackson, was at one time the sutler at Fort Leavenworth, and held a like position at Fort Snelling, Minnesota. He had also spent some years in the fur trade in the employ of the American Fur Company on the Yellowstone, and removed from the Yellowstone to settle on Pratt Creek, Dakota Territory, with his sons in 1859. This point was thirty miles above Fort Randall, and up to the time of his death it was an outpost on this frontier. Major Hamilton was a son of Maj. Thomas Hamilton, of the United States Army, and grandson of Col. John Whistler, also a regular army officer. He was born at Fort Madison, Iowa, on the Mississippi River, in 1811. His two sons, Charles and Grant, were with him at the time of his death. Major Hamilton was known among the Indians as the "man that fears nothing," and received this name from the following audacious incident in his career: In 1839 or '40, General Kearney was ordered to Council Bluffs with a detachment of troops to hold a council with the Indians, there being at that time some disturbance among them. When the Indians came in, having been summoned by their agent, they showed signs of an ugly temper. General Kearney thought to appease them by appearing in council with his soldiers all unarmed, to prove to the red men that he had no hostile intentions. The subordinate officers remonstrated, deeming it very imprudent, but they could not move the general, and then turned to Hamilton and urged him to see the general and dissuade him from such a dangerous step.

MRS. LIZZIE CASH ECCLES

First white child born in Yankton. Date of birth, 1863. Now a resident of Belle Fourche.

Hamilton saw that the Indians were in an ugly mood and prepared to commit some desperate act, and therefore went to the general and represented the critical situation to him, stating that he would run the risk of losing the life of every soldier and his own if he persisted in disarming his men. Kearney refused to change his plan, however, and required his officers and men to appear at the council without their arms. There were a number of kegs of powder and other ammunition on the council ground, designed as peace gifts from the "Great Father." Hamilton with his interpreter took his station immediately in front of the Indians, who were seated some four or five deep, in a semi-circle, in numbers from four to five hundred. General Kearney and his staff were on one side of Hamilton, and the soldiers, numbering one hundred men, on the other. The council had not proceeded far when Hamilton discovered that the Indians were awaiting a signal to begin a massacre, and he understood their character so well that he believed the life of every white man present was about to be sacrificed, and would be unless the Indians could be turned from their purpose. Quick as thought he sprang into the ring, seized a glowing ember from the council fire, and jumped upon an open keg of powder, exclaiming to the Indians: "If you do not every one of you instantly lay down your arms and retire from the ring, I will set fire to the powder and we will all go to the Spirit Land together." The Indians were appalled, and unconsciously dropped their arms and precipitately retired beyond the danger point, and the tragedy was averted, for it was subsequently ascertained that the Indians knew the whites were unarmed and intended to scalp the entire party. After recovering from their demoralization and being assured that they would not be punished for their premeditated offense, the Indians were allowed to state their grievances, which were not serious and were adjusted with presents and promises and cautioned to maintain peaceful relations with the "Great Father." Agent Hamilton's wonderful nerve had so won their admiration that they all came up, shook his hand with many ejaculations commending his bravery, and declared that he was a man that was afraid of nothing, and his Indian title from that time had that significance. Hamilton had been in peril a number of times during his career, and his body exhibited scars inflicted by knife and bullet, received in encounters with the Indians.

WEST OF THE MISSOURI RIVER

Crossing the Missouri at White Swan to Fort Randall, and coming east by south, Mixville, near the Ponca Indian Agency, was the first settlement. It was about twenty miles from the fort. The Poncas were comparatively well advanced in civilized methods at that time and did not mingle with other tribes, though many of their warriors were inclined to make forays upon the white settlements for plunder. They had a permanent village; their houses made of dirt were called Dirt Lodges. They were much more comfortable and a much better quality of dwelling than the tepee of the Yanktons. At this agency and at Mixville were found J. Shaw Gregory, Judge James Tufts, Robt. M. Hagaman, Peter Keegan, Jonathan Lewis, Harry Hargis, Joel A. Potter, Geo. Detwiler, Charles McCarthy and Robert Barnum. Gregory was the agent, and was the eldest son of Rear Admiral Gregory, then one of the foremost of our naval commanders. All whom we have named stamped the impress of their genius upon the material and intellectual advancement of the territory, and all except Barnum, Keegan, McCarthy and Detwiler, subsequently removed to Yankton.

As originally bounded, Dakota Territory included the eastern portion of the Niobrara River to the point of confluence with the Kaha Paha, thence up that stream to the 43d parallel. In 1882 an act of Congress approved March 28th ceded to the State of Nebraska all the territory lying south of the 43d parallel and west of the Missouri, which cession was accepted by a vote of the people of that state at an election held May 23, 1882. The tract so ceded amounted to about six hundred square miles and had been organized as the County of Todd, Dakota.

Territory, in 1862. This will explain why and how Todd County came to be lost from the map of the territory, and its membership in the Legislature dropped from the roll.

At the first election held under the governor's proclamation in 1861 the settlements west of Choteau Creek on the east side of the Missouri River and the communities on the west side of the river east of Fort Randall constituted the Sixth Council and Representative District, and at the September election J. Shaw Gregory, of Ponka Precinct, was elected councilman, and John L. Tiernon, of Fort Randall, representative. Gregory received twenty-six votes on the east side and twenty-nine at Ponka Precinct on the west, giving him fifty-five votes. His opponent, Freeman Norval, received thirty votes on the east side and none at Ponka. For the House, Tiernon received twenty-seven votes west of Choteau Creek and twenty-eight at Ponka, giving him fifty-five. Henry Price, his unsuccessful opponent, received twenty-seven votes west of Choteau, but had no support whatever at Ponka. It was claimed at the time that Gregory was an Indian agent, and Tiernon an army officer, which was a fact, but no objection was raised in either House to their eligibility to serve as legislators.

THE DAKOTAH INDIAN NATION

History furnishes a very satisfactory account of the Dakotah nation of Indians beginning in the sixteenth century, when they inhabited the country west of Lake Michigan. They were a warlike people, as all Indians were, but their wars were altogether with other Indian tribes—the Hurons, Iroquois and Algonquins—in which they were uniformly successful. They were known as a very honorable nation, truthful and faithful to their agreements. Garreau, a young French missionary, writing of the Dakotahs, whom he termed the Nadoweah Sioux, in the sixteenth century, says that "they are a people to be dreaded, who though using only bow and arrow, are so skillful and unerring in their aim as to make them a most formidable enemy. They can fire their arrows swiftly and with deadly aim while running, and even shoot behind with fatal accuracy, simply turning their heads in their flight and taking momentary aim." Their language differed radically from all other tribes, and they were credited with the virtue of always telling the truth and abiding by the letter and spirit of their promises. They were humane in the treatment of captives taken in their wars, and frequently released them. They were at war a great deal with their traditional enemies, though the cause or purpose of their contests could never be ascertained unless it was for the purpose of exterminating the other nations or tribes in order to have sole possession and occupation of the land and its resources. These wars, however, seldom resulted in a battle where a force was engaged on either side. It was a condition of animosity that remained from generation to generation, in which neither party neglected an opportunity to wreak its hatred upon the other. The possession of the scalp of an enemy was a trophy of great importance to an Indian brave. It increased his influence among his fellows and gave him consequence in council, and in time would aid materially in raising him to the dignity of a chieftain, the ultimate ambition of the warrior.

The first capital of the Territory of Dakota derives its name from the Yankton Indians. In this way Dakota stands related to that tribe of the aboriginal inhabitants of the country, and it will be therefore appropriate to inquire briefly into the history of the tribe in order to discover something of its past career. It will be gratifying at least to show that the name "Yankton," with which our city, county and college have been endowed, has come down to us through a long line of illustrious ancestors from an honorable, ancient and numerous family of the aboriginal inhabitants of the Northwest. That they were not a small branch of a tribe, or a band of modern organization, but part of a great and powerful and honorable nation that has stood in the forefront of defense against the aggressive progress of civilization for many centuries, battling heroically but unsuccessfully against a destiny that has been beyond the power of human forces to control.

To be proud of an honorable lineage is a part of our human nature, whether that nature is clothed in a white or a red skin, and whether it is the nature of an untutored savage or a civilized being. The people of civilization sift their genealogies for centuries, ransacking the archives of government and every suspected repository of ancestral secrets, to learn from whom they are descended, and their hearts expand with joyous pride whenever they stumble upon some ancient hero or illustrious statesman whose name offers a hook whereon to hang a claim to a renowned ancestry. The Indian, undisturbed by the vices of civilization, is the embodiment of pride, and his greatest pride is in his ancestry. His traditions are filled with the marvelous feats of the great warriors who have distinguished themselves in war and in the chase, and much of this tradition when sifted of its fanciful ornamentation has been found nearly as reliable as the written records of a civilized people. The Yanktons have their traditions that tell of mighty battles between tribes of gigantic stature when so much red blood was spilled that it saturated the earth and colored the rocks at Pipestone and left them with the ruddy tint which they bear today; but they have traditions of another kind in which the imagery of fancy forms very little if any part. These traditions have also been passed down from father to son, just as the ancient people of our own race recorded and perpetuated their histories, through centuries of time, and have been, not infrequently, verified by comparison with the written records left to us by those whose lives were spent in teaching them the story of the Cross. Rev. John P. Williamson, D. D., who is a general missionary of the Presbyterian Church, has resided with the Dakota Indians for a lifetime and may safely be regarded as among the best authorities today regarding their past career—their language, their tribal histories, or whatever would be interesting and useful to know of them. The following sketch has been kindly furnished by that reverend gentleman to the readers of this history, and is taken from the manuscript furnished by the missionary himself. Mr. Williamson now resides at Greenwood, on what was the Yankton reservation. He was a missionary to the Santees in Minnesota at the time of the Little Crow outbreak in 1862, and long before, and when the Santees were removed to Crow Creek, Dakota Territory, in 1863, he came with them and remained with them at Crow Creek and at Santee, Nebraska, until 1869, when he moved over to the Yankton Agency, where he has since been laboring as a missionary among the Yanktons. The letter was addressed to the writer of this work:

Greenwood, S. D., March 11, 1905.

My Dear Sir: Your letter of March 7th is received, and I take pleasure in giving you such knowledge as I have on the points you mention in regard to the Dakota Indians.

Dakota is a Dakota Indian word, and the name by which they call themselves. Like all proper names in common use, those who use it seldom think of its meaning. It means "Friends," or "Those who are friends to each other." The root is koda, which is still the word commonly used for friend. The prefix "da," which limits the meaning to those spoken of, is the cause of its sometimes being translated "Allies." But it is clear that the name was not given because of any alliance having been made by different bodies of Indians, for we find that they are one people. They have one language, one religion, and no legend that intimates that they were ever brought together from different sources. The feeling among the Dakotas that all who speak the Dakota language are Dakotans, which is very strong, is proof that the language and the nation have been co-extensive for centuries.

The word "Sioux," by which the first white men who wrote of them designated them, is certainly not a Dakota word. A number of explanations have been given as to its derivation. The most plausible I have seen is that of Charlevoix, who wrote in 1720: "The name Sioux that we give to these Indians is entirely of our own making, or rather it is the last two syllables of the 'Nadouessioux,' as many nations call them." As this was only about fifty years after the first white man (Hennepin) looked wondrously upon the people, and the kind of the Dakotas, it would seem to be correct.

As to the divisions of the Dakota nation, it is clear that at some period, not more than a thousand years ago, they became divided into three parts—the Santee, the Yankton, and the Teton. These are now the leading divisions and it was so long ago that they could not make no effort to designate the time when it was made. Each division, though the Santee some, has a clearly defined dialect, so distinct that an Indian can hardly speak a sentence without making known from which division he comes. Each of these divisions was subdivided before the white people came among them. The Santees had four divisions: the Mdewakantonwan, Wahpekutas, Wahpetonwan and Sissetonwan. The Yanktons had three divisions: the Yankton, Yanktonais and Assinaboine. The Teton divisions seem to have been later, some of them after the advent of the white man, but at the time the United States took charge of them there were seven divisions: Sichangu, Oohenonpa, Sihasapa, Minnekanjou, Oglala, Itazipco and Hunkpapa.

These secondary subdivisions have some dialectic differences, but so small they would only be noticed by experts. These secondary divisions have been subdivided more or less at different times. For instance, the Mdewakantonwa at the time of the Minnesota treaty of 1857 were divided into seven bands: the Kiyuksa, Hemnican, Kapoje, Oyatesica, Magayutesni, Heyatatonuc, and Tintatonuc. And the Yanktons also at the time of the treaty of 1858 were divided into seven bands, namely: Cankute, Cagu, Wakmuhaoin, Ihaisdaye, Waceonpa, Ikmer, and Oyatesica. Owing to changed circumstances this third class of subdivisions is now almost obsolete. And the lines of the second class are in many cases quite indistinct. The primary divisions however will remain clear as long as the Dakota language is spoken.

As to the original location of the Dakotas when the white man first heard of them, about two hundred and fifty years ago, they occupied nearly the whole of what is now the State of Minnesota, stretching over a little into each of the three contiguous states of Wisconsin, Iowa and the two Dakotas. The Santees occupied both sides of the head waters of the Mississippi River from about Prairie la Crosse to its source. The Yanktons occupied the central part of Minnesota, living in the woods as the old men still say. The Tetons, as the name seems to indicate, lived on the prairies in Western Minnesota and Eastern North and South Dakota. Their headquarters were about Bigstone Lake and the head of the Minnesota River, and they probably seldom hunted west of the James River. From this original location, for reasons which had little connection with the coming of the whites, they gradually drifted several hundred miles to the southwest, so that before they ceded any of their landed rights to the United States the Tetons were all west of the Missouri River, the Yanktons were all in the Dakotas, but east of the Missouri River; and the Santees had reached the western boundary of Minnesota, and in places beyond.

The Yanktons claimed a large portion of the country north of the Minnesota River and were estimated to be the most numerous and intelligent of all the divisions of the original tribe of the Sioux or Dakotah nation. They numbered nearly as many individuals as all the others combined. The Dakotahs subsequently claimed all of the country west of the Mississippi and north of the Missouri, and their claim was recognized by our Government to the greater part of it, as is abundantly attested by subsequent treaties of cession. They also claimed a large estate in the country east of the Mississippi, between the great Father of Waters and Lake Michigan, where their forefathers had their homes in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and our Government being unable justly to resist their claims, paid the various bands of Dakotahs about three hundred thousand dollars some seventy years ago and obtained from them such a relinquishment of their claims as effectually quieted the question of the Government title for all time. Later, in 1851, came the Travers des Sioux and Mendota treaty, when the Sissetons, Mdewakantons, Wahpetons and Wahpedutes sold their Minnesota heritage, embracing 35,000,000 acres in Minnesota Territory, and following this was the treaty of 1859, by which the greater portion of Southern Dakota east of the Missouri River was ceded by the Yanktons, embracing a tract of 14,000,000 acres of the most valuable agricultural lands in North America.

This sketch traces the genealogy of the Dakotahs back to about the year A. D. 1640, which is sufficient to give them standing as one of the oldest of our Indian families, and shows their record to be in the main free from treachery, perfidy or acts of extreme cruelty, in their almost constant struggles and warfare; and with rare though notable exceptions they have faithfully observed their treaty obligations since the time they became treaty Indians. This record is now a part of the written history of our country, chronicled by a long line of illustrious men who lived and worked among them for scores of years before this Government of ours came into existence, and by historians of this later period since the Government was instituted. It is worthy of note that this record, in all its important features, substantially coincides with the traditions of the Indians of the present generation, who can recite the substance of it as it has been handed down to them from the preceding generations who likewise received it from their fathers, and on back for hundreds of years, interspersed more or less with the supernatural and marvelous tales invented from time to time to account for some great event, and give a lively coloring to the narrative.

During the summer of 1859 the Indians along the upper river were at war among themselves, and this seemed to be a chronic condition between the Dakotahs or Sioux on the one side and the Arickarees, Mandans and Crows on the other, who were all targets for the Sioux whenever and wherever they met. The steamer Spread Eagle made a trip to the Yellowstone and Fort Union, returning in July, 1859, with a number of white passengers, traders and explorers, who reported that they passed war parties nearly every day along the upper river, and they frequently saw the scalps of Indian braves dangling at the entrance to the lodge of some successful leader. The scalps, however, were in every instance those of Indians, and no act of personal hostility toward the whites had been committed; but it was surmised that the Indians were growing unfriendly and that it would be necessary to construct two or three forts and keep them garrisoned by a force of troops as the most effective means of restraining the warlike disposition of the savages and prevent them from breaking out into open hostility. Steamboat transportation was increasing and wood camps were being established by white men in the Indian country, a procedure that was angrily complained of by the red men.

It is not improbable that there would have been a serious family quarrel in the fall of 1859 had the Dakotah Indians of the upper river been able to meet the Yanktons. Major Schoonover, who was the Government agent for the upper tribes, made a trip down the river in the fall and he brought the report that some small parties of Poncas had been exasperated at the treaty effected by the Yanktons and Poncas for the sale of the land in the southern portion of the territory. Nearly all the upper Sioux, not Yanktons, but classed as the northern tribes, shared in the disaffection over the treaty, basing their opposition on the general principle that the Indians had already ceded away much more of their domain than their welfare demanded and they were all beginning to feel the hurtful effects of the restrictions put upon them as these cessions continued, by narrowing their hunting and trapping grounds and destroying their resources for obtaining subsistence. The Sioux in many cases claimed that the Yanktons had no right to make the treaty because the land ceded was the common property of the Dakotah nation and not the Yanktons alone.

Another report substantially confirming that of Major Schoonover was brought by Mr. Avery, a clerk of the steamer Chippewa on its return trip from Benton, who represented that the upper Sioux were not only "fighting mad" toward the Yanktons for their assumption in ceding lands that were common property, but that they were eager to show their resentment, and would contest the right of the Government to the ceded tract unless a further treaty was made that would include all the Indians interested.

From the numerous complaints made by individual members of Indian tribes who had ceded land to the Government, in which a comparatively small number of the chiefs and head men had taken upon themselves authority to dispose of domain, there was awakened a disposition to treat the individual Indian as possessing the right to a voice in the making of treaties of cession, and it is surprising that such awakening had not occurred to the Government authorities much earlier, for it was no trivial matter to take from the Indian his recognized property without even consulting him in regard to the transaction. This more honest method, founded in immutable justice, appears to have been adopted, in great measure, in the making of treaties subsequent to the Yankton treaty of 1858, and furnished the treaty commissions an excellent pretext for tying up the country north of the Union Pacific Railroad in such a manner that no competing routes to the gold fields of Montana and Idaho could be opened through Dakota for a number of years. In these later treaties it was usually provided that the com-sent of two-thirds of the Indians interested should be obtained before treaties of cession should be concluded.

THE RED PIPESTONE QUARRY

One of the provisions of the treaty between the Government and the Yankton Indians required the United States to make a survey and define the Red Pipestone Reservation, in Minnesota, a spot sacred to the Indians of the Northwest for centuries, and still treasured in their hearts as the scene of mighty conflict between the giants of their race at a period long anterior to the coming of the whites among them. As the Yankton Indians regarded the place with peculiar reverence and had charged themselves with the duty of caring for it, the pages of this work seem a fitting place for a brief description of the quarry and its environment.

The Red Pipestone quarry is situated in Minnesota about thirty-five miles north by east of Sioux Falls. It is the quarry from which the Indians of the Northwest have obtained the reddish mottled stone from which they have made their pipes, hatchets and various ornaments ever since they inhabited this country. Lewis and Clark knew of it as a revered place in the estimation of the Indians and neutral ground, where members of all tribes had access. On its charmed soil they could meet in peace, though ready to slay one another if found beyond its boundaries.

The quarry lies in an elliptical valley about three miles in length with a maximum breadth of half a mile. From a distance the region of the quarry has the appearance of ridges or palisades and fancy might arrange its novel architecture into ruined structures of an ancient city. On a nearer approach one finds that there are three ridges or palisades paralleling one another, the central one being the largest. At intervals these ridges stand above the surface ten or twelve feet, and then slope to nothing, disappearing in the earth. The material of these ridges is an indurated metaphoric sandstone or quartz, varying in hue from a purple to a light dull scarlet, sometimes a bright red. The upper surface is split into innumerable cubical pieces, and from a large fissure in the principal ridge issues a stream that drains the Pipestone Valley and is called the Red Pipestone River. About a quarter of a mile from its source it falls over the lower ridge, forming a beautiful cascade about twenty feet in height.

The quarry itself is an ordinary trench about six hundred feet in length and twelve feet deep, with a varying breadth from eight to fifteen feet, which has been excavated by the Indians during the last two centuries, possibly more. As this quarrying has been done without the aid of drills or powder, and as there has been great quantities of quartz to loosen and remove that covers the pipestone and interlies between its several strata, it will occur to the observer that great labor has been expended here covering a long period of time.

The quarry was included within the land belonging to the Sisseton Sioux Indians, but has been utilized by all Indians, and has been visited by them annually for the purpose of procuring the peculiar stone which is now quite common in pipes and ornamental hatchets and various devices and trinkets, frequently rings and watch charms, which are seen in every western community. The pipestone is used very generally by the Indians for the manufacture of their pipes, upon which a great deal of labor is bestowed, some of them being rudely carved and decorated where designed for the use of a grand peace council or other important ceremony. The Indians possess a tradition explaining the origin of nearly everything under the sun, and there has never been any difference of opinion among their scientific men as to the cause of this peculiar formation. Their tradition is that the quarry was one of the great battlefields of their ancestors and was the place where tribe fought against tribe through countless moons, and the rocks drank in the torrents of blood that were spilled upon the surface until they took the permanent hue they now have. That the Great Spirit has since presided over the battlefield and has banished forever all war or contest of any kind within the area of the quarry, and for this reason all red men meet here on an equal plane, with an equal right to take of the rock which bears within it the crimson life fluid of their renowned ancestors. All enmities are forgotten here. The Dakotas cherished it as a sacred and charmed spot and observe some peculiar ceremonies and incantations whenever they visit it. They bathe themselves for several days, are very abstemious as to food and drink, and wives and husbands remain separated. These ceremonies would remind the Bible student of some of the more rigid observances of the Mosaic code. At the quarry all excavations are preceded by supplication to the Great Spirit, and one Indian is set apart to do the digging. If he fails to strike a stratum that will make good pipes it is because he has neglected to purify himself, and he is temporarily disgraced, while another one is chosen to pursue the work, which is continued until the desired quality of rock is found, when there is a further ceremony expressive of gratitude over their good fortune and the Indian who made the fortunate strike is rewarded by receiving the choicest pieces. Several weeks are spent by the Indians who visit the quarry in making their excavations and securing this treasure. The place is barren—not a tree near it, and the earth is covered partially by scanty vegetation, it having been all destroyed by the blood of their ancestors which saturated the soil.

Professor Nicolet, the famous geologist and explorer, who came up the Missouri with Fremont in 1839, spent some time at this quarry the year previous, and made an exhaustive investigation. He reported:

In the quarry that I had opened, the thickness of the bed is eighteen inches, the upper portion of which separates in thin slabs and may be thus described: compact structure, slaty, receiving a dull polish, having a red streak, color blood red, with dots of a fainter shade of the same color, fracture rough, sextile, feel somewhat greasy, hardness, not yielding to the nail, not scratched by silatine but easily by calcareous spar; specific quantity, 290. The acids have no action upon it; before the blow pipe it is infusible per se but with borax gives a green glass.

According to Professor Jackson, of Boston, who has analyzed it and applied to it the name of "Catlinite," after Mr. Catlin, the Upper Missouri artist, it is composed of water, 8.4; silica, 48.2; alumina, 28.1; magnesia, 6.2; peroxide of iron, 5.0; oxide of magnesia, 0.9; carbonate of lime, 2.6, less probably; magnesia, 1.0. Total, 100.4.

Dakota Territory, east of the Missouri River, was a part of Minnesota from 1849 to 1858. The Territory of Minnesota was organized March 3, 1849, with the following boundaries:

Beginning in the Mississippi River at the point where the line of 43 degrees and 30 minutes of north latitude crosses the same; thence running due west on said line, which is the northern boundary of the State of Iowa, to the northwest corner of the State of Iowa; thence southerly along the western boundary of said state to the point where said boundary strikes the Missouri River; thence up the middle of the main channel of the Missouri River to the mouth of the White Earth River; thence up the middle of the main channel of the White Earth River to the boundary line between the possessions of the United States and Great Britain; thence east and south of east along the boundary line between the possessions of the United States and Great Britain to Lake Superior; thence in a straight line to the northwestern point of the State of Wisconsin in Lake Superior; thence along the western boundary line of the State of Wisconsin to the Mississippi River; thence down the main channel of said river to the place of beginning.

The White Earth River referred to as forming a small part of the western boundary of the Territory of Minnesota is a small stream emptying into the Missouri from the north, about midway between Fort Berthold and Fort Buford, now in Mountrail County, North Dakota. As laid down on the old maps, it rises about thirty miles south of the international boundary. It was also called the Whitewater River. On some of the earlier maps the White River, which runs south of the Black Hills and courses east, falling into the Missouri River a few miles south of Chamberlain, is erroneously called White Earth.

South Dakota was largely in Blue Earth County, Minnesota. This county comprised about one-fifth of the entire Territory of Minnesota. Starting from Big Stone Lake, it followed the Minnesota River to Mankato, which was also in Blue Earth County. From Mankato it followed the Minnesota River up to Heel and Toe Bend, Le Seuer County; thence southeast along the western boundary of Le Seuer to Rice County; thence south along the western boundary of Rice to the northern boundary of Iowa; thence west along the said northern boundary to the Big Sioux River; thence down the Big Sioux to its mouth; thence up the Missouri River to a point directly west of the starting point on Big Stone Lake, nearly opposite the mouth of the Moreau River; thence cutting across the present counties of Roberts, Day, Brown, Edmunds and Walworth, in South Dakota; in area embracing about one-fifth of Minnesota Territory and including its choicest agricultural section.

Pembina County was directly north of Blue Earth, taking in the upper portion of the counties in South Dakota above named and all of North Dakota east of the Missouri River. It also embraced the country east of the Red River of the North, having a somewhat irregular boundary on the east; beginning on the Magia Wakan River, about forty miles east of Big Stone Lake, running thence north and northeast to Winnebigoishish Lake, thence northwest to Rainy Lake River, and up that river to the Lake of the Woods; thence west along the international boundary. Pembina County comprised about one-third of the Territory of Minnesota.

Blue Earth County was in the Tenth Council and Representative District in the Territory of Minnesota, and in the same district with Le Seuer, State, Fairbault, Brown, Nicollet, Sibley, Pierce and Renville counties, Minnesota. These counties do not now all appear on the maps of Minnesota; that is, names and boundaries have been changed. In 1856 the councilman representing the Tenth district was C. E. Flandreau, and the representatives were Parsons K. Johnson, Aurelius F. de la Vergne and George A. McLeod. In 1857 P. P. Humphrey was the councilman, and Joseph R. Brown, Francis Basaen and O. A. Thomas, representatives.

Pembina County formed the Seventh Council and Representative District by itself. Its councilman in 1856 was Joseph Rolette, the famous Red River vote getter in the olden time. Its representatives the same year were R. Carlisle Burdick and Charles Grant. In 1857 Rolette was again returned to the Council, and Charles Grant and John B. Wilkie were the House members. The Legislature of 1857 closed the legislative career of Minnesota Territory. It was admitted into the Union as a state in May, 1858.

In the constitutional convention held at St. Paul, Minnesota, in July, 1857, to form a constitution for the state, the Seventh Council and Representative District was represented by James McFetridge, J. P. Wilson, J. Jerome, Xavier Cantell, Joseph Rolette and Louis Vasseur. The Tenth district was represented by Joseph R. Brown, C. E. Flandreau, Francis Baasen, William B. McMahan and J. H. Swan. These early lawmakers and constitution framers all resided east of the Big Sioux River in the Tenth district, but in the Seventh district the names of Rolette, McFetridge and Grant are familiar to the early settlement of Pembina on the Dakota side of the Red River of the North, both McFetridge and Rolette subsequently being identified with Dakota Territory, McFetridge as a member of the early Legislatures from the Red River region, and Rolette as a deputy United States marshal.

In 1851 the Indian title to all the land claimed by the Sioux Indians east of the Red River of the North, Lake Traverse and the Big Sioux River was extinguished by the treaties of Lake Traverse and Mendota, by which treaties certain bands of the Northern Dakota or Sioux Indians, notably the Sissetons and Wahpetons, ceded about thirty million acres of the most fertile agricultural land in the United States to the general Government for the sum of $1,665,000.

The Territory of Dakota was situated about midway between the two great oceans, and between the parallels of latitude 42° 30' and 49° of north latitude, which latter parallel forms the northern boundary of the United States from near the Pacific Ocean to the 95th degree of longitude west from Greenwich. It embraced an area of 140,000 square miles, according to the estimate of the United States census bureau. Its longest dimensions were about four hundred and thirty miles from south to north, and approximately three hundred and eighty-five miles east and west, but its average length was placed at 400 miles and its breadth 380. The Missouri River divided the territory into two great sections—entering it near the northwestern boundaries and leaving it at the southeast corner—that portion, however, lying east of the river being much the larger in area, owing to the course of the stream.

The distinctive topographical feature of the territory is a vast plain, gently undulating, which covers nearly four-fifths of its area. This feature extends west of the Missouri River, though broken to a much greater extent by rivers and creeks and by the "bad lands," marked on most of the older maps as the "mauvaise terres," a French term having the same significance as "bad lands," and beyond these the Black Hills, which cover an area of 3,200 square miles, have an average elevation of 6,000 feet, one of its mountains, Harney's Peak, rising to an altitude of 8,200 feet above the sea, the highest point in the United States east of the Rocky Mountains. The Turtle Mountain region, which lies in the extreme northern portion of the territory, embraces about eight hundred square miles. Its highest peak is called Butte St. Paul, in the County of Bottineau, and is 2,300 feet above sea level. For a description of the "bad lands" and Black Hills, so far as was known at the time, the reader is referred to Professor Hayden's lecture delivered at Yankton in 1866, and to Sully's Indian campaign of that year, which are given in this book.

The Wessington Hills in Jerauld and Hand counties form a conspicuous landmark in that region, with an elevation nearly equal to the Turtle Mountains, and extend from the northern limit of Brule County, entirely across the County of Jerauld to about the center of Hand County.

HOW WYOMING BECAME A PART OF DAKOTA

The western boundary of Dakota was early modified by the organization of the territories of Idaho, March 3, 1863, and Montana, May 26, 1864. The entire Territory of Montana, and a portion of Southeastern Idaho, had been included in the original boundaries of Dakota, but by section 18 of the Montana act it was provided that until Congress shall otherwise direct all that part of the Territory of Idaho included within the following boundaries, to wit:

Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the 33d degree of longitude west from Washington, with the 41st degree of north latitude; thence along said 33d degree of longitude to the crest of the Rocky Mountains; thence northward along the said crest of the Rocky Mountains to its intersection with the 44th degree and 30 minutes of north latitude; thence eastward along said 44th degree and 30 minutes north latitude to the 34th degree of longitude west from Washington; thence northward along said 34th degree of longitude to its intersection with the 45th degree of north latitude; thence eastward along said 45th degree of north latitude to its intersection with the 27th degree of longitude west from Washington; thence south along said 27th degree of longitude west from Washington to the 41st degree of north latitude; thence along the 41st degree of north latitude to the place of beginning shall be and is hereby incorporated temporarily into and made a part of the Territory of Dakota.

Under this change Dakota received the entire range of the Black Hills with the Wind River and Big Horn Mountains, the sources of the Missouri, Yellowstone, Platte and Big Horn rivers, and also Fort Laramie, South Pass and Fremont's Peak, about one-half the territory included four years later in the Territory of Wyoming lying west of Nebraska, which was organized as a separate territory in 1868-69, though its organic act became a law as early as 1866, the delay in organization being due to the disagreement between President Johnson and Congress.

DAKOTA'S MEDICAL SIDE

The Department of Agriculture, United States, says of the soil in the Territory of Dakota:

The lightness and porosity of the freshly upturned soil of Dakota is a marvel to one who would expect sogginess from the luxuriant growth of grass. This lightness suggests sand and shallowness, but we see that it is a salient feature of rich land. Nature has pursued a conservative course toward Dakota, enabling her to hoard her wealth, and her citizens should bear this ever in mind, so as to increase the treasury of this wonderful country. There is no region that I know of with so generally rich a soil.

A scientific authority, Dr. F. C. Duncan, of Chicago, visited Dakota in early years for the purpose of studying its climate, soil and waters, and subsequently published his conclusions, which are very interesting and valuable. He says:

Every country, territory and town has a medical side and none is more interesting than Dakota. The location, ingredients of the soil, water peculiarities and rare atmosphere, no doubt account to a certain extent for its invigorating climate. Besides being rich in agricultural promise it is destined to be a health resort. The effects of the water upon the health brings me to look at the medical side of the water question.

The persons who drink the well water of Dakota should not be troubled with biliousness, at least not until the soda is replaced by potash, which may take place after long cultivation. Those who drink water from the Dakota (James) River should not complain of kidney trouble. The action of magnesia on the bowels is well known. None need buy any purgative pills when alkaline water can be drunk freely. The sick may take it with decided beneficial results. The fat people should visit Dakota and drink bitter well water. It is the anti-fat. The action of the river water upon the digestive organs will be beneficial. There is nothing in these waters that is deleterious to health unless used to excess.

Dakota may yet be as famous for seekers after health as it now is for agricultural interest. I would advise those who would be benefited by a change of climate to visit Dakota. Whether Dakota answers the requirements of a health resort can be gleaned from its characteristics. It is a vast plateau reached from Chicago after passing up through hill and dale, over rivers and picturesque lakes. As far as the eye can reach, for miles and miles, in the growing season, green waving grass and grain is seen below, and a clear blue sky above. The effect upon the mind is most soothing. Dakota is so situated that there are constant breezes coming up the rivers and over the broad expanse of prairie. These increase with the evaporating heavy dews, and wax and wane with the sun, as in California. The lakes and moisture are on the high ground, so that the air is not so dry as in Colorado, therefore there is a large amount of ozone always present.

For dyspeptics, especially, the climate, water and cereal products of Dakota will yet have a great reputation. City business men should take a few weeks' recreation in Dakota, especially in the spring and fall. The mental diversion and physical energy recovered should amply repay them. Young ladies in the East suffering from neurasthenia and ennui, would get health by a short residence in Dakota.

The river and surface water is a mild alkaline water. The chief ingredient is magnesia. The soil is loaded with saline ingredients which increase the nitrogenous elements of the food, rendering Dakota products very healthful and appetizing. The people of Dakota are vigorous, intelligent, enterprising and remarkably hospitable. These are features that in the opinion of many medical men will yet make Dakota a famous health resort.

For consumptives and those suffering from diseases of the lungs in general, it will yet rival Colorado and California, especially for the first stage of lung troubles. The absence of low marshes and malaria make it desirable for those troubled with bilious disorders. For diseases of the kidneys and bladder the water of Dakota is especially valuable, rivaling that of any noted water.

IMMIGRATION, CATFISH, AND GOLD DISCOVERIES

There was a fair immigration into the territory during the summer and fall of 1859 after the Yankton Indians had withdrawn to their reservation. There were two ferry boats in operation on the Big Sioux River during most of the latter part of the season, rope ferries, and both were kept fairly well employed. The immigrants settled along the Big Sioux and Brule Creek valleys and as far west as Vermillion, a few getting into the country tributary to Yankton.

The catfish was an important factor in the settlement of Dakota, and in the opinion of many of the early settlers the food problem would have been a very serious one had it not been for the abundant supply of this best of all fishes right at the threshold of the settlements. It is occasionally remarked in these later times that the people of Dakota are not acquainted with the edible merits of this excellent fish, but send to eastern and western markets for an inferior article, while they have such an inexhaustible supply here at home. The celebrated naturalist Audubon made a very exhaustive investigation of the fishes of the Missouri about the year 1858 and gave it as his opinion that the catfish was a very valuable article of food, containing in due proportions the constituents that form the very best of food fishes. For scores of years the early traders subsisted almost exclusively on a diet of buffalo meat and catfish, having vegetables very rarely and small desire for them. This was before the day of canned vegetables.

The existence of gold in paying quantities in the streams and gulches on the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains in what is now Montana was known to the old fur traders of nearly three-score years ago. Maj. Alexander Culbertson, a member and manager of the American Fur Company of St. Louis, brought down nearly $500 in gold nuggets in the fall of 1859, when he was returning to St. Louis from an inspection of the company's business in the upper river. He obtained the gold from white men, who exchanged it for goods at the trading posts on the headwaters of the Missouri, and who were very reticent regarding how they came by it or where they had procured it, though it was no doubt taken out of the placers in that country by the early prospectors. Major Culbertson had for a companion Maj. Charles E. Galpin, another famous frontiersman and fur trader. They spent the night with the Yankton pioneers early in December, 1859, and exhibited some of the gold, consisting of coarse nuggets, telling them that the mountainous regions of the Northwest were rich in auriferous treasures, that there would be a stampede for this country as soon as it became known, and that the only practicable route, on account of its freedom from hardships and danger, was by way of the Missouri River to Fort Benton. These gentlemen had been on the road from Benton sixty days, visiting a number of trading posts on their way down, and traveling by Mackinaw until the river filled with ice, when they procured horses and pack animals. They were going first to St. Louis, thence to Washington, to urge the establishment of a military post near Benton and at one or two other points as a measure of protection, and as a means of preserving peace with the Indians, who would be apt to resent the coming of the whites into the country.

SETTLERS DEMAND A LAWFUL GOVERNMENT

In 1859 the question of securing a political organization for the Territory of Dakota was uppermost in the minds of the settlers. (A preceding chapter tells the story of the efforts of the Sioux Falls pioneers.) It will be readily admitted that there would be little incentive to industry and improvement until the settlers were secure in some form of authorized government that would protect their property and open the avenues for the orderly administration of the law. The Yankton settlers were cordially supported by those of the other settlements along the Missouri slope. United States Senator Fitch introduced a bill to organize the Territory of Dakota and for other purposes December, 1858, which was referred to the territorial committee, but nothing came of it, the treaty not having been ratified, and for the same reason a bill presented by Senator James I. Green, February 4, 1859, was not acted upon. In the House of Representatives on the 29th day of January, 1859, Alexander H. Stephens, who was about two years later elected vice president of the "Confederate States of America," introduced a bill for the establishment of a territorial government in Dakota. This measure got no further than to be referred to the committee.

A settlers' mass convention was held in the Bramble store at Yankton on the 8th day of November, 1859, where resolutions were adopted, and a memorial to Congress setting forth the needs of the people was authorized to be drawn up and circulated throughout the territory for signatures. D. T. Bramble was chairman of the convention, M. K. Armstrong secretary, and J. B. S. Todd, Obed Foote and Thomas Frick the committee on resolutions. George D. Fiske, James M. Stone and Captain Todd composed the committee to draft the memorial. Gen. D. M. Frost, of St. Louis, a heavy stockholder of the "Yankton Land and Town Company" and head of the firm of Frost, Todd & Co., was present at this meeting and made an able speech in support of the movement while the committee on resolutions was preparing its report. Others present were J. R. Hanson, George Pike, Jr., John Stanage, Henry Arend, H. T. Bailey, Enos Stutsman, J. S. Prescho, Frank Chapel, Charles F. Picotte, Felix LeBlanc and Lytle M. Griffith. Because this meeting and a similar gathering at Vermillion were the first formal steps taken on the Missouri slope to secure the organization of the territory, the proceedings are herein given in full as taken down and preserved in the archives of the "Yankton Claim Club":

Report of the Settlers' Meeting at Yankton and Vermillion to Urge the Organization of Dakota Territory

At a meeting of the citizens of Yankton and vicinity in Dakota Territory, held at Bramble's store on the 8th of November, 1859, Mr. D. T. Bramble was called to the chair and M. K. Armstrong chosen secretary. The object of the convention, as explained by Capt. J. B. S. Todd, was to take into consideration the necessity for a territorial organization and to draw up and sign a memorial to Congress praying for a legal form of government.

On motion of Captain Todd a committee of three was appointed to draft resolutions expressive of the views and wants of the convention. Captain Todd, Obed Foote and Thomas Frick were appointed as such committee. During the absence of the Committee on Resolutions, General Frost of St. Louis was called upon and delivered some encouraging remarks to the settlers, which were listened to with most earnest attention.

The Committee on Resolutions reported as follows:

Whereas, The State of Minnesota, composed in part of the late Territory of Minnesota, has been admitted into the federal Union, and that part of the territory lying outside of the state limits has been declared by resolution of the House of Representatives to be without any distinct legally organized government, "which said resolution was adopted on the 3d day of June, 1858" and the people thereof are not entitled to a delegate to Congress until that right has been conferred upon them by statute, thereby withdrawing from us the protecting shield of the laws of our country and the inestimable privilege of a representative of our wants and wishes at the seat of the Federal Government, and leaving us to be "a law unto ourselves," without providing for the people of the remaining part of the territory any organized government, or guaranteeing to us any of those wholesome provisions by which well ordered society is established, fostered, maintained and protected; and that we are without laws, courts or civil officers, from the mouth of the Big Sioux on the Missouri to Pembina on the Red River of the North; and as we feel the want of those wholesome guards and shields, and of those wholesome rights and privileges, which of right pertain to good citizens, to constitute them a healthy, contented and happy people, to give direction to their will and to provide for their wants in all the forms of government; therefore, be it

Resolved, First, That we, the citizens of Yankton and vicinity in Dakota Territory, earnestly urge upon the Senate and the House of Representatives the condition in which we are placed, not only by the failure of Congress to provide for the people of that part of the Territory of Minnesota outside of the state limits known as Dakota with any form of government, but by withdrawing from them that under which they had lived, and denying to them a representative on the floor of Congress; and by withholding from them laws, courts and civil officers, and thereby creating the necessity of an early organization of a legal form of government.

Second. That the House of Representatives having declared by resolution that "the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union, with the boundaries prescribed in the act of admission, operate as a dissolution of the territorial organization of Minnesota, and that so much of the late Territory of Minnesota as lies without the limits of the present State of Minnesota, is without any distinct legally organized government," and "the people thereof are not entitled to any delegate in Congress until that right is conferred upon them by statute;" that we do not approve of any election that has been held, nor will we participate in any that may be held, in any portion of this territory, for the purpose of electing a delegate to Congress; but we trust to the wisdom and justice of Congress to provide us with a legal form of government at an early day.

Third. That a committee of three be appointed by this meeting to draft a memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives, expressive of our views, as indicated in the foregoing preamble and resolutions, and that the same be circulated for signatures among the people.

Fourth. That the secretary of this convention communicate the foregoing preamble and resolution to our fellow citizens at their meeting to be held at Vermillion, and also to those to be held at Big Sioux, Bon Homme and at Kitson precincts, and all others that may be called, and to invite their cooperation with us.

Fifth. That the secretary be requested to forward a copy of the proceedings of this meeting to the committee provided for in resolution Third, and that said copy be attached to the memorial therein directed to be drafted and with it forwarded to the Senate and House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. Chapel the report was unanimously adopted by the convention.

On motion of Mr. Foote the convention appointed J. B. S. Todd, George D. Fiske and J. M. Stone as a committee to draft the memorial designated in resolution Third.

On motion of Mr. Chapel, the secretary was authorized to furnish a copy of the proceedings of this convention for publication in the Sioux City Register and the St. Louis Republican.

Adjourned sine die.

M. K. ARMSTRONG, Secretary

At a meeting of the citizens of Vermillion and vicinity, held at the house of Mr. James McHenry, on the 9th of November, 1859, on motion J. A. Denton was called to the chair and James McHenry was appointed secretary.

The object of the meeting having been explained, on motion of Doctor Caulkins a committee of three was appointed to draft resolutions expressive of the wants of the meeting. Doctor Caulkins, Doctor Whittess and Samuel Mortimer were appointed such committee.

The proceedings of the meeting of the citizens of Yankton having also been communicated to this meeting and their cooperation invited, it was ordered that the preamble and resolutions of that meeting be received by it and the committee on resolutions be requested to consider them. While the committee was absent, General Frost of St. Louis addressed the meeting in a forcible and eloquent manner.

The Committee on Resolutions then reported that it had under consideration the preamble and resolutions of the meeting at Yankton and begged leave to report them to this meeting for adoption, as embracing everything necessary to be done. The preamble and resolutions having been read, the committee was discharged and the preamble and resolutions unanimously adopted as the views of the meeting. There being no further business before the meeting it adjourned sine die.

(Signed)

JAS. MCHENRY, Secretary.

The memorial was a strong paper and had been prepared with considerable care. Though it failed to secure the affirmative action of Congress at this session, it made a very favorable impression upon the members. It called attention to the necessity and justice of furnishing the citizens of the United States who were here with some form of government. It set forth the situation as it existed regarding the absence of any legal authority in the form of local government, the exposed condition of the settlers to hostile Indians or white desperadoes, the absence of all forms of protection to property except that extended by the settlers to one another in their voluntary associations, the difficulty of pursuing any industry or commercial pursuit where an established credit protected by law was a great advantage, and the utter lack of any method by which titles could be acquired, thus delaying important and much needed improvements. The memorial was signed by every settler on the Missouri slope, whose numbers as attested by this document reached the surprising total of 428. It was taken to Washington in December following by Captain Todd. No copy of it was preserved, which is to be regretted, and the original may possibly be reposing in a pigeon hole of the archives of the Committee on Territories in either Senate or House. No action was taken by Congress in response to this memorial.

Joseph R. Hanson is the only one who attended this meeting who is present today at roll call. H. T. Bailey, however, is a prominent citizen of Aten, Cedar County, Nebraska, and occasionally pays a visit to his early friends and acquaintances on this side of the river.

In 1859 Frost, Todd & Co. sold their Sioux City store to L. D. Parmer and the firm name was changed to that of D. M. Frost & Co., Captain Todd and Mr. Atkinson retiring.

D. M. Frost of this firm had been engaged in the fur trading business along the Upper Missouri for a number of years prior to the opening of Dakota to settlement by the whites. He was a native of New York and had been an officer in the regular army, having graduated at West Point in the year 1844. He served with distinction during the Mexican war, and had resigned his commission in 1853 for the purpose of taking up this fur trading enterprise. He also took an active part in the politics of Missouri, was elected to the Legislature of that state from St. Louis, and became a general of the state militia. He conducted a farm in connection with his other employments, was largely interested in securing the treaty of cession from the Yankton Indians, and aided materially in securing the organization of Dakota Territory. He was a man of wealth and good general ability. On the breaking out of the Civil war in 1861 he joined the Southern Confederacy and attained to the rank of a brigadier general. He was still living near St. Louis at the close of the last century.

The winter of 1859-60 passed away very quietly. It was a dull winter and the spirit of enterprise and improvement among the settlers was more fanciful than real. The question of territorial organization was all-absorbing. The pioneers felt that they would be seriously handicapped until Congress furnished them a government under which they could go forward with their work and improvements, secure in their property rights. The advantages to spring from an organization had been canvassed over and over again until it seemed that with it they would rapidly achieve fortunes—that immigration would pour in, capital would crowd upon them for investment, their landed interests would rapidly increase in value and many other benefits would follow. Captain Todd spent the winter in Washington working with members of Congress to facilitate the passage of an organic act, and while the feeling was friendly, the active friends of organization found it impossible to push the measure through, and Congress finally adjourned, leaving the territory helpless so far as government was concerned. This condition served as a serious damper on all enterprise during the year 1860.

AN ORGANIC ACT

On the 15th of January, 1861, a second territorial mass convention was held in Bramble's store at Yankton for the purpose of promoting the long deferred organization of the territory. It was not, however, a time when conditions seemed to favor the affirmative action of Congress, and the settlers were by no means sanguine of success, but encouraged by recent advices from General Todd, who was in Washington laboring with Congress, the settlers at Yankton felt it their duty to support his efforts as best they could. The nation was on the verge of a long and sanguinary civil war. Congress was torn with dissensions and absorbed in efforts to avert the impending national calamity. Many of the southern states had passed ordinances of secession, and their senators and representatives had abandoned their seats and returned to their homes to join in the hostilities that rapidly followed. An earnest and carefully prepared memorial was the result of the convention. This document was neatly enrolled and signed by 478 pioneers, which probably included the entire population of the territory and possibly some of Picotte's kindred, and was then forwarded to the presiding officer of the Senate. Little more than a month remained before Congress would adjourn and a new administration be installed in power, so that the importance of speedy action and unceasing effort was very apparent. Fortune favored the pioneers despite the many discouraging circumstances of that time. February 14, 1861, Senator Green from the Committee on Territories reported a bill "To provide a temporary government for the Territory of Dakota and to create the office of surveyor general therein," which passed the Senate the 26th of the same month, passed the House March 1st, and received the approval of President Buchanan March 2d, less than forty-eight hours before his term as president expired. It was eleven days later, on the 13th of March, when the good news reached Dakota. There were no telegraph lines north of St. Joseph, Missouri, at that time, and none that extended very far west of the Mississippi River in Iowa, so the good tidings traveled slowly. But it reached Dakota and found the pioneers in a mood to receive it and give it a most generous welcome. It is said that the shouts of joy that went up made the welkin ring and started a jack rabbit stampede for the distant bluffs that was a sight to behold. Laboring men (and all were of this honorable class) took a day off and went about congratulating one another in language vigorous; there were handshakes that would abash a pump handle in energetic motion, and laughter loud and long and hearty, and other smiles. Songs were sung and jigs were danced and eloquent speeches of excellent quality and generous quantity were a feature of the joyous occasion. There were no bonfires, but an abundance of hot air and fervid words. It was a never-to-be-forgotten occasion and the enactment of the law was rightly regarded as an important progressive step in Dakota's career.

THE ORGANIC ACT

The organic act is here given in full:

An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Dakota and to create the office of surveyor general therein.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that all that part of the territory of the United States included within the following limits, namely:

Commencing at a point in the main channel of the Red River of the North where the 49th degree of north latitude crosses the same, thence up the main channel of the same, and along the boundary of the State of Minnesota, to Big Stone Lake; thence along the boundary line of the said State of Minnesota to the Iowa line; thence along the boundary line of the State of Iowa to the point of intersection between the Big Sioux and Missouri rivers; thence up the Missouri River and along the boundary line of the Territory of Nebraska to the mouth of the Niobrara or Running Water River; thence following up the same in the middle of the main channel thereof, to the mouth of the Keha Paha or Turtle Hill River; thence up said river to the 43d parallel of north latitude; thence due west to the present boundary of the Territory of Washington; thence along the boundary line of Washington Territory to the 49th degree of north latitude; thence east along said 49th degree of latitude to the place of beginning, be, and the same is, hereby organized into a temporary government by the name of the Territory of Dakota; Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to impair the rights of person or property now pertaining to the Indians in said territory, so long as such right shall remain unextinguished by treaty between the United States and such Indians, or to include any territory which by treaty with any Indian tribe is not, without the consent of said tribe, to be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any state or territory; but all such territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries and constitute no part of the Territory of Dakota, until said tribe shall signify their assent to the President of the United States, to be included within the said territory; or to affect the authority of the Government of the United States to make any regulations respecting such Indians, their lands, property or other rights, by treaty, law or otherwise, which it would have been competent for the Government to make if this act had never passed; Provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to inhibit the Government of the United States from dividing said territory into two or more territories in such manner and at such times as Congress shall deem convenient and proper, or from attaching any portion thereof to any other territory or state.

Section 2. And be it further enacted, That the executive power and authority in and over said Territory of Dakota shall be vested in a governor who shall hold his office for four years and until his successor is appointed and qualified unless sooner removed by the President of the United States. The governor shall reside within said territory, shall be commander-in-chief of the militia thereof, shall perform the duties and receive the emoluments of superintendent of Indian affairs, and shall approve all laws passed by the Legislative Assembly before they shall take effect; he may grant pardons for offenses against the laws of said territory, and reprieves for offenses against the laws of the United States until the decision of the President can be made known thereon; he shall commission all officers who shall be appointed to office under the laws of said territory, and shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

Section 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be a secretary of said territory who shall reside therein, and who shall hold his office for four years, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States. He shall record and preserve all the laws and proceedings of the Legislative Assembly, hereinafter constituted; and all the acts and proceedings of the governor in his executive department; he shall transmit one copy of the laws and one copy of the executive proceedings on or before the first day of December in each year, to the President of the United States, and at the same time two copies of the laws to the speaker of the House of Representatives and to the President of the Senate, for the use of Congress; and in case of the death, removal or resignation or other necessary absence of the governor from the territory the secretary shall have and is hereby authorized and required to execute and perform all the powers and duties of the governor during such vacancy or necessary absence or until another governor shall be duly appointed to fill such vacancy.

Section 4. And be it further enacted, That the legislative power and authority of said territory shall be vested in the governor and Legislative Assembly. The Legislative Assembly shall consist of a council and house of representatives. The council shall consist of nine members, which may be increased to thirteen, having the qualifications of voters as herein-after prescribed, whose term of service shall continue two years. The house of representatives shall consist of thirteen members, which may be increased to twenty-six, possessing the same qualifications as prescribed for members of the council, and whose term of service shall continue one year. An apportionment shall be made as nearly equal as practicable among the several counties or districts for the election of a council and house of representatives, giving to each section of the territory representation in the ratio of its population (Indians excepted) as near as may be; and the members of the council and of the house of representatives shall reside in and be inhabitants of the district for which they may be elected respectively. Previous to the first election the governor shall cause a census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the several counties and districts in the territory to be taken; and the first election shall be held at such time and places, and be conducted in such manner as the governor shall appoint and direct; and he shall at the same time declare the number of the members of the council and house of representatives to which each of the counties or districts shall be entitled under this act. The number of persons authorized to be elected having the highest number of votes in each of said council districts for members of the council shall be declared by the governor to be elected to the council; and the person or persons authorized to be elected having the highest number of votes for members of the house of representatives equal to the number to which such county or district shall be entitled shall be declared by the governor to be elected members of the house of representatives; Provided, That in case of a tie between two or more persons voted for, the governor shall order a new election to supply the vacancy made by such tie. And the persons thus elected to the Legislative Assembly shall meet at such place and on such day as the governor shall appoint; but thereafter the time, place and manner of holding and conducting all elections by the people and apportioning the representation in the several counties or districts to the council and house of representatives according to the population, shall be prescribed by law, as well as the day of the commencement of the regular sessions of the Legislative Assembly; Provided, That no one session shall exceed the term of forty days, except the first, which may be extended to sixty days, but no longer.

Section 5. And be it further enacted, That every free white male inhabitant of the United States above the age of twenty-one years who shall have been a resident of said territory at the time of the passage of this act, shall be entitled to vote at the first election and shall be eligible to any office within the said territory; but the qualifications of voters and of holding office, at all subsequent elections, shall be such as shall be prescribed by the Legislative Assembly; Provided, That the right of suffrage and of holding office shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States and those who shall have declared on oath their intention to become such, and shall have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

Section 6. And be it further enacted, That the legislative power of the territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act; but no law shall be passed interfering with the primary disposal of the soil; no tax shall be imposed upon the property of the United States nor shall the lands or other property of non-residents be taxed higher than the lands or property of residents; nor shall any law be passed impairing the rights of private property; nor shall any discrimination be made in taxing different kinds of property; but all property subject to taxation shall be taxed in proportion to the value of the property taxed.

Section 7. And be it further enacted, That all township, district and county officers, not herein otherwise provided for, shall be appointed or elected, as the case may be, in such manner as shall be provided by the governor and Legislative Assembly of the territory. The governor shall nominate and by and with the advice and consent of the legislative council, appoint all officers not herein otherwise provided for; and in the first instance, the governor alone may appoint all said officers, who shall hold their offices until the end of the first session of the Legislative Assembly, and he shall lay off the necessary districts for members of the council and house of representatives and all other officers.

Section 8. And be it further enacted, That no member of the Legislature shall hold or be appointed to any office which shall have been created, or the salary or emoluments of which have been increased while he was a member during the term for which he was elected and for one year after the expiration of such term; and no person holding a commission or appointment under the United States, except postmasters, shall be a member of the Legislative Assembly or shall hold any office under the government of said territory.

Section 9. And be it further enacted, That the judicial power of said territory shall be vested in a Supreme Court, District courts, Probate courts and in justices of the peace. The Supreme Court shall consist of a chief justice and two associate justices, any two of whom shall constitute a quorum, and who shall hold a term at the seat of government of said territory annually and they shall hold their offices during the period of four years. The said territory shall be divided into three judicial districts and a District Court shall be held in each of said districts by one of the justices of the Supreme Court at such time and place as may be prescribed by law; and the said judges shall, after their appointment respectively, reside in the districts which shall be assigned them. The jurisdiction of the several courts herein provided for both appellate and original, and that of the Probate courts and of justices of the peace shall be as limited by law; Provided, That justices of the peace shall not have jurisdiction of any matter in controversy when the title or boundaries of land may be in dispute or where the debt or sum claimed shall exceed one hundred dollars. And the said Supreme and District courts respectively shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction; and authority for the redress of all wrongs committed against the Constitution or laws of the United States or of the territory, affecting persons or property. Each District Court, or the judge thereof, shall appoint its clerk, who shall also be the register in chancery, and shall keep his office at the place where the court may be held. Writs of error, habeas corpus, and appeals, shall be allowed in all cases from the first decisions of said District to the Supreme Court under such regulations as may be prescribed by law; but in no case removed to the Supreme Court shall trial by jury be allowed in said court. The Supreme Court or the justices thereof shall appoint its own clerk, and every clerk shall hold his office at the pleasure of the court for which he shall have been appointed. Writs of error and appeals from the final decisions of said Supreme Court shall be allowed, and may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same regulations as from the Circuit courts of the United States, where the value of the property or the amount in controversy to be ascertained by the oath or affirmation of either party, or other competent witness, shall exceed one thousand dollars; and each of said District courts shall have and exercise the same jurisdiction in all cases arising under the laws and Constitution of the United States as is vested in the Circuit or District courts of the United States, and the said Supreme and District courts of said territory and the respective judges hereof shall and may grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases in which same are grantable by the judges of the United States in the District of Columbia; and the first six days of every term of said courts, or as much thereof as shall be necessary, shall be appropriated to the trial of cases arising under the said Constitution and laws, and writs of error and appeals in all such cases shall be made to the Supreme Court of said territory the same as in all other cases and the said clerk shall receive the same fees as the clerks of the District courts of Nebraska Territory now receive for similar services.

Section 10. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed an attorney for said territory, who shall continue in office for four years unless sooner removed by the President, and who shall receive the same fees and salary as the attorney of the United States for the present Territory of Nebraska. There shall also be a marshal for the territory appointed, who shall hold his office for four years unless sooner removed by the President, and who shall execute all processes issuing from the said courts when exercising their jurisdiction as circuit or district courts of the United States; he shall perform the duties, be subject to the same regulations and penalties and be entitled to the same fees as the marshal of the district courts of the United States for the present Territory of Nebraska, and shall, in addition, be paid $200 annually as a compensation for extra services.

Section 11. And be it further enacted, That the governor, secretary, chief justice and associate justices, attorney and marshal shall be nominated and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed by the President of the United States. The governor and secretary to be appointed as aforesaid, shall, before they act as such, respectively take an oath or affirmation before the district judge or some justice of the peace within the limits of said territory duly authorized to administer oaths and affirmations by the laws now in force therein, or before the chief justice or some associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States to support the Constitution of the United States and faithfully to discharge the duties of their respective offices, which said oaths, when so taken, shall be certified by the person by whom the same shall have been taken, and such certificate shall be received and recorded among the executive proceedings; and the chief justice and associate justices and all other civil officers in said territory, before they act as such, shall take a like oath or affirmation before the said governor or secretary or some judge or justice of the peace of the territory who may be duly commissioned and qualified, which said oath or affirmation shall be certified and transmitted by the person taking the same to the secretary, to be by him recorded as aforesaid; and afterwards the like oath or affirmation shall be taken, certified and recorded in such manner and form as may be prescribed by law. The governor shall receive an annual salary of $1,500 as governor and $1,000 as superintendent of Indian affairs; the chief justice and associate justices shall each receive an annual salary of $1,800; the secretary shall receive an annual salary of $1,800. The said salaries shall be paid quarterly at the Treasury of the United States. The members of the Legislative Assembly shall be entitled to receive $3.00 each per day during their attendance at the session thereof, and $3.00 for every twenty miles travel in going to and returning from said sessions, estimated according to the nearest usually traveled route. There shall be appropriated annually the sum of $100,000 to be expended by the governor to defray the contingent expenses of the territory. There shall also be appropriated annually a sufficient sum to be expended by the secretary of the treasury of the United States, to defray the expenses of the Legislative Assembly, the printing of the laws and other incidental expenses, and the secretary of the territory shall annually account to the secretary of the treasury of the United States for the manner in which the aforesaid sum shall have been expended.

Section 12. And be it further enacted, That the Legislative Assembly shall hold its first session at such time and place in said Territory of Dakota as the governor thereof shall appoint and direct; and at such first session, or as soon thereafter as they shall deem expedient, the governor and Legislative Assembly shall proceed to locate and establish the seat of government for said territory at such place as they may deem eligible, which place, however, shall thereafter be subject to be changed by the said governor and Legislative Assembly.

Section 13. And be it further enacted, That a delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve during each Congress of the United States, may be elected by the voters qualified to elect members of the Legislative Assembly, who shall be entitled to the same rights and privileges as are exercised and enjoyed by the delegates from the several other territories of the United States to the said House of Representatives. The first election shall be held at such time and places and be conducted in such manner as the governor shall appoint and direct, and at all subsequent elections the times, places and manner of holding the elections shall be prescribed by law. The person having the highest number of votes shall be declared by the governor duly elected and a certificate thereof shall be given accordingly.

Section 14. The name "Dakota" had been applied to this country by common consent after the admission of Minnesota as a state in 1858, and was so designated from the powerful Indian nation that claimed and occupied the greater portion of the territory at that time. The territory covered an area of about three hundred and fifty thousand square miles, extending from Minnesota and Iowa on the east to the dividing ridges of the Rocky Mountains on the west, and from the Missouri, Niobrara and Kaha Paha rivers and the 43d parallel of north latitude on the south to the 49th parallel on the north.

Rev. John P. Williamson, of Yankton Agency, who had spent possibly a half century as a missionary and teacher among the Sioux Indians of Minnesota and Dakota, writing of the derivation and meaning in the English tongue of Indian names, tells us the proper meaning of two or three which will interest Dakotans. His letter was called out by the Dakota proceedings in Congress and comments made by well-known Sioux interpreters. It may be understood that there was no better living authority on this subject than Mr. Williamson. He writes that :

The derivation of proper names is often obscure, but happily for future historians the title of our coming state is derived from no obsolete tongue, and all intelligent Dakotans will give but one answer as to the meaning of the word "Dakota," and that is that it means "friends" or "allies." The Dakota Nation is the nation of friends, and the State of Dakota will doubtless honor the name and be a state of friends.

As to "Lakota," the women use that form no more than the men. All the Teton or Western Sioux use "L" entirely for "D," hence Lakota for Dakota.

As to Minnesota, it means neither "plenty of water" nor "muddy water." Minnesota might mean "muddy water," and Minneshoshe (the Dakota name for the Missouri River), means "muddy water."

Minnesota is harder to define because of the want of any equivalent word in the English language. I should translate Minnesota "hazy water."

ORGANIZATION OF THE TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT— FIRST ELECTION

1861

FIRST DAKOTA OFFICIALS—FIRST NEWSPAPER—GOVERNOR CAUSES CENSUS TO BE TAKEN—WHITE AND RED POPULATION—FEDERAL OFFICIALS RENDEZVOUS AT YANKTON—GOVERNOR JAYNE CALLS ELECTION AND ASSIGNS JUDGES—FIRST POLITICAL CONVENTION AND FIRST ELECTION—THE VOTE BY PRECINCTS—LEGISLATURE CHOSEN AND CAPTAIN TODD ELECTED TO CONGRESS—PERSONAL SKETCHES OF FIRST OFFICIALS.

President Abraham Lincoln was inaugurated on the 4th of March, 1861. In the following month of April he made the following appointments for the Territory of Dakota:

Governor, Dr. William Jayne, Springfield, Ill.; secretary, John Hutchinson, Minnesota; chief justice, Philemon Bliss, Ohio; associate justice, J. P. Williston, Pennsylvania; associate justice, Joseph L. Williams, Tennessee; United States district attorney, W. E. Gleason, Maryland; United States marshal, William E. Shaffer, Missouri; surveyor general, George D. Hill, Michigan.

On the 6th of June, 1861, the Weekly Dakotian was issued at Yankton by the Dakotian Printing Company, composed of Frank M. Ziebach and William Freney, both young journalists and practical craftsmen from Sioux City, where they were engaged in the publication of the Sioux City Register, a democratic weekly newspaper, and the only paper at that time published in Northwestern Iowa. The Dakotian was the first newspaper published in the Territory of Dakota after the passage of the organic act. The office of publication was in the log building on the west side of Broadway, near Second Street, built in 1850 by John Patterson. Mr. Frank M. Ziebach was the editor and did a good portion of the mechanical labor besides. He was a number one journalist and a master printer. He needed to have a thorough knowledge of the printing art in order to overcome the many difficulties that are met with in establishing and printing a newspaper in a frontier settlement.

During the month of June, 1861, Newton Edmunds reached Yankton from Ypsilanti, Michigan. He came to open up the office of surveyor general, of which he was chief clerk, and set the machinery in motion for the surveying of the public lands. Mr. Edmunds secured office accommodations in the Bramble building, corner of Front and Walnut streets, known on the early plats as Elm Street.

On the 27th of August, 1861, the surveyor general issued the following notice:

By direction of the honorable commissioner of the general land office, bearing date of July 29, 1861, the surveyor general of this territory is directed to receive declaratory statements of settlers until the opening of the local land office. Notice accordingly is hereby given that this office is now open for the reception of such declaratory statements which may now be filed in this office as fast as the surveys are completed and townships platted.

G. D. HILL, Surveyor General Dakota Territory.

By N. EDMUNDS, Chief Clerk.

William Jayne, the new governor, came in June, accompanied by William Shaffer, United States marshal, and established the executive office in a log structure on Broadway, opposite the Ash Hotel. This log structure thus became the first capitol building of Dakota, inasmuch as the governor began the work of organization in that humble structure, and made it his domicile, official and personal, for a number of weeks. He had no authority to locate the capital and the organic act gave no direction as to the seat of government further than to authorize the Legislative Assembly to locate it. As the Legislative Assembly was not yet in existence, the governor carried the seat of government with him and issued his proclamations and official documents from the "Town of Yankton."

VOTING POPULATION IN 1861

The governor proceeded without delay to set the wheels of government in motion. His first official act was the appointment of persons to take the census of the territory. He appointed Henry D. Betts, Wilmot W. Brookings, Andrew J. Harlan, Obed Foote, George M. Pinney and J. D. Morse census agents. He assigned to H. D. Betts that portion of the territory embracing all the settlements on or contiguous to the Red River and at St. Joseph and vicinity. Wilmot W. Brookings was assigned to the Sioux Falls district, embracing settlements on the Big Sioux River north of the Brule Creek settlement and south of the Big Stone Lake. Andrew J. Harlan was assigned to that part of the territory embracing all the settlements from the Brule Creek settlement to the mouth of the Big Sioux, and all settlements on the Missouri River between the mouth of the Big Sioux and east of the line between ranges 53 and 54, the west boundary of Clay County. Obed Foote was assigned to that part of the territory lying on the Missouri bounded on the east by the range line between ranges 53 and 54, and bounded on the west by the range line between ranges 57 and 58, the west boundary of Yankton County. George M. Pinney was assigned to that part of the territory lying on the Missouri bounded on the east by the range line between ranges 57 and 58, and bounded on the west by Choteau Creek. J. D. Morse was assigned that portion of the territory lying between the Missouri and Niobrara rivers, and that portion on the Missouri bounded on the east by Choteau Creek, and running west and north to include the Pease and Hamilton settlements.

The following is a summary of the census returns filed with the executive:

Upon receiving these returns the governor expressed himself as dissatisfied with the returns from the Red River as being underrated, because a large number of the settlers were off on their annual summer hunt; and he regarded the returns made by Mr. Morse of the Western district overrated, and that the agent had been deceived by representations made to him.

The report of the census taken by the Federal Government in 1860, which was the year following the treaty with the Yanktons and also the year preceding the passage of the organic act, gave to the Territory of Dakota the following agricultural and livestock productions: Eighty-four horses, 19 mules, 286 milch cows, 318 working oxen, 338 other cattle, 22 sheep and 287 swine. In grain and other farm products, 915 bushels of wheat, 700 bushels of rye, 20,296 bushels of corn, 250 bushels of oats, 286 bushels of peas and beans, 9,489 bushels of potatoes, 1,670 pounds of butter, 1,122 tons of hay and 20 gallons of maple molasses. Number of white population, 2,128. This was supposed to represent the entire area afterward included within the boundaries prescribed in the organic act.

According to the census of 1860, the Territory of Dakota contained a population of 2,376, and of this number the Pembina country contained 1,606, considerably more than half, but the Pembina population had a much greater proportion of mixed-bloods than the other portions of the territory in the south.

William E. Gleason, the attorney general of the territory, was the next to arrive after the governor. Mr. Gleason was rather a fastidious gentleman from Maryland—a staunch, southern republican of the Henry Winter Davis school. His apparel fitted his station and tradition has it that he came crowned with a stovepipe hat. The governor, aware of the limited accommodations in town, courteously invited him to share his quarters in the humble structure of cottonwood logs, and Mr. Gleason graciously accepted, conceiving that he could stand anything a governor could. So he placed his effects in the gubernatorial chamber and lodged in his official apartments. Mr. Gleason's first concern was to find water and a suitable vessel for a wash basin, which the executive office had strangely neglected to provide. Some wag related that the governor, when appealed to by the attorney, told him that there was an abundance of water in the Missouri, pointing toward the river, which was free to all. Mr. Gleason proved himself a very capable official and a genuine southern gentleman, nevertheless.

Yankton appears to have been selected as the rendezvous for the newly appointed federal officials prior to their coming to the territory.

Reference has been made to the organization of a provisional government at Sioux Falls and the earnest efforts of the pioneers there to secure an organization of the territory in their interest, which is treated at length in former chapters. Their efforts seem to have been intelligently and aggressively directed, and their failure was due to conditions beyond their control. Had the organization come a year earlier, as the Sioux Falls parties anticipated, while Buchanan was president, it would probably have been Sioux Falls and not Yankton, for the reason that the governor and other leading democrats of Minnesota, and many of Iowa, who stood high in the councils of the party, were active in its support. The appointment of Governor Jayne gave Yankton a valuable advantage. He was from Springfield, Ill., the home of the President, and a personal friend. Captain Todd, who had been at the head of all the movements on the Missouri slope leading up to the organization, was also a former Springfield man and a cousin of Mrs. Lincoln. There is no doubt that Captain Todd, who had high hopes of Yankton, and had arranged to enter the townsite under his treaty privilege, and who was also a very skillful plan maker, had arranged the place of rendezvous at Yankton, for hither all the federal officers came in the beginning. It will be admitted by all unprejudiced people that Yankton possessed natural advantages of a superior and prepossessing character that would have exerted a favorable influence on the minds of unbiased men who were looking for an official and domestic residence, but at that day its natural advantages comprised about all its possessions.

The census having been returned, the governor proceeded to issue a proclamation dividing the territory into legislative districts and calling an election for members of the Legislative Assembly and a delegate to Congress, and a second proclamation creating the judicial districts and assigning the judges. These proclamations are here given in full:

Secretary of the Territory.

The reader will observe that the districts had their southern boundary on the Missouri River and the northern boundary on the international boundary line.

PEN PORTRAITS OF FIRST TERRITORIAL OFFICERS

Of the first federal officials Judge Bliss was the patriarch in point of years, and the frosts of age had already grizzled his finely shaped head, and a full beard of corresponding whiteness covered his cheeks and chin. He did not cultivate a mustache. The judge was a finely formed man, full six feet tall, but his studious habits more than the encroachments of age had already given him a slightly stooping posture. He was a lawyer of ability, a quiet, deliberate man and self possessed at all times. As a judge he gained the confidence of the settlers on sight. He was about fifty years of age, but appeared considerably older.

Judge Williams of the Fort Randall district was next to Bliss in age, and was a learned man, a good lawyer, and a conscientious official. He was a Tennessean, accustomed to something more than the ordinary or necessary comforts of life, and found pioneering in Dakota difficult to assimilate. He was greatly bereaved during his term by the death of his son, who was his companion and just growing into promising manhood. Judge Williams was inclined to reticence and solitude. He was of medium height and form, wore a full beard and carried a cane more as a convenience than a necessity.

Judge Williston of the Vermillion district was younger than his brothers of the bench, and much the largest. He was an able lawyer and an excellent judge. He was a portly man, somewhat florid, and the prey of Dakota fleas and mosquitoes. These pests at time so wrought upon his temper that he was led to speak disparagingly of the country in language terse and emphatic. Judge Williston was about forty years of age and nearly six feet tall.

Judge Bliss resigned in 1864 and settled at St. Joseph, Missouri, where he engaged in journalism; Judge Williston was transferred to the bench of Montana in 1863 and was succeeded by Ira Bartlett, of Kankakee, Illinois; and Judge Williams returned to Tennessee at the expiration of his term.

Gov. William Jayne was about thirty-six years of age at the time he was appointed. He was a physician and had enjoyed an extensive practice in Sangamon County, Illinois, his home being at Springfield. He was an active man, in vigorous health, wore a beard which was of a dark brown color. His height was about five feet ten inches. He was a man of liberal education and of practical ability. His first message was an able paper containing much information, abounding in remarkable and unerring predictions regarding Dakota's future. He was the candidate of the republican and union party for delegate to Congress against General Todd in 1862, and was awarded the certificate of election by the territorial board of canvassers. General Todd contested his right to the seat. Jayne was given the seat in January, 1864, but lost it upon the final hearing a few months later, Congress allowing the Red River vote, which was in Todd's favor. He then returned to his former home in Springfield, Illinois, where he still resides. He has been several times elected mayor of the city, and now, though over eighty-six years of age, is a member of the State Board of Charities and Corrections.

John Hutchinson, the territorial secretary, was a western man. He had been through the border troubles of Kansas, but was appointed from Minnesota. He was a lawyer of good ability, and owed his appointment to the personal friendship of Hon. William H. Seward, the secretary of state of President Lincoln's cabinet. Hutchinson was about thirty two years of age, about five feet eight inches in height and slightly round shouldered, was married, and in 1862 brought his wife to Yankton and became a bona fide citizen of the territory. He was the only one of the commissioned federal officers to do this and it made him quite popular. Mr. Hutchinson was a black haired man, very full beard, dark complexion, nervous temperament. He was devoted to his family, attentive to his official duties, and quite socially disposed. He was reappointed at the expiration of his term in 1865, but resigned within a month to accept the consulship to Leghorn, Italy, desiring to give his daughter the advantage of a foreign residence and study. He returned in 1869 or 1870 and entered upon the practice of law in Chicago, which he continued until his death some twenty years later.

Gen. George D. Hill of Ann Arbor, Michigan, the first surveyor general, was a man of distinguished appearance, fine intellect and fair education. He was well versed in the theory and practice of agriculture, and had been prominently before the people of his state as a speaker and writer on agricultural topics for years. He was over six feet tall, quite corpulent, always carefully dressed, auburn hair and full whiskers tinged with gray, but no mustache. Quite a pompous sort of man, fond of good living, but seriously lacking the element of popularity, due largely to his custom of giving surveying contracts to his Michigan friends who were non-residents, and to an unfortunate parsimoniousness that he made unnecessarily conspicuous, and an unpardonable habit of forgetfulness that gave rise to reports that injured his standing among the people. But he was one of the most useful of Dakota's first officials, nevertheless, because of his well grounded faith in the natural resources of the territory. He was the first to take hold of the practical work of inducing immigration to the territory, and his knowledge of the merits of our soil and climate and his study of the vegetation in the valleys and on the plains enabled him to talk convincingly on that subject. He labored in this field in Michigan and was mainly instrumental in inducing the New York colony of nearly one hundred families to settle in Dakota in 1864. Mr. Hill was a candidate for reappointment but failed to get it. He returned to Ann Arbor, where he resided until his death, which occurred about 1890. He made but one visit to Dakota after his retirement from office—this was in 1888. He came with Judge James Tufts and went on to Niobrara, presumably on some business connected with early days, but the mission, whatever it was, proved unsuccessful. It was observable at this time that Mr. Hill's faculties had been seriously impaired and his robust vigor had declined. His life had not been a success, and after his return to Michigan from this visit the decline was more rapid, terminating within a year or two in his death. He should be kindly remembered for his valuable labors in behalf of the infant territory and his unfaltering and rock-rooted faith in the capabilities of Dakota's soil and climate. He was ever constant in sounding their merits, and this too in the face of many discouraging circumstances.

William E. Gleason, of Maryland, was the first United States attorney. He was quite a young man, highly gifted and well educated. He was a southern republican and had been appointed through the influence of his friend, Henry Winter Davis, of Maryland, who at that time was the national leader of the radical wing of the republican party. Mr. Gleason was a sparely built, willowy man about five feet eleven inches tall, long dark hair, black eyes, beard and mustache, and not to exceed thirty years of age. In habit he was quite fastidious, and while his speech betrayed his southern origin it also disclosed the best and the highest sounding phrases the language afforded. He had a fine legal education and was ardently devoted to his profession. His extreme sensitiveness was responsible for many of the difficulties he encountered, leading him at times to suspect when there were no grounds for suspicion. It would seem that there are some unfortunate persons who are so morbidly sensitive that they imagine everything they say and every act they commit is being overheard or watched, commented upon and criticized; and yet the weakness of undue vanity should not be ascribed to them. It is an inborn trait that only time and experience and rough knocks can only partially blunt of its torturing propensity. Mr. Gleason's official duties, like those of all the other officials, were not onerous but he gave conscientious attention to them and his career as the legal representative of the Government was marked by fidelity, integrity and ability. He was extremely courteous, accommodating and generous, though his salary and emoluments were not sufficient to defray his necessary expenses, being but $250 a year and certain fees. The law governing his office and that of the marshal presupposed that the fees would be sufficient to make the office desirable and the income princely, whereas the fees amounted to less than the salary during Mr. Gleason's term and there was no private practice. Mr. Gleason, like Judge Bliss, did not unite with the governor and some of the other federal officials in territorial political matters, but became the chief counselor and advisor of General Todd and his friends. This created a serious estrangement which continued throughout his term as attorney for the Government. His political alliance with the Todd interest did not seem to affect his standing at Washington and when his term expired in 1865 he was appointed to succeed Joseph L. Williams as associate justice of Dakota. He served a few months of this term, was then appointed consul to Bordeaux, France, and with the expiration of that term returned to Baltimore, where he died some years later.

William F. Shaeffer, who was appointed United States marshal and was the first incumbent of that office in Dakota, was a Missourian, and when appointed was out at Pike's Peak in what had been Arrapahoe County, Kansas, though soon after organized as the Territory of Colorado. He was a young man, not over thirty years of age, of prepossessing appearance, good address, and well qualified for his office. He remained in the territory about a year attending court in Vermillion, Yankton and Fort Randall. He was not satisfied with his position, and furthermore was an ardent Union man and desired to enter the Government military service. He resigned in 1862 and went back to Missouri and was no more heard from by his limited acquaintances here.

None of the first officers were widowers. All were married except Gleason and Shaeffer, who were bachelors.

As a rule, these first officials were a very temperate class of men. The governor, chief justice and attorney neither drank intoxicants nor used tobacco. Judge Williams smoked but if he drank anything it was very sparingly. Judge Williston was likewise an abstainer. Secretary Hutchinson had been a Kansas pioneer long enough to become an occasional moderate drinker, but seldom smoked. General Hill was quite fond of the "bubbles that swim on the beaker's brim," and enjoyed a good story even if he had to tell it himself. Take the first officials as a body, and without disparagement to their successors to the present day, they were their equals if not superiors in point of intellectual attainments.

Looking upon these first officials from the present day point of view we are led to believe that all of them were disappointed when they came face to face with Dakota and into actual possession of their offices. They had expected more than they found. Even the simplest of ordinary physical comforts were largely wanting; there was neither school nor church, a small number of log huts and but a moderate prospect of more improvement. They had all literally got in on the "ground floor," and were in time to assist in laying the first foundation of the social as well as political structure. The governor, chief justice and secretary were accompanied by their wives as far as Sioux City. At that point they were apprised of the prevailing newness of civilization west of the "Jim," and the ladies were left at Hagy's one-story hotel fronting the river, where the host would take you out of doors and along a good piece of sidewalk when he came to "show you up" to your lodging place.

FIRST POLITICAL MOVEMENTS

In its earliest days Dakota attained a reputation because of the interest manifested by its settlers in political matters. It was said that Dakota contained more politicians in proportion to the whole population than any other section of the Union. The first political convention was held at Vermillion on June 1, 1861. The following were the proceedings:

In response to a call, the people of Dakota Territory met in mass convention at Vermillion, on Saturday, June 1, 1861, at 2 o'clock P. M., and organized a national union party. George M. Pinney, of Bon Homme, was elected chairman, and A. W. Puett, of Vermillion, secretary. The following platform was adopted:

Resolved, That we, as citizens of Dakota Territory, are unanimously in favor of maintaining inviolate the Constitution of the United States and the enforcement of all the laws of Congress and the perpetuity of the Union.

Resolved, That we pledge our cordial support to the governor and secretary of this territory in maintaining the Organic Act and especially the sacred right of elective franchise.

Resolved, That we are in favor of a liberal homestead law, giving 160 acres of our public domain to all native and naturalized citizens who will make homes thereon, and that we will only support such a man for Congress, who is not only in favor of such a measure, but whose antecedents warrant us in believing him to be unwavering in his position.

Resolved, That we fully and frankly endorse the policy of the present administration in relation to our national difficulties, believing that it is both patriotic and just.

Resolved, That monopolies of all kinds are dangerous to the interests of the masses, and often disastrous, and especially the holding for speculative purposes of large tracts of the best portion of a new country, and we earnestly call upon all citizens of Dakota Territory to aid us in preventing the extension of present land monopolies in this territory or the inauguration of new ones.

Resolved, That this convention nominate A. J. Bell as our candidate for delegate to Congress.

Resolved, That we pledge our individual support to the nominee of this convention, Hon. A. J. Bell.

After the passage of the resolutions, Mr. Bell was introduced and made an excellent speech, receiving the applause of the convention, after which the convention adjourned with nine hearty cheers for A. J. Bell.

GEORGE M. PINNEY, Chairman.

A. W. PUETT, Secretary.

This was considered the first territorial party convention held in Dakota. The proceedings furnish no names except those of Pinney and Puett, and Bell, all republicans, and while the proceedings designated it as a national union convention, it was popularly called a republican convention. Except Mr. Pinney, it was claimed that those who participated in the convention were all from Vermillion. Mr. Bell, the nominee, was not a voter under the organic act. He had come in from Minnesota in May. He was a man of good ability. At the time the convention was held neither the governor nor any of the federal officers had reached the territory. There had been no election called, and no doubt a prejudicial impression got abroad among the voters because of the apparent haste to hold the convention, possibly, for the purpose of forestalling political action in which all the settlements might participate. It was suggested that Mr. Pinney was disappointed that the nomination for delegate did not fall to him, and it was remarked after the election was held, that the Bon Homme precinct, which Mr. Pinney represented, and the Yankton precinct, gave no vote for Mr. Bell.

About the 1st of September, Charles P. Booge, who held the position of trader at the Yankton Indian agency, was nominated by a convention held at Bon Homme.

There was no convention held to nominate General Todd. He was in the field and his friends and supporters were very active and comparatively numerous. Although himself a democrat, he did not want to go to Congress at that time representing any party, and he was aware that a large proportion of the republican voters were supporting him, believing that he could accomplish more for the territory under existing conditions than any other citizen of the territory, having borne the leading part in all public affairs from the beginning of the negotiations for the treaty of cession, and from his connection with Mr. Lincoln, being a cousin of Mrs. Lincoln's, and wide acquaintance with public men and general knowledge of public business, would be able to secure for the young territory many favors from the departments which a stranger in the territory and at Washington would fail in procuring.

The time for the first election under the organic act called by the governor's proclamation to be held on the 16th of September was rapidly approaching and the settlers were largely occupied with state affairs and in considering who should be their first law makers. Three candidates for delegate to Congress had been placed in the field. Capt. J. B. S. Todd, himself an old line democrat, whose services in bringing about the organization of the territory had made him by far the most prominent and influential man in Dakota was being supported by the substantial element of citizens without regard to their party affiliations and without a convention.

Mass conventions were held in the different settlements for the nomination of candidates for the Legislature. While the sentiment in most districts was practically unanimous for Todd for Congress there was considerable strife over the selection of candidates for the Legislature. Non-partisanship was the popular cry, and nearly all advocated the abolition of party lines for this election, at the same time it was apparent that the views of the voter as to non-partisanship were very largely influenced by his political antecedents, and the majority of the voting population in the legislative districts as well as a majority of the leaders were democrats. At this time, and for a long number of years prior, the democratic party was in the lead in the nation and in a majority of the states, in fact the United States since the formation of the Constitution had been, a large portion of time, under democratic control, though not always under the democratic title.

The first formal political movement in Yankton was made on the 17th day of August, 1861, when the following non-partisan call was issued.

The voters of the Sixth Representative District of Dakota Territory are requested to assemble in mass convention at Yankton, in said district, at 1 o'clock P. M., on the 24th day of August, A. D. 1861, for the purpose of nominating two councilmen and two representatives for the Territorial Legislature to be voted for on the 16th day of September, 1861.

Signed: John Stanage, J. M. Stone, M. K. Armstrong, D. T. Bramble, William Miner, William Thompson, Lytle M. Griffith, F. Chapel, E. Stutsman, D. Fisher, J. D. Morse.

In accordance with this call which is signed by six democrats and five republicans the convention was held and the proceedings are here given in full:

Pursuant to notice the people of the Sixth Representative District assembled in mass convention at Yankton on the 24th day of August, 1861. On motion of A. M. English, Dr. J. Townsend was called to the chair, and on motion of T. A. McLeese, J. D. Morse was appointed secretary. Upon taking the chair Doctor Townsend made a few remarks, stating that the object of the meeting was for the purpose of nominating two councilmen and two representatives, and closing with an urgent appeal that harmony might prevail.

Enos Stutsman moved that the convention proceed to vote for one representative to the Legislature, which was carried. T. A. McLeese nominated M. K. Armstrong. There being no opposing candidate, on motion of Obed Foote, Mr. Armstrong was nominated by acclamation. W. P. Lyman nominated John Stanage. No other name being proposed, Mr. Stanage was nominated by acclamation.

Frank Chapel nominated Enos Stutsman for the council. There being no opposition, Mr. Stutsman was nominated by acclamation. W. P. Lyman nominated D. T. Bramble for the council. Being the only person proposed, Mr. Bramble was nominated by acclamation.

On motion the chair appointed the following committee of five on resolutions: Enos Stutsman, M. K. Armstrong, James M. Stone, J. R. Hanson and James M. Allen. The committee reported the following.

Resolved, That the legal voters of the Sixth Representative District of Dakota Territory, in mass convention assembled, do most cordially endorse the war policy of the present administration, in all endeavors to put down rebellion, and preserve the Constitution and union of states.

Resolved, That in the organization of this great territory we fully recognize the confidence that Congress has reposed in our ability to govern ourselves, and therefore we pledge our earnest endeavors, with the aid of the officials of the territory, to preserve peace, enforce the laws, establish society and build up a territorial government which will be an honor to ourselves and an ornament to the Union.

Resolved, That in view of the value of economy of time and money as one of the essential objects of legislation, we shall demand of the men this day put in nomination that they use diligent exertion to forward and close up the business of the Legislature in as short a term as may be consistent with the best interests of the people.

Resolved, That we advocate the policy of free ferry charters on James River, allowing to each man the right to run a ferry on his own premises so long as it does not conflict with claims of another.

Resolved, That we pledge our earnest and united support to the candidates this day put in nomination by this convention, and also to J. B. S. Todd for delegate to Congress.

W. H. Allen moved that the resolutions be adopted in a body. An amendment was offered by James M. Stone that each resolution be adopted separately. Amendment lost. The resolutions were then adopted.

On motion the convention adjourned.

J. TOWNSEND, President.

J. D. MORSE, Secretary.

It might have been a mere accident but the result of the convention's labors was a ticket composed entirely of democrats and while there were a number of staunch republicans in the convention and in the town, they were not recognized on the ticket.

This omission was the cause of considerable feeling. At the same time it will be conceded that the gentlemen who were nominated were among the ablest and most enterprising citizens of the county, and in point of representative ability and length of residence could not have been improved upon materially. The resolutions, it will be observed, strongly endorse the war policy of President Lincoln and affirmed staunch loyalty to the Union.

The restoration and preservation of the Union was the only question of importance, and both political parties in the North adhered to the Union cause, though there were some minor differences that served to identify the two parties and create sufficient estrangement to keep them divided.

As a sequel to the convention above reported, two of the parties attending it, both life long and leading republican citizens took occasion a few days later to have printed and circulated the following: (The Yankton newspaper, The Weekly Dakotian, was started in June, 1861).

Editor Dakotian: In your last issue we notice our names given as two of the committee appointed to draft resolutions adopted at our late district convention. In reference to that we wish to say that it was without our consent or even knowledge that we were placed upon that committee and that we had no voice in drafting the resolutions and were opposed to their being adopted "in a body" and in favor of their being taken up "separately." Against a portion of them we had not one word to say, while against the balance we are most bitterly opposed.

The proceedings of that convention were not, in our opinion, conducted on those principles of fairness which should characterize an occasion fraught with so much importance to this place and territory, and we do not consider ourselves bound, in the slightest degree, by them.

The meanness to which some of the nominees of that convention stooped to gain their nomination, exhibits an imbecility of mind indicative of no future political good to them.

Our names being on that committee carries with it the inference that we helped make and endorse those resolutions, while our course and actions since that day have been in direct opposition. We wish that our records may stand unpolluted by any such foul blot.

We said on the day of that convention that we would use our utmost exertion to defeat the ticket then put in nomination, and we now know no good reason why we should change our course of action.

J. R. HANSON,
J. M. STONE.

The outcome of this convention difficulty was another legislative ticket made up of J. B. Greenway and William Thompson for the councilmen and James M. Stone and Otis B. Wheeler for the House. They were placed in nomination without the formality of a convention.

While the territorial campaign was marked by a good share of excitement and feeling, mostly occasioned by the energetic and eloquent campaigners on their

CHAPTER XIX

DAKOTA IN THE CIVIL AND INDIAN WARS

1861

BEGINNING OF THE CIVIL WAR—FORT SUMTER BESIEGED AND CAPTURED BY THE SECESSIONISTS—FIRST CALL FOR VOLUNTEERS—POSITION OF MONARCHICAL GOVERNMENTS—UNION SENTIMENT AMONG THE PIONEERS—DAKOTA CAVALRY AUTHORIZED—COMPANY A RECRUITED AND MUSTERED IN—THE MUSTER ROLL—COMPANY STATIONED TO PROTECT SETTLEMENTS—DR. W. A. BURLEIGH, INDIAN AGENT—HIS EARLY EXPERIENCES.

BEGINNING OF THE CIVIL WAR

The people of the United States were at this time in a condition of great excitement and alarm caused by the attempted secession from the Union of nearly all the southern or slave states. Southern senators and representatives had been withdrawing from Congress during the winter of 1860-61, their states having through their Legislatures, or in convention, passed ordinances of secession, which they regarded as severing the political and territorial ties which had connected their states with the United States of America, and relieved them of their fealty to that Government. Armies had been levied in the South, and acts of hostility against the Government were committed before Mr. Buchanan's term expired in March, 1861. The inauguration of Abraham Lincoln as President was the signal for open revolt and acts of war. Fort Sumter, in Charleston Harbor, was assailed by the batteries of South Carolina under command of General Beauregard, April 12, 1861, and Major Anderson, the commanding officer of the fort, was finally compelled to evacuate the fort after contending with the besieging force of 3,000, equipped with an abundance of heavy artillery, that had been the property of the United States. Sumter had been virtually destroyed for defensive purposes before Anderson hoisted the white flag in token of surrender. He had held out five days in the face of an incessant cannonade hoping to be relieved by reinforcements, at the end of which time he gave up the fort, securing from Beauregard exemption from capture as prisoners, with leave to return North on a Government vessel. Anderson then marched out and embarked for Fortress Monroe.

On the 15th of April, two days after the surrender of Sumter, President Lincoln issued a call for 75,000 volunteers for three months army service, that being the time which the United States authorities believed ample to put down the rebellion and bring the recalcitrant rebels back to their allegiance. Southern leaders of the rebellion were just as sanguine of an early termination of the struggle in their favor. No one seemed to grasp the magnitude of the great contest upon which this country had entered, or even so much as imagined that there were to be four years of terrible war, such as the world had seldom if ever witnessed, which this nation was destined to pass through before the difficulties and extreme differences of three fourths of a century's accumulations, would be settled by the stern arbitrator of arms and peace restored. None could believe that it would require over a million men for each contestant—the flower of the country's gallant sons—and billions of money, before the rebellious forces would acknowledge defeat, and the revolting states be restored to their places in the Union. No one apparently suspected that in addition to the domestic enemy, this young republic had never secured the sincere friendship of England, France, Spain or Germany, and the moral as well as financial support of these monarchies, or their wealthy subjects sustained the rebellion under a belief and a hope that it would destroy the system of free government that had been adopted by the United States, and which monarchy had sullenly and wishfully predicted would be a failure. Kings saw in this rebellion a possible means to overthrow and destroy the work of Washington and his compeers, and it had the sympathy of those rulers who feared its example, if successful, upon their fettered subjects. Russia was an exception, however, and stood openly and actively by the young republic, and sent its fleets to our waters to defend our shores if necessary against foreign interference. Confederate bonds were freely sold to a vast amount in the markets of Europe and munitions of war and ships purchased with the proceeds. The South furnished the soldiers and the blood for the Confederacy—Europe the “sinews of war.”

In the fall of 1861, the War Department authorized the governor of Dakota to raise two companies of cavalry for the War of the Rebellion, to be employed in patrolling and garrison duty in the territory. Three recruiting stations were established by Governor Jayne, by proclamation of December 7, 1861, viz.: At Yankton, Vermillion, and a third at Bon Homme, at that time the three principal towns on the Missouri slope. Elk Point did not begin to be a “principal town” until the following year, though a number of settlers had occupied lands in its vicinity. The governor appointed J. Kendrick Fowler, a brother-in-law of Secretary Hutchinson, recruiting officer at Yankton; Nelson Miner at Vermillion, and James M. Allen at Bon Homme. These recruiting officials entered at once upon their duties, and Company A had raised its complement of men during the winter following and was mustered into the service of the United States at Yankton in April, 1862. Its commissioned officers when mustered in were Nelson Miner, captain, Vermillion; J. K. Fowler, 1st lieutenant, Yankton; Frederick Ploghoff, 2nd lieutenant, Bon Homme. The company rendezvoused at Yankton awaiting the formality of “mustering in” to the service of the United States.

The company was claimed by some of the Yankton people as a local organization, though not more than one-third of its members had been residents of the future county prior to enlistment, the remainder coming from Clay, Cole, Bon Homme, Minnehaha, and one from Nebraska. Its membership included several veterans who had seen service in the regular army. Taken collectively it was a fine body of men, physically, intellectually and morally. Quite a number of the recruits were farmers and nearly all claimholders. The ceremony of “mustering in” took place at Yankton on the 20th day of April, 1862, Lieut. M. R. Luce, of the Forty-first Regiment of Iowa Volunteers, being mustering officer. The term of service was for three years or during the war. We here append the muster roll:

Company A had remained at Yankton after being mustered in, awaiting the coming of their horses and other cavalry equipment which were received about the 15th of May. Orders then came to report at Fort Randall and the company left for that post on May 20th. The departure of the company was a very serious loss to the business of Yankton, and was also severely felt in social circles, where the young soldiers had been the principal reliance. They had also contributed much of value to the various societies and organizations that were being formed to promote education, religion, and also general town improvements, which the pioneers of a community are required to organize and put in motion. About the 15th of June an order was received from the War Department by Acting Governor Hutchinson, directing that the First Dakota Cavalry be placed under the direction of the governor of Dakota Territory. The company at this time was at Fort Randall, where Lieutenant Colonel Pattee, of the Seventh Iowa, was in command. In July Lieutenant Ploghoff reached Yankton with twenty-five men of Company A, fifteen of whom were stationed on Turkey Ridge Creek at the crossing of the Sioux Falls road, and ten at Sioux Falls with Lieutenant Ploghoff in command. Later in the same month the remainder of the company under Lieutenant Fowler arrived and about the same time Lieutenant Ploghoff, with a small detachment from Sioux Falls, came over to procure equipment for the Sioux Falls detachment and the squad at Turkey Ridge. At this time Lieutenant Ploghoff resigned his commission and James Bacon, of Sioux City, who had been with the company for some time was commissioned second lieutenant. The company was now assigned under direction of the governor: Lieutenant Bacon at Sioux Falls with twenty men; Orderly Sergt. A. M. English at Yankton with twenty men; and Captain Miner with the remainder of the company at Vermillion and Brule Creek. English's camp was about a mile west of James River on the bench land. There was also a small detachment at the Turkey Ridge crossing of the Sioux Falls road. Fort Randall at this time was garrisoned by the Seventh Iowa, with Lieut. Col. Wallis Pattee in command.

WALTER A. BURLEIGH

Dr. Walter A. Burleigh, of Kittaning, Pennsylvania, had been appointed United States agent of the Yankton Indians to succeed Mr. Redfield, whose administration had not been satisfactory to the Indians. He served, however, until the expiration of Mr. Buchanan's term as President, who was succeeded by Mr. Lincoln, when in accordance with the time honored Jacksonian maxim, "to the victors being the spoils," the democrat was turned out and the republicans turned in. Doctor Burleigh's first trip to his new official residence was undertaken in May soon after his appointment. He came out to see what sort of a prize he had drawn in the political lottery, remained a few days at the Yankton Agency and returned to Pennsylvania for his family and also to facilitate the shipment of the annuity goods due the Indians. Having secured his goods, he brought his family with him to St. Joe, Missouri, where he secured accommodations on the Steamboat J. G. Morrow, a very comfortable vessel built for the Hannibal and St. Joe Railroad for use at Atchison, Kansas, and owned at the time by United States Senator Pomeroy. Doctor Burleigh's family, at the time, consisted of Mrs. Burleigh and three children, Timothy, Walter and Andrew, who was a babe in arms. A nurse girl and a cook for the agency also made part of the family. The boat was loaded with $30,000 worth of Indian annuity goods, and a shipment to Major Gregory at Ponca Agency, Frost Todd & Co., Fort Randall, and a small assortment of supplies for the Government at the military post. The voyage up the river was accomplished without unpleasant incident until the boat had reached a point nearly opposite St. Helena, Nebraska, about eleven miles below Yankton. Here it was discovered that the boat was leaking badly and investigation showed that she was rapidly filling with water and in a sinking condition. The captain ordered her run ashore on the Nebraska side. She got very near the bank when she touched bottom in water six feet deep at the bow and about twelve feet at the stern. This was rather a trying position for the new Yankton agent. His annuity goods for the coming year were on the boat and much of the stuff would be injured by water. His little family must be provided with shelter and food until he could arrange some method for transporting them to the agency, and to add to his troubles and perplexities the captain of the boat refused to have the goods put ashore claiming that they were now liable to marine law and must only be removed after certain legal proceedings had been gone through with. Burleigh saw that this would consume the entire fall and winter and would cause endless trouble with the Indians, and he resolved to remove the goods by force if necessary. He had fortunately found a vacant log cabin near the landing where the boat was lying, and this was fitted up as well as could be done under the circumstances and Mrs. Burleigh, the children, nurse and cook installed therein. The accident to the boat occurred Thursday, August 29th and after spending a day getting his family settled, Burleigh set off for Yankton, eleven miles, on Saturday the 31st on foot, and through the underbrush and tall grass. A large scow ferry propelled by oars was found at Yankton. Fifteen minutes after his arrival he had engaged Major Lyman with a squad of twelve men of the Home Guards to assist him in securing the goods. The party returned with a lumber wagon to the scene of the disaster and there set diligently at work removing the cargo to the shore, the captain yielding to "superior force and inevitable necessity." Burleigh was not at all alarmed about infringing upon the maritime laws. He knew the proverb "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush" and he knew also that his Indian charges would endure much suffering and possibly starvation and possibly be incited to the commission of grave offenses, if they failed to get these supplies. The fact that the goods had been destroyed on a sunken steamboat would not satisfy the cravings of their hungry stomachs and they would probably have believed the story was a falsehood and the new agent had stolen the entire cargo. No doubt that Mr. Burleigh acted wisely and for the best interest of all concerned. He succeeded in getting all the goods ashore, although a portion were badly damaged by water; and felt greatly relieved to think that he could go to his post with the consciousness of duty well performed, the Indians would see that the "Great Father" was keeping his compact with them, and whatever damage had resulted would be made good thereafter. Burleigh openly charged that the boat's officers were grossly incompetent and the pilot intoxicated. He covered his supplies with tarpaulines and placed them under a strong guard, then engaged every team in town and county, and as rapidly as possible shipped them to the agency seventy-five miles up the river. A less energetic and resolute man would undoubtedly have had a most bitter experience from this misfortune, as any failure to furnish the annuity goods so soon after the treaty had been made would have given rise to grave suspicions among the Indians and might have led to serious disturbances. The boat was afterward raised and taken back to Atchison, and no action was ever commenced to punish the agent for his violation of maritime etiquette.

Mrs. Burleigh with her family remained in her log hut nearly a week, when Lieutenant Tannatt, at the time in command at Fort Randall, came down with an ambulance and took them to that post. During her stay at the cabin Mrs. Burleigh remembers that she was furnished with milk and some other supplies by a Mrs. Wiseman who lived near and whose children two years later fell victims to the murderous Indians. After leaving the hut Mrs. Burleigh's first stopping place was the Ash Hotel at Yankton where she put up for the night. The hotel was then occupying its pioneer log quarters, and no arrangement had been made for the accommodation of families or even the feminine sex. Mrs. Ash, however, did the very best she could, and gave up her room to her new guest and the children and the nurse, all of whom were nicely stowed away somewhere within its precincts. The carpet of earth that covered the floor before the cabins were built was still doing floor duty, and Mrs. Burleigh had some reason to believe that she had really reached the land and homes of the pioneers. The next morning before she had arisen, a gentleman came stalking through the room to the small looking glass hanging on the wall, picked up a comb and arranged his hair and passed out into the breakfast room. She became acquainted with this gentleman a few months later and learned that his name was Brookings. She now proceeded to get her little flock ready for breakfast and when they had seated themselves at the dining table she discovered a little short man on crutches coming through her room into the dining room where he popped up into a chair with a suddenness that startled her. When she afterwards became acquainted with this gentleman she learned that his name was Stutsman. He proved to be a very social little fellow. The family went on to Fort Randall that day, stopping the next night at Choteau Creek where Tackett kept a hotel, and gave them comfortable quarters; they reached Fort Randall the next day and were given quarters in the residence of the commanding officer whose family was absent, and where they spent a fortnight very pleasantly, when they removed to their new home at the Yankton Agency, having had a very thorough introduction into pioneer life.

CHAPTER XX

THE FIRST LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY

FIRST LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY CONVENES—ITS ORGANIZATION—LOCATION OF CAPITAL THE MAIN ISSUE NAMES OF MEMBERS AND OFFICERS GOVERNOR'S FIRST MESSAGE REMARKABLE FORETELLING OF DAKOTA'S CAREER.

The important event to which the attention of Dakotians had been directed for many months was the convening of the first Legislative Assembly under the Organic Act, members of which had been elected at the election called by the governor in September, 1861, and were authorized to convene as a Legislature at the Town of Yankton at noon on the 17th day of March, A. D., 1862. The people of the territory were now as Dakotians for the first time to have a voice in their government through their chosen representatives, who were to lay the foundation of a governmental structure that would endure for all time. The duty was a sacred one.

Franklin J. Dewitt of St. Paul and George W. Kingsbury of Junction City, Kansas, were the only occupants of the Marsh and Rustin ambulance that reached Yankton from Sioux City Monday evening, March 17, 1862. Major Dewitt's mission must have had something to do with legislation, the Legislature having convened at noon on the day of his arrival in its first session. He took quarters at the Ash Hotel and remained there during the sixty days' session, giving an occasional banquet and keeping "open house" in his rooms. Mr. Dewitt had been in Yankton during the summer of 1861, and was then looking for a location for a stock ranch. He was one of the pioneers of Sioux Falls, and was doubtless interested in the location of the capital, which would be decided by this first Legislature.

Mr. Kingsbury came to assist in the mechanical department of Josiah Trask's printing establishment, Trask having been appointed public printer by the secretary of the territory, John Hutchinson, whom he had known in Kansas. Kingsbury expected to remain in Yankton about three months and then return to Kansas. He has not yet reached the day of departure after a lapse of more than fifty years. He came up from Lawrence, Kansas, by the way of St. Joseph, Missouri, and recalls that the stage road was miry for many miles north of St. Joe; and a brisk snowstorm with a change from wheels to runners during the night before reaching Council Bluffs; and afterward a week or two of mild, dry weather that beguiled the unsophisticated into discarding winter raiment for the more comfortable and lighter garb of spring. Then the blizzard came.

The members of the Legislature were a representative class, embracing the best informed and most influential men in each community, and representing also the various occupations of the people. The winter had not been severe, but there was an abundance of snow and a temperature at times severe enough to form ice twenty inches thick in the Missouri. A short season of mild weather prevailed during the close of February and early in March that carried off much of the accumulated snow, but this was later succeeded by heavy storms, blizzardly in their proportions, and these were especially severe during the settling of the Legislature.

The 17th of March, 1862, had been a very pleasant day. The ground was bare and the sky cloudless. At high noon on that eventful Monday the members-elect of the two houses assembled at Yankton, the councilmen resorting to their chamber in a new frame building on the southeast corner of Fourth Street and Broadway, and the representatives gathering at the log structure erected by the citizens of Yankton for the use of the Episcopal parish near the northwest corner of Fourth and Linn streets. The two houses were thus within convenient proximity. The organization of the two bodies, the council and House of Representatives, had been prearranged, and had been made with the question of location of the capital of the territory as the governing factor. The aspirants for this favor were Yankton and Vermillion, with Sioux Falls a "dark horse."

The members of the council were all present. They had been chosen by districts as defined by the proclamation of the governor, and there were no contested seats, though James McFitridge of Paulina filed a notice of contest for the seat held by W. W. Brookings of Sioux Falls, after the session had been inaugurated. From the First District came W. W. Brookings, of Sioux Falls, and Austin Cole, of Sioux Point; Second District, Henry D. Betts and John W. Boyle, both of Vermillion; Third District, Jacob Deuel, west of the Vermillion River; Fourth District, Enos Stutsman and Downer T. Bramble, Yankton; Fifth District, John H. Shober, Bon Homme; and Sixth District, J. Shaw Gregory; this district being west of Choteau Creek and also west of the Missouri and north of the Niobrara River, called Mixville; also Fort Randall.

The ceremony of organizing began with the calling of the roll of members by Hon. John Hutchinson, as returned to the secretary of the territory. The members then stood before Chief Justice Philemon Bliss with the right hands uplifted and took the oath of office, which the venerable jurist administered with due solemnity. This was followed by a prayer from Rev. Mr. Ingham, the Methodist clergyman. The council then proceeded to effect a temporary organization by the election of Enos Stutsman, Yankton, president; James Tufts, of Mixville, secretary; E. M. Bond, Vermillion, assistant secretary; W. R. Goodfellow, Elk Point, messenger; Charles F. Picotte, Yankton, sergeant-at-arms; and Rev. S. W. Ingham, Vermillion, chaplain. A permanent organization immediately followed, the only change being the election of John H. Shober, Bon Homme, as president. Still Mr. Stutsman had been elected first president of the first council.

The members-elect of the House of Representatives, thirteen in number, were: First District, John McBride, of Elk Point, and Christopher Maloney, of Sioux Point; Second District, George P. Waldron, of Sioux Falls; Third District, Hugh Donaldson, Pembina, who was absent; Fourth District, Lyman Burgess and A. W. Puett, of East Vermillion; Fifth District, Bligh E. Wood and Jacob A. Jacobson, West Vermillion; Sixth District, M. K. Armstrong, Yankton, and John Stanage, James River Crossing; Seventh District, George M. Pinney and Reuben Wallace, Bon Homme; Eighth District, John L. Tiernon, Fort Randall.

The roll was called by Secretary Hutchinson, and all were found present except Mr. Donaldson of the Red River of the North District, who had not yet reached Yankton; and the oath of office was then impressively administered by his honor, Chief Justice Bliss. The divine blessing was then invoked by Rev. M. D. Metcalf, of Bon Homme. A temporary organization was then effected, which must have been for the purpose of testing the good faith of the members in abiding by a prior agreement regarding the distribution of the various offices to be filled, as the permanent organization which followed, without the intervention of other business, was a reaffirmation of the first, and is here given:

Mr. Armstrong, of Yankton, nominated Mr. Pinney, of Bon Homme, for speaker, and he was elected by the unanimous vote of the members and escorted to the chair, where he delivered a brief address as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives: I do not solicit your attention for the purpose of making a speech, but to express my thanks and gratitude for this mark of your respect and confidence manifested by selecting me to stand for and represent the will of the assembly.

I desire to assure you that I shall endeavor not to be so undmindful of my duty as to trample on the rights of any member of this House, and that there is no want of feeling in my heart to look strictly after the interests of each individual member so far as it is within my province and capacity so to do. I can see no reason why we cannot have a session remarkable for its rapid and beneficial transaction of public business; the best motives seem to be apparent, party prejudices are out of the way, and the grave influences of the times in connection with the responsibility which rests upon us as members of the first Legislature of Dakota, ought to be sufficient to invite us to our best efforts. I trust you will not consider me attempting to pronounce a homily when I say that if we would succeed as the first law makers of Dakota Territory we should have energetic action, and that we should also have a true and lively friendship existing among us, that generous sentiment not incompatible with honorable emulation which encourages a member instead of dragging him down, which throbs and delights when he acquits himself fairly in debate, which hastens to pardon his faults and follies, is as ready to grant pardon as to accept it, and to award praise as to court it. Knit together by these manly sentiments, we can fondly hope that, wherever our lots are cast in future years, we will look back with pleasing thoughts upon our relationship in this House, and so long as life lasts, will we regard it with a feeling akin to that which hallows the place of our birth, and consecrates in our memory the scene of our early years. Thanking you again for this expression of your kindness and confidence, I accept the position assigned me, assuring you that I shall use every effort commensurate with my ability to discharge the duties of the office in a faithful and impartial manner.

At the conclusion of the speaker's address the House proceeded to perfect its permanent organization by the election of the persons whose names and office, follow:

J. R. Hanson, Yankton, chief clerk; James M. Allen, Sioux Falls, assistant clerk; Daniel Gifford, Bon Homme, enrolling clerk; James Somers, Sioux Point, sergeant-at-arms; Ole Anderson, East Vermillion, fireman; A. B. Smith, Tower Bute, messenger; Rev. M. D. Metcalf, Bon Homme, chaplain. Mr. Waldron nominated Henry Masters for assistant clerk and Mr. Puett nominated A. A. Partridge for sergeant-at-arms, but they were unsuccessful.

Both houses appointed committees to wait upon the governor and notify him of the organization and also committees to notify each other of their organization and then adjourned; the council to meet at 9 A. M. and the House at 2 P. M.

On the second day of the session the two houses appointed the hour of 2 o'clock P. M. on Wednesday, the third day to meet in joint convention at the hall of the House to receive the message of Governor Jayne. At the appointed time the joint convention assembled and the governor, by his private secretary, Geo. W. Lamson appeared and read the first communication made by a governor of Dakota to a Dakota Legislature. This document is a part of the early history of Dakota Territory. It displays many features that will be warmly commended, and discloses a knowledge of the resources of the territory that could only have been acquired by earnest study of the subject. The feature that will attract the most attention and comment at the present day is that which endeavors to picture the future of our nation and our territory or state a half century hence. The language of the governor seems truthfully prophetic as he dips "into the future far as human eye could see." The message follows:

GOVERNOR JAYNE'S FIRST MESSAGE

Yankton, S. D., March 17, 1862

Gentlemen of the Council and House of Representatives:

In assembling at this period of internal dissension and Civil war, it would appear that we have especial reason to return thanks to an all wise and beneficent Providence for the peace and quiet which the people of our territory have enjoyed; also for the bountiful harvest we have gathered; and the unparalleled good health we have been blessed with during the past year throughout our settlements.

Let us express the hope and faith, and offer an earnest prayer, that the same Providence that directed our forefathers, more than two centuries since, across an unknown trackless ocean, to plant in the Western World the germ of civil and constitutional freedom, and which directed Washington through all the perils of the American Revolution, will direct and guide the Federal Government through the struggle that now threatens her unity and life, until peace is secured and the majesty of the Constitution and laws are vindicated, and the people of all the world are rejoiced to behold the temple of constitutional liberty, safe, secure, resting upon a basis unmoved and immovable—the affection of the people.

By an act of Congress, on the second day of March, 1861, the territorial government of Dakota was created. By virtue of the provisions of that organic act, you have been chosen by the voters of Dakota to compose the first legislative assembly. To you they have delegated the authority to enact laws necessary for the protection of property, the security of life, and the efficient guarantee of all the social and civil rights, privileges, and immunities pertaining to the citizens under our free constitutional form of government.

It is well for you to remember that you are not legislating alone for today, but also for an indefinite future—not for the few thousand now resident in the territory, but for the tens of thousands who will soon be attracted within our limits. Impress yourself with the responsibility resting upon you, and go forward in your labors in founding a civil structure, with liberal and enlarged views of the duties devolving upon you. In judging correctly of the future, and calculating upon the coming wants and necessities of the territory, it is proper to examine our surroundings, to reflect upon our soil, climate, and the natural resources of the country.

Dakota Territory extends from the 43d to the 49th parallel of north latitude, and from the 97th to the 113th parallel of longitude—embracing an area of country greater in extent than all New England, combined with the great states of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois and Missouri. Occupying the most elevated section of country between the Arctic Ocean and the Gulf of Mexico; forming to a great extent the water shed of the two great basins of North America, the Missouri and Mississippi rivers and the tributaries of Hudson's Bay. Thus within the limits of Dakota are found the sources of rivers running diametrically opposite; those flowing northward reach a region of eternal ice, while those flowing southward pass from the haunts of the grizzly bear and the regions of wild rice, through the cotton fields and the sugar plantations of the southern states until their waters are mingled with the blue waves of the gulf.

The general surface of the country east and north of the Missouri is a beautiful, rich, undulating prairie, free from marsh, swamp or slough, traversed by many streams, and dotted over with innumerable lakes of various sizes, whose wooded margins, and rocky shores, and gravel bottoms, afford the settler the purest of water, and give to the scenery of the territory much of its interest and fascination. West of the Missouri the country is more rolling, and gradually becomes broken, hilly, and finally mountainous as the western limits are reached and terminated by the Rocky Mountains. The mighty Missouri runs through the very heart of our territory, and gives us more than one thousand miles of navigable water course; thus giving us the facility of cheap water transportation, by means of which we can bear away the surplus products of our rich, luxuriant lands to southern markets, and receive in exchange the trade and commerce of all climes and lands. We have, located on the Missouri, Big Sioux, Red River of the North, Vermillion, Dakota (James) and Niobrara rivers, millions and millions of acres of the richest and most productive lands to be found anywhere within the bounds of the national Government. We have combined, the pleasant, salubrious climate of Southern Minnesota, and the fertility of soil of Central Illinois.

The incentive to immigration is so great, and the inducements and advantages so promising, that it is no idle fancy which pictures the towns and cities which are soon to cover and enrich our hills and valleys and river sides. In arriving at a correct estimate of the probable settlement of our territory, it is well to bear in mind some very favorable facts which promise much in the development of our resources and increase of our population. Thermal statistics and experiments prove, that within the limits of our territory are to be found both the climate and soil necessary to produce most successfully the two great leading staples of American agriculture—corn and wheat. We find that starting from Chicago as a point, that the isothermal lines rise to a higher and higher degree of latitude as you go westward. We find that Fort Benton, on the Missouri River, in the extreme northwest part of Dakota, possesses the same mean temperature of Chicago and Albany, N. Y. The corn producing belt of country which runs through Ohio, Indiana and Illinois extends north and west through Iowa, up the Valley of the Missouri, through Dakota. According to Blodgett, the author of a very able and interesting work on the climatology of the United States, the thermal capacity required for the successful cultivation of Indian corn is a mean temperature of 67° for July, and it may go a little beyond 65° for the summer. According to the same authority, the thermal capacity required for the successful cultivation of wheat is a mean temperature from 62 to 65° during the ripening months. Statistics prove that our territory possesses a considerable excess of the temperature required, being beyond 70°. Another fact should be born in mind, that while we are not flooded with the excessive spring rains which often retard the putting in of crops in the states southeast of us, yet we do have in the late spring and early summer months copious showers, which supply vegetation with all the moisture needed for the rapid growth which is characteristic of this region. The capacity of our territory for raising immense herds of cattle, and for the production of large crops of corn, wheat, oats, rye, barley, buckwheat, potatoes, sorghum, melons, fruits and vegetables, demonstrates the ability of our country to sustain a dense population.

Our territory possesses a climate especially conducive to health and longevity. Occupying an elevated section of the country, we are free from the humid, raw, chilly weather often prevailing in the central western states. We have a dry, bracing atmosphere, which gives tone and vigor to the physical system. We have a temperature sufficiently high in July and August to insure the rapid growth and maturity of all our cereal products; yet our hot weather is not continuous enough to engender those malarious diseases, ague, bilious fevers and dysentery, which prevail in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Missouri. What were once the great wheat producing states of the country are becoming less and less so each succeeding year. The uncertainty of the crop discourages its cultivation in those states and the growing demand for shipment to western Europe must be supplied from other sources. I venture the prediction that the wheat growing belt of this continent will yet be found in the valleys of the Red River and Saskatchewan. The day is not distant when the eye, which can now behold only the vast expanse of prairie and the tall, luxuriant grass waving before the wind, will rest gratified and contented upon the farm and workshop, the schoolhouse and church. We should bear in mind that within the last thirty years the great states of Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Missouri have been settled up, and that within twenty years Iowa and Wisconsin have been rescued from the possession of the roaming Indian and subdued to the usages of civilized man. Thus has one generation witnessed an area of country no less than ours, transformed from the hunting ground of the Indian, the scene of the chase and war dance, and converted and divided into six of the most populous and thrifty states of the Union.

Shall we not judge of the future by the past? As regards soil, climate, beautiful uplands, rich prairies, luxuriant bottoms, productive mountain valleys, mineral wealth, navigable rivers upon which to float our cereal products and commercial exchanges, what section of country within the broad confines of our republic is fairer, or lovelier, or richer, or more inviting as the home of the active, intelligent and industrious citizen? Before a generation shall have passed, more than a million of people will be living in the Valley of the Missouri alone. The Pacific Railroad will have been long completed, connecting the two oceans with its iron bands. The trade with India and Japan, the commerce of the opulent and gorgeous East will pass through our borders on its way to the great cities on the Atlantic. By the transit of a world's commerce over 1,000 miles of our territory, we derive incalculable benefit. The experience of 6,000 years and the verification of all history is pointed and conclusive that intelligence, prosperity and opulence are the result of intercourse between nations. Along the great highways of the world, where pass and repass the goods, wares, merchandise, the products, the commodities, and the wealth of nations, there towns and cities spring up, manufactures are established, and all the industrial arts are quickened and encouraged, and from these centers ramify and extend rivulets of business and avenues of wealth.

I congratulate you, gentlemen, as the representatives of the people who are most fortunately and happily located in a portion of this country which possesses within itself all the elements which are necessary to constitute a great, prosperous and powerful state. Our rich alluvial lands will produce the corn, and the broad prairies the nutritious grasses which are ample to feed and support cattle enough to supply every market in the Union. The salt lakes in the northern part of the territory can furnish inexhaustible supplies of the best of salt. The high, rolling prairies south and west of the Missouri seem especially intended for the herding of sheep and the growth of wool.

The falls on the Big Sioux furnish a motive power sufficient to drive all the machinery of the New England mills.

The Black Hills, and the mountain ranges at the sources of the Wind River, Yellowstone and Missouri, are rich beyond conception in mineral resources of coal, copper and iron. The explorations and discoveries at Pike's Peak and on Fraser River, connected with the geological formation of the western part of Dakota, would indicate these facts; but what is more satisfactory, we are already in possession of actual knowledge in relation to the mineral deposits of that region, obtained by the discoveries of missionaries and trappers, who, braving all trials and dangers, have visited that region which has been scarcely marked by the foot print of a white man. With all the elements of power surrounding us, we need but numbers combined with industry, intelligence and virtue, to make Dakota one of the most desirable and potent states of the Government.

Gentlemen, upon the result of your legislative action depends in a great measure the rapidity with which this territory is to be settled up and her mighty resources developed, and her place claimed as one of the bright states which shall emblaze on our national ensign. It is your duty, and I doubt not the result of your labors will be, by the exercise of just, wise and judicious legislative action, to invite and encourage immigration, to stimulate settlement in our midst, and to attract within the limits of our territory thousands of people who each year leave their homes in the older states to seek new homes and participate in the common benefits incident to all new countries. Laying the foundations of government, and erecting thereupon a solid civil structure, beautiful and symmetrical in all its parts, will require united thoughtful consideration, based on all the light you can obtain from an examination of the enactments of the different states and territories of our country. Among the different subjects which will demand your attention not the least will be a system of civil and criminal laws, an educational system; a military system; the character of your country organization; a county and territorial financial system; to the extent of powers proper to be granted to corporations, of a moneyed, mining, manufacturing or railroad character. I trust you will give due deliberation to all your enactments of civil and criminal law.

The peace, quiet and stability of society depend upon the protection and security of property, liberty, and life. In a natural state of society, without any form of government, every man is compelled to rely upon his own individual protection for the maintenance of his rights and the enjoyment of his property, and security of his life. With the organization of society, law and government, every one concedes and gives up a portion of his natural rights, and defers to law and authority for the adjustment of questions and the decisions of claims which otherwise could only be settled by force. Therefore, it is due from the Government to the citizens, that what he has relinquished of his natural rights should be more than compensated in the security of person and property by the guarantee of law. Therefore it becomes your duty to secure to every citizen the peaceful possession and enjoyment of all his rights of property and person; also enact laws which shall deal out prompt punishment to all evil doers and violators of law. Criminal law should not be so harsh and cruel as thereby to defeat itself, but it should be just in its retributions, and severe in proportion to the offense committed. I trust and believe that your record of both civil and criminal law will be such as will commend itself to the approval of an enlightened age and an advanced civilization. I believe in the truthfulness of the remark of one of the most sagacious of our revolutionary statesmen, "that the great hope of a free people was dependent upon her educational and militia systems."

There is no subject more vital to the prosperity and general welfare of the territory, than the subject of education. The virtue, intelligence and public happiness of a people, and all that conduces to the advancement of the prosperity, wealth and power of a country, is intimately associated with, and dependent upon, the development of the educational interest of the state. In communities where truth, virtue, intelligence and knowledge prevail, there crime is rare, and poverty almost unknown. Every dollar of taxes levied for the support of schools lessens, by many dollars, the taxes which would be assessed for the support of prisons and poor houses. If attention to one interest more than another has made Massachusetts the first of the great, rich, proud and powerful commonwealths of the Union, it has been the ever watchful, constant, liberal encouragement and aid given to her educational interest. I recognize the difficulties you must encounter in your efforts to establish a practical and efficient system in our, at present, sparsely settled territory. Let us, at least, take the first steps, and show to all who may be looking to our territory for a future home, that we are not unmindful of the great interests of education and the proper moral and intellectual training of the youth of our land.

Every nation relies more or less upon her militia system for the maintenance of her authority at home, and vindication of her national rights and honor abroad. A free people are and should be ever jealous of a large standing army. Those nations who enjoy a constitutional form of government are more dependent upon their militia than those ruled by arbitrary power. A free people, whose laws and government are the expression and creation of the popular will, are averse to a regular army, which eats up the resources of the industrial classes; they rely chiefly upon the citizen soldier in any emergency which shall give occasion for the use of military force. Holding, as we do, the most advanced outposts of settlements, having a widely extended frontier exposed to the hostile incursions of a savage foe, it is imperative that we institute and cultivate a plain, economical, and thorough militia system, adapted to our situation, and adequate to the necessities of our people.

The slavery question has been an exciting and distracting subject of dispute, of late years, in the territories. I hope we may be free from it. I would recommend to your body that you pass a law prohibiting, for all time to come, in this territory, slavery or involuntary servitude, except for crime. I shall hope to see such a law passed without a dissenting voice. I hope that the free air of Dakota may never be polluted, or her virgin soil pressed by the footprint of a slave. Congress having seen proper to create this territory without exercising her authority in prohibiting slavery, to us, therefore, has devolved the welcome task of recording our approval of the sentiment of Jefferson, when he declared slavery was "a moral, social and political evil." There is a conflict between the principles of freedom and slavery. That conflict has existed from the creation of the human race. There is an eternal antagonism between the principles of freedom and slavery. The constitution of the human heart and human mind makes the conflict inevitable, and sooner or later one or the other must gain the supremacy. Liberty is neither a cheat, a delusion, or a lie, but a vital principle of the human heart, born of the nature of man and the revelation of God—it is eternal and cannot die. Recognizing these self-evident truths, I trust that we shall start right. Let us by a prohibitory enactment express our repugnance of an institution which today convulses the continent, arrays a million of men in arms, interrupts our commerce, suspends business, prostrates trade, and paralyzes all the industrial interests of the country; which has darkened the home, widowed the wife, and made fatherless the children of some of the bravest and noblest on the land, and bequeathed to our children and children's children an untold burden of taxation and debt. In this great and rich territory, possessing extent of country and natural resources sufficient to make an empire, let freedom rule—let this be the home of the white man. Declare by legislative enactment that her labor shall be honored, respected and rewarded. Let us make room in our territory for no privileged class, spurning labor and the laborer—exalted above common sympathies and cares—sacred against vulgar necessities, and scorning honest occupation. Let us pass this law, and then we shall be done with slavery, so far as we have any authority over the question; leaving it where the Constitution has left it, and the fathers of the Constitution left it, with the states where it exists, to be by them regulated as they deem best.

I take this occasion to warn you against falling into the snares of bank men. Too often it has been the case that legislative sanction has been given, in the new territories, to the designs of cunning men, who, unwilling to labor, have endeavored by plausible schemes of finance to put afloat worthless bank paper, which soon depreciates and robs the laboring men of the country. I hope you will turn a deaf ear to all their applications for bank charters, and that you will, to the best of your ability, secure our citizens against the evil of a pernicious paper currency.

Elections in the new territories, of late years, have been so fraudulently conducted that the word "election" has almost become, in the territories, a synonym of fraud, deception and corruption. Upon the purity of the elective franchise rests the basis of our Government. I trust that you will enact a stringent election law, one which shall secure to our people immunity from fraud.

At the present time we are suffering inconvenience for the various departments of our territorial government, but they are but temporary. I have no doubt but what Congress, with her accustomed liberality and fostering care to her territories, will make provision by appropriating as liberal an amount as the state of the treasury will justify, for the purpose of erecting buildings for the use of the various departments. While I think it is very necessary these should be made, it may be neglected by the general Government, unless we bring them to the notice of Congress, and show the prosperity and the advantages to be received by the territory and the Government in return for the expense. It would seem to me very proper that the Legislative Assembly should memorialize Congress on the subject of an appropriation for military roads, and for a geological survey of the territory, and a Pacific railroad. There should be a military road from the mouth of the Big Sioux to Fort Randall, and from Randall to Fort Laramie; also one from the Red River of the North to the Missouri. Every man who is acquainted with the country west of the Missouri is aware of the fact that Fort Randall should be the distributing military post west of the Missouri and north of the Kansas River. Thousands and tens of thousands could and would be saved to the treasury by making Fort Randall, instead of Fort Leavenworth, the distributing post for supplying Laramie and the military posts in Utah. There would be thus saved to the Government the expense of more than three hundred miles land transportation. No better road can be found to Laramie than one running along the Niobrara River. As we have good water communication from St. Louis to Randall, goods and army stores would be delivered at Randall at but a trifling cost more than the Government pays for freight to Leavenworth. It is only necessary that this matter be brought to the attention of Congress to have the change effected. The economy of the change, in connection with the present excessive demands on the treasury, is an imperative reason why it should be done promptly, and at once.

I would recommend that you memorialize Congress on the subject of the Pacific Railroad. The only route to the Pacific, along the line of which the country is capable of sustaining a continuous and prosperous settlement, is through this territory. By any other route hundreds of miles of the railroad must pass through a barren, sterile country, not susceptible of settlement. The cost of construction of such parts of a railroad would necessitate an immense outlay in the original cost, as would also the annual expense of repairs. Through Dakota is found the most direct route; one easy and cheap of construction, and the character of the country through which the road would pass insures a rapid and prosperous settlement along the whole line. A direct route from New York City along the shores of the lakes, would pass through Chicago, Dubuque and Sioux City, up the Valley of the Missouri to the mouth of the Niobrara, and then up the Valley of the Niobrara to the South Pass. Chicago and Dubuque must extend the hand of welcome to us, and cooperate with us in securing the early completion of a railroad to the territory, if they would avail themselves of the trade of the tens of thousands who will soon occupy the Valley of the Missouri. Otherwise our trade and travel will seek New Ulm and Mankato for an outlet, and St. Paul as the center of the trade and commerce of the territory. St. Paul being only 200 miles distant from the Town of Sioux Falls, situated near the east line of the territory.

The propriety of a geological survey of the territory has already been brought to the notice of the Government in a very able manner by our efficient surveyor, Gen. George D. Hill, Esquire. Feeling a great interest in this survey, I cannot refrain from urging on you that you shall cooperate in securing from Congress a liberal appropriation for that purpose. I am confident that there is, west of the Missouri River, untold wealth in the mineral resources of Dakota Territory. The recorded opinion of some of the most eminent geologists in the United States, and information gathered from missionaries and trappers who have visited that part of the country confirm that belief. Every dollar appropriated will be returned a hundred fold by the addition to our population, the increase of business and the amount of land sold.

I hope you will memorialize Congress upon the subject of the Homestead Law and urge its immediate passage. That question is no longer an open one and subject to debate. The American people have declared almost unanimously in favor of the justice, wisdom and necessity of such a law—the grant of 160 acres of land to every actual settler who is willing to go out on the public lands and settle upon and occupy the same. If such a bill fails to become a law at the present session of Congress, it can only be by the neglect of those who are the most vitally interested in its enactment. Agriculture being for some time to come the leading interest in our territory I should deem it proper in you to give to that interest the benefit, fostering care and protection of wise legislation. Proper laws should be passed to prevent, as far as possible, those extensive prairie fires which sweep over the country in the fall months, and have destroyed crops and fences, and houses, and have injured to a great extent the young timber, which is so rapidly growing along all our streams. If these fires can be prevented, a few years will suffice to make Dakota a well timbered country. Territorial roads should be surveyed and established by law at an early day between the different towns and settlements by the most direct and eligible routes. Proper attention to this will secure our settlers from much trouble and annoyance which otherwise will hereafter arise upon the location of roads at a later day.

Having within our territory a large Indian population, it would seem desirable that you should enact some law regulating intercourse between our citizens and the different tribes. As our citizens are excluded from going upon the Indian land without a permit, it would seem to be just that the Indians should not be allowed to roam at will over the ceded lands. I believe that all Indians should be restricted to the uncaded lands and their reservations. I believe that such a requirement would conduce to the peace and quiet of the territory, and free the settlers from the annoyance of these straggling Indians who are wandering about the country. Such an exclusion from the public lands would do away with the opportunity which now tempts bad white men to carry on an iniquitous liquor traffic with the Indians.

I would recommend to you that a law be passed securing to every family freedom from execution and sale of their homestead; if resident in the country, a house and so many acres as your wisdom may determine. I believe that such a law is eminently just and proper. I would have every man know, and especially every wife and child feel, that there was one spot on earth that they could call home; one place that the cruel and remorseless creditor could not tread upon; that one fireside was sacred, and that one roof should shelter the innocent and unfortunate. I hope never in Dakota to see the harsh creditor darken the door and drive from the home the wife, or it might be the widow and her children, because, forsooth, he could, in his wily brain and bloodless heart, overreach in trade the honest but improvident husband and father.

The vast expense of the Federal Government incurred in the prosecution of the war, will necessarily impose upon all the people of this country a burden of taxation hitherto unknown in our Government. As the expenses of the executive, judicial and legislative departments of our Government are defrayed by Congress, with the exception of our proportion of the war tax, the taxes levied upon our people should be very light. I hope that the form of our county organization, and the powers granted to the county authorities for the levying of taxes, will be so guarded as to confine them to the strictest economy consistent with efficiency. The great error committed in other territories has been the disposition to incur debt, and to issue territorial warrants and county orders. Sound public policy forbids such a system of finance. A depreciated currency increases the price paid, and the enhanced price necessitates an additional issue, which again contributes to lower the county or territorial credit. Our proportion of the war tax our people will cheerfully pay. There being as yet no titles to real estate in this territory—no land office having as yet been opened—much is left your body to decide as to the proper system of taxation to adopt.

I would recommend the passage of a law which shall secure to every citizen of Dakota, who shall volunteer to go into the service of the United States, upon the requisition of the War Department, his right to vote for all territorial, legislative and county officers, upon our election day. I would not have his patriotism be the means of depriving him of the proudest right of the citizen—the enjoyment of the elective franchise. This proposition is so plainly just that it need only be suggested to be approved.

I take this occasion to express my gratification at the prompt response made by our loyal citizens to the requisition made by the War Department upon the executive of Dakota for volunteers to garrison Fort Randall, and thus relieve the regulars who were stationed there, who were needed South to aid in crushing this most accursed rebellion. In a few weeks the requisition was filled, and we now have a volunteer force of which we have just reason to be proud. Every citizen felt it a privilege that Dakota, in common with her sister States, should be allowed to contribute her mite to aid the Federal Government in this, the darkest day of her life. If the exigencies of the war should demand it, I believe that every male citizen within our limits would abandon the field and workshop, and with his musket upon his shoulder would rush to the tented field to the rescue of the Constitution. That, I trust, will not be necessary. I believe the dawn of a better and brighter day is upon us. This most infamous rebellion, born and bred of an aggressive, domineering interest, must die—must perish, that faith in the justice of God shall be vindicated. He is but a superficial observer of political events, who does not recognize in the primary cause of this wicked rebellion, the institution of slavery. Can it be possible that in the providence of God, an institution founded in error, injustice and despotism, shall become the instrument for the destruction of a government, the wisest and best ever framed by the inventive genius of man? I cannot believe so. I recognize in the darkness that now clouds our beloved country, and the heavy hand that presses upon her, the inscrutable workings of a Divine Providence “who doeth all things well.” I believe that we shall come out of this rebellion better, purer and stronger—that the American Union will continue to move upward and onward in her destined path in the history of the world. I have never entertained any fear of the disruption of our Government, the division of our Union, and the overthrow of the Constitution. A glance at the map of North America should satisfy anyone that nature made this country for one people to dwell in, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Lakes of the North to the Gulf of the South. The great Northwest, the region of the lakes, and the valleys of the Mississippi and the Missouri, whose waters divide and seek the ocean, to the East through the chains of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence, to the South through the Mississippi and the Gulf of Mexico, forbids a division. The millions who live upon the Upper Mississippi and its tributaries can never consent to a division of the Union. To them an imperative political and commercial necessity forbids a division. To allow the mouth of the Mississippi to belong to a foreign power, would be to subject ourselves to trouble and annoyance, and all our commerce to unjust and arbitrary taxation. An absolute, overwhelming necessity compels us to remain one people—one nation—with the flag of our fathers floating over every state. Six hundred thousand free-men are today in martial array—citizen soldiers—not an unwilling conscript among them all—a prouder army than Napoleon, in the plenitude of his power, ever reviewed; each and every man crying aloud to be led on to battle and to victory. The men composing that army are men of peace, who prefer the peaceful walks of life, who love to tread in the paths of agriculture, the mechanic arts, trade and commerce; but they are men who, when treason opened its batteries upon Sumter and its little band of devoted men, inspired by the noblest impulses which are implanted in the human heart, bid farewell to home and its comforts, to father and mother, wife and children, and rushed to the field with willing hearts and strong arms, offering all upon the altar of their country, ready to pour out their blood like water, and yield their lives, if need be, in defense of the supremacy of law and the Constitution. With such an army, engaged in such a cause, who can doubt the final result? Though they were not the first to seek the arbitrament of the sword, they will be the last to leave it. Though they did not provoke or commence the conflict, they will be the last to abandon it. Let the war be prosecuted vigorously and in deadly earnest, with but one object in view, the security of the country, the preservation of the Union, and the assertion and supremacy of the Constitution, over every foot of our widely extended domain. Let nothing cramp or hamper the noble efforts of our army; what soever stands in the way of success let it be trampled under foot. Let us commit no blunder by placing any interest before or above the Union, least of all that interest which is solely and entirely responsible for the rebellion which today convulses the nation. If slavery stands in the way of a successful subjugation of this hellish rebellion, let slavery die. If in the providence of God it should come to pass that through the efforts for the preservation of constitutional liberty, the institution of human slavery should be blotted out of existence, no lover of humanity, civilization, and Christianity, will drop a tear over its grave.

The events of the last forty days have given heart and hope to the whole country. The advent of Secretary Stanton into the War Department, with the declaration that the business of the army was “to attack, pursue, and destroy the rebellious enemy,” electrified the nation. The late glorious victories in Kentucky, Tennessee, North Carolina and Missouri, have made good the declaration. Manassas and Columbus are evacuated—the two great strongholds of the enemy. This is due to the new vigor infused into the War Department by the act of the President in placing in that department a man of will and purpose. Upon the accession of Stanton into the war office, a cabinet meeting was called. The country had furnished 600,000 men, and $6,000,000 of money; and was clamorous and impatient for an advance. The zeal and patriotism of the people were likely to become paralyzed unless something was done to justify the immense outlay of men and money. The President, rising with the occasion, asserting his rights and duties as commander-in-chief of the army and navy, having with his far sighted and sure footed judgment, declared that the backbone of the enemy was to be broken by a vigorous advance in the West, and that the just expectations of the people should be fulfilled; Abraham Lincoln directed that Buell and Grant and McClernand and Curtis should advance, and make good the declaration of Stanton that the business of the army was “to attack, pursue, and destroy the rebellious enemy.” The terrible energy of those armies, drawn from the bone and sinew of the West, led by Generals Grant, McClernand, Curtis and Buell, have not only won the most fiercely contested battle fields, but have compelled the evacuation of Columbus and Manassas, without the sacrifice of a life. We already see the beginning of the end. The haughty and rebellious enemy have been driven at the point of the bayonet, from behind their own chosen and well fortified entrenchments.

These victories do not prove that the men of one section are any better or braver than those of a different section of our common country; but it proves "that he is thrice armed that hath his quarrel just;" it evidences that the ingrate, and wicked, and rebellious citizens, seeking to destroy the priceless legacy of constitutional liberty, bequeathed by Washington and his noble compatriots, cannot withstand, on the battle field, the indomitable will and determined valor of the citizen, who, giving his life to his country and his soul to God, fights to "preserve, protect and defend" that rich political inheritance, purchased by the struggles of our fathers on the bloody fields of Trenton, Monmouth, Saratoga and Yorktown. The glorious victory won by the Northwest—the men of Illinois aided by their fellow soldiers of Iowa and Indiana and other western states, have won imperishable honor. The attack and capture of Fort Donelson is the most brilliant military victory ever won on the American continent. To every officer and soldier of that gallant army, the whole American people owe a lasting debt of gratitude, and they will ever live in their hearts. This victory has given us possession of the state which holds the honored remains of the great chieftain who so heartily hated and despised this cursed heresy of secession. Standing by the grave of Jackson, may our brave soldiers renew their faith and redouble their will, and swear "by the Eternal," secession shall die.

Andrew Johnson, the first of patriots and most courageous of men, who, in the darkest hour and amid the thickest gloom, when reverses attended our arms, and hope almost fled the stoutest heart, he faltered not—despaired not—proscribed and exiled from his home for months by the hell-hounds of secession, today he revisits his home, and stands upon the soil of Tennessee with the Stars and Stripes floating over the capital. Let the energy of the last sixty days continue—as it will continue—and a few months will witness the end of this monstrous and stupendous slaveholders' rebellion.

Gentlemen I trust that when your labors are over and you shall have passed away from the field of legislative action, that those who shall come after you may remember you as not unmindful of the responsibilities imposed upon you. It is well you should bear in mind the age in which you live, and the nation of which you are a part. Let your memories run back a little over two centuries, and there is present before you a small band of refugees, hated, despised, and oppressed, about to set sail upon an angry sea, seeking a home in the unknown western world, bearing with them the germ of civil and religious liberty, which today has expanded until it has become the first nation of the world.

Let your imagination run forward only half a century, and you behold the American Union dictating the law to all nations. You behold her without a parallel in the history of nations; first in the arts and sciences, in religion and literature, in peace and arms, the pride of all governments, the hope of the oppressed, the asylum of the refugee, a nation kind to the weak, firm to the strong; a republic which will stand unmoved amidst the throes of revolutions, while thrones totter and empires pass away; beautiful as Cytherea as she arose from the flashing foam of the Ægean; more powerful than Rome in the days of the Caesars, or France under the imperial sway of Napoleon; a government with a hundred millions of loyal subjects, carrying the beneficent influence of her arts and her civilization upon the wings of her commerce, over every sea and ocean, to every continent and isle which smile beneath the genial rays of the sun.

In conclusion, allow me to assure you that it will be my endeavor to cordially, earnestly and faithfully cooperate with you in the enactment of all laws which your wisdom may suggest, which shall prove kind in their influence, and tend to advance the honor and greatness and glory of Dakota.

Yankton, Dakota Territory.

Executive Department, March 17, 1862.

THE BIG SIOUX BIG BEND

The Missouri River is noted for its sinuosities, some of them most remarkable because the river seems to have chosen for its channel the very longest way round a neck of land when it apparently could have saved many miles by cutting "across lots." Such a great bend existed a short distance above the mouth of the Big Sioux River, which resembled somewhat a colossal letter S. It was fifteen miles around the bend and the flood of 1867 cut through the narrowest part, a distance of fifty yards and made a new navigable channel for the river, which was greatly appreciated by the steamboat people, because it practically shortened the river fifteen miles. The land thus segregated was occupied but it was many years before the question was settled as to whether Nebraska or Dakota had jurisdiction over it and it required an assault with intent to kill case to determine the matter. The sheriff of Union County went there to serve a legal process and was met by armed resistance, which culminated in a fight. The sheriff was seriously wounded. The offender was subsequently arrested and held to answer under a decision of the Dakota court that he had committed his offense in Dakota.

CHAPTER XXI

LEGISLATURE CONTINUED—GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE WELL RECEIVED—THE CHIPPEWA INDIANS AND RED RIVER—JAMES M'FETRIDGE FROM PEMBINA—LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEES—THE CAPITAL CONTEST—YANKTON SECURES THE PRIZE—SPEAKER PINNEY RESIGNS; TIERNON SUCCEEDS HIM—SOLDIERS IN THE HOUSE; GREAT INDIGNATION—AN UNPLEASANT EPISODE—BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES OF FIRST MEMBERS AND OFFICERS—MISSOURI RIVER OVERFLOW—OLD SETTLERS' HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION—EPISCOPAL MISSION ESTABLISHED BY REV. MELANCTHON HOYT.

The governor's message struck a responsive chord in the breasts of the members of both council and House. The former body, by resolution ordered 1,500 copies printed in the English language, 300 in Norwegian and 200 in German; while the House ordered 1,200 copies all told, 500 in English, 300 in Norwegian, 200 in French, and 200 in German.

James McFetridge, of Pembina, through Councilman Brookings, presented a petition on the eighth day of the session, claiming the seat occupied by said Brookings and asking the council to appoint a committee to investigate his claims. The petition was referred to the Committee on Elections from which committee Mr. Brookings had resigned. This petition received no further direct attention, and was not reported from the committee, it being the conviction of a majority that the Red River region was country still belonging to the Chippewa Indians, and therefore the whites residing there could not legally exercise the elective franchise. But the Legislature passed a suitable memorial praying that a treaty of cession be made with the Indian owners; and also in anticipation of a treaty being made during the succeeding year, created a legislative district in the country and apportioned to it a councilman and two members of the House. The standing committees of the House were composed of the members hereafter named:

Privileges and Elections—Messrs. Tiernon, Wallace and Wood. Ways & Means—Messrs. Armstrong, Donaldson and McBride. Judiciary—Armstrong, Puett and Donaldson. Agriculture and Manufactures—McBride, Maloney and Burgess. Military Affairs—Stanage, Waldron and Maloney. Internal Corporations—Puett, Armstrong and McBride. Engrossed and Enrolled Bills—Puett and Donaldson. Counties—Tiernon, Wallace and Maloney. Corporations—Puett, Armstrong and Jacobson. Library—Waldron, Tiernon and Burgess. Common Schools, Universities and Colleges—Puett, Wallace and Jacobson. Federal Relations—Waldron, Wood and Tiernon.

In the council the standing committees were thus made up: Judiciary—Messrs. Bramble, Stutsman and Boyle. Education—Boyle, Betts and Brookings. Military Affairs—Gregory, Brookings and Doyle. Incorporations—Deuel, Boyle and Stutsman. Highways, Bridges and Ferries—Bramble, Deuel and Gregory. Public Printing—Stutsman, Bramble and Cole. Counties—Cole, Deuel and Betts. Territorial Affairs—Bramble, Stutsman and Cole. Agriculture—Betts, Brookings and Boyle. Expenditures—Boyle, Betts and Brookings. Finances—Stutsman, Deuel and Betts. Engrossed and Enrolled Bills—Brookings and Betts. Federal Relations—Gregory, Stutsman and Deuel.

The location of the seat of government of the territory was the bone of contention during the early part of this session, and not a great deal was done in the way of law-making until that prize was allotted. Yankton and Vermillion were the rival candidates, and it was generally understood by the Yankton people that the matter had been satisfactorily adjusted in favor of Yankton at the time the Legislature organized by the distribution of the principal honors; but the subsequent proceedings did not justify this view of the question unless we inferentially charge one or more of the parties to the compact with double dealing. It was understood that Mr. Pinney was to give Yankton his support in return for the speakership, but the Legislature was not a week old when it became manifest that he was not friendly to Yankton's ambition, and the Yankton members were very much disturbed. The House was nearly equally divided on the capital matter. Out of the thirteen votes there were four members from the Vermillion and West Vermillion district and it required but three more to give them a majority. Waldron, of Minnehaha and Donaldson, of Pembina, were against Yankton and would vote for Vermillion but were presumed to be laboring to prevent a location at this session, thus giving Sioux Falls a future opportunity. Mr. Pinney held the balance of power. In general ability he was the peer of any member and in fertility of resource he was more than a match for any one of them. He was that sort of man in a convention or Legislature that the others would watch with apprehension of mischief. A harmless motion to adjourn from him would be accepted by half the members as portending a plot. As Vermillion had been an outspoken candidate for the capital it is not to be presumed that the members from the East Vermillion and West Vermillion districts had given any assurance that they would support Yankton but Mr. Pinney was from Bon Homme, and Bon Homme had been given the position of honor and double-pay of speaker of the House and president of the council, and this would not have been done in the absence of any understanding regarding the capital location.

Hugh Donaldson, who had been detained on his way from the Red River district reached Yankton and was sworn in on Friday, the fifth day of the session.

In the council on the eleventh day of the session Mr. Stutsman introduced a bill "to locate the seat of government of Dakota Territory" at Yankton. It was read twice, referred to the Committee on Territorial Affairs, reported favorably on the thirteenth day and taken up for third reading when Mr. Boyle moved an amendment to strike out "Yankton" and insert "Vermillion." The amendment was lost and the bill was then passed by the following vote: For the bill Messrs. Bramble, Brookings, Cole, Stutsman and Mr. President. Against, Messrs. Boyle and Betts, of Vermillion. Deuel and Gregory did not vote. The bill was transmitted to the House, where on the seventeenth day of the session it was called up by Mr. Armstrong, and laid on the table, and on the day following it was considered in committee of the whole, with Mr. Puett in the chair, when Mr. Pinney moved an amendment to strike out "Yankton" and insert "Bon Homme" which was lost by a vote of five to eight—Donaldson, Puett, Waldron, Wood and Pinney voted for the amendment and Armstrong, Burgess, Jacobson, McBride, Maloney, Stanage, Tiernon and Wallace voting against it. Pinney then moved to strike out "Yankton" and insert "Vermillion" which was adopted, the vote being seven to six—as follows: For the amendment, Burgess, Donaldson, Jacobson, Puett, Waldron, Wood and Pinney. Negative—Armstrong, McBride, Maloney, Stanage, Tiernon and Wallace. The committee rose, but did not report, and the next day Armstrong called the matter up, and moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Counties with instructions to strike out "Vermillion" and insert "Yankton."

The chair ruled that the motion to instruct violated the rules. Mr. Armstrong appealed and the House sustained the appeal by a vote of ten to three, Messrs. Armstrong, Burgess, Jacobson, McBride, Maloney, Stanage, Tiernon, Wallace, Wood and the Speaker Pinney voting to sustain the appeal. While Donaldson, Puett and Waldron voted in the negative. This vote was a puzzler, and the anti-Yankton men moved to adjourn until Monday, which motion was lost. Donaldson, Puett and Waldron became somewhat active and made numerous efforts to stay any further vote on the bill, but the House finally voted, nine to four, to refer the bill to the Committee on Counties. The affirmative votes were Armstrong, Burgess, Jacobson, McBride, Maloney, Stanage, Tiernon, Wallace and Wood. Negative, Donaldson, Puett, Waldron and Pinney. The next day, Tiernon, chairman of the Committee on Counties, presented a report on the bill, which the speaker ruled out of order and in violation of the rules. Armstrong moved a suspension of the rules and the reception of the report, which the chair ruled out of order, and Waldron asked for the enforcement of the rules. After a heated discussion at the same daily session the bill was taken up and passed as amended, by inserting "Vermillion" in place of "Yankton." The vote on its final passage being unanimous. The bill was now returned to the council, where it was immediately considered by the council which by a vote of six to two refused to concur in the House amendment, and instructed its secretary to notify the House immediately of its action. This was done; and there appears to have been a radical change in the sentiment of the House members during the time the bill was in the hands of the council, for on its return Armstrong moved that the House recede from its amendment to the bill which motion was supported by all except Puett and Waldron. The bill was then passed as it came from the council originally, by a vote of ten to one. Messrs. Armstrong, Burgess, Donaldson, Jacobson, McBride, Maloney, Stanage, Tiernon, Wallace, Wood and the speaker voting affirmatively—eleven. Waldron did not vote, and Puett voted in the negative.

During the session excitement was at fever-heat, and the lobby was packed with spectators. Early in the proceedings a body of United States troops from Company A, Dakota Cavalry with muskets entered the hall and marched to the speaker's stand where they remained during the session. Their commander, Lieutenant Plughoff stated that they came on the order of the governor by request of Speaker Pinney to prevent riot and disorder. Great indignation was created by this demonstration and it was the subject of subsequent investigation by both the council and House.

These final proceedings on the capital bill took place on Saturday, the twentieth day of the session; the bill was promptly approved by the governor the following Tuesday, April 8th, and Yankton was "out of the woods." Mr. Pinney's singular course on this bill was never satisfactorily explained. He was a young man of towering ambition and now aspired to leadership in the republican party. He had been mainly instrumental in the movement of 1861 by which Bell was nominated for delegate to Congress at the republican convention at Vermillion, a result it was claimed that Pinney was not apprehending, desiring the nomination himself. Another delegate election was to be held in 1862; Governor Jayne was coming to the front as a candidate and was supported by the Yankton republicans. Pinney's course would indicate a purpose to popularize himself with the anti-Yankton sentiment and by advising the sending of troops to the House he must have expected that it would create a sentiment of hostility toward Governor Jayne throughout the territory, and the governor's immediate and frank statement that Pinney, as speaker, had requested the troops to prevent riot and disorder, was all that saved him from popular obloquy. Pinney, with all his remarkable mental qualities, was inclined to be erratic.

In this matter it would appear that he had built his plan upon a shaky foundation for it all went to pieces in an hour, and even the Vermillion representatives, except Puett gave their support to Yankton. But there must be a sequel to this trouble and it came out the day after the capital bill was approved. Immediately after the House assembled on that day the clerk read the following communication:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives

Reasons which are quite satisfactory to myself prompt me to resign the office of speaker of this House, and in tendering my resignation, I wish to offer the members of this House very many thanks for the honor which they conferred upon me by electing me the office without a dissenting voice. Hoping that you will be able to agree upon my successor, you will confer a favor upon me by accepting this resignation without hesitation or delay, I subscribe myself,

Your obedient servant,
GEO. M. PINNEY.

On the motion of Mr. Armstrong the resignation was accepted and Mr. Pinney then vacated the chair, took the floor and nominated John L. Tiernon, Fort Randall, for speaker. Tiernon was elected by an unanimous vote, and there was peace in the House for the remainder of the session.

The law locating capital at Yankton was in the words following:

An Act to Locate the Seat of Government of Dakota Territory.

Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota:

Section 1. That the seat of government of the Territory of Dakota be, and the same is hereby located and established, in a central part of the town of Yankton, on section eighteen (18) in township ninety-three (93) north range fifty-five (55) west of the fifth principal meridian, in the County of Yankton.

Sec. 2. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and approval by the governor.

Approved, April 8, 1862.

W. JAYNE, Governor.

As an explanation of the final settlement of the capital in favor of Yankton and the summary manner in which it was finally disposed of, the reader's attention is invited to the passage of a bill locating the territorial university at Vermillion and the territorial penitentiary at Bon Homme, together with memorials praying Congress for a grant of lands for both institutions. The generations of that day no doubt failed to realize how pernicious their example would become, for many years later the bonds for an agricultural college at Brookings were voted and the capital removed from Yankton to Bismarck at the same session of the Legislative Assembly.

The employment of United States troops as a measure of precaution to prevent serious trouble in the House aroused great indignation. It was looked upon as a despotic attempt to overawe the members of the House and coerce them in their official action and as the responsibility for such an extraordinary exercise of authority was not definitely known and fixed, Mr. Stutsman presented a resolution to the council requesting the appointment of a committee "to call on the governor" and request his reasons for placing an armed body "of soldiers in representative hall." Stutsman, Cole and Deuel were appointed the committee and performed their duty without delay. The next day this committee reported as follows:

Mr. President:

Your special committee appointed with instructions to call on his excellency, the governor, and demand his reason for placing an armed body of troops in the representative hall yesterday, while the House was in session, beg leave to report that we called upon the governor, and after presenting the resolution of the council, received a verbal statement of facts about to the following effect: One Geo. M. Pinney, speaker of the House, represented to the governor, verbally and in writing, that there was imminent danger of the peace and quiet of the House being disturbed by persons in and out of the House, and said Pinney demanded protection of the governor. In compliance with said demand, his excellency issued an order to Lieutenant Plughoff, a copy of which is hereto attached and made a part of this report. After a full examination of all the facts in our possession your committee believe that by false representations made by said Pinney and others, the governor, with the best intentions, did an unnecessary act, thereby offering an insult to the representatives of the people, to the citizens of Yankton and to the territory at large. And your committee believe that the said order of the governor and the scandal thereby created, were wholly occasioned by the false and slanderous representations of said Pinney and others. All of which is respectfully submitted.

Yankton, Dakota Territory,
Executive Office, April 7, 1862.

E. STUTSMAN,
A. COLE,
J. DEUEL, Committee.

Lieutenant Plughoff,

Commanding Dakota Cavalry.

Sir:—I have been informed by a written communication received from Hon. Geo. M. Pinney, speaker of the House of Representatives, that from threats and representations received from reliable sources, that he fears that the business of the House will be interrupted by violence, and he calls on me for force to protect the House in the lawful pursuit of its duties. You are directed to proceed to the hall of the House tomorrow morning, at half past 8 o'clock A. M., with twenty men, for the purpose of protecting the House while in the peaceful pursuit of its business, from violence. It will be your duty to aid the speaker in preserving order, and to arrest any person violating the peace, and quiet, and decorum, of that body.

I am, very respectfully,

WM. JAYNE, Governor.

Commander in Chief Dakota Militia.

No further action was taken by the council.

The feeling of the Vermillion councilmen over their defeat in the capital matter led to a great deal of acrimonious discussion among members and others outside the legislative session. There was one occasion at a dinner party at the Ash Hotel when Councilman Boyle, the Vermillion champion, and Councilman Stutsman, who was Yankton's leader, had some hot words. Stutsman was crippled from birth but he was every inch a fighter and amply able to take care of himself if he could get his hands on an antagonist. Something like the lie passed. Boyle seized the ketchup bottle and flung it at Stutsman's head, narrowly missing him. "Stuts" retaliated with a fusillade of tumblers, cups and the skeleton of a fowl that had contributed to the feast. The combatants then flung themselves forward across the table for a finish fight, which might have resulted seriously had not friends interfered and led the enraged gentlemen out into the air by different exits and walked them around until their ardor for a fight had time to cool, which it did, and they soon after joined hands in token of forgiveness and forgetfulness.

Antoine Robeart's saloon was the rendezvous not alone of the merry-makers but of the statesmen with important matters of state to discuss; of politicians who had plots to lay and plans to make; it was a meeting ground for all classes, and reveling in a mild way was nightly witnessed within its walls, where songs were sung and speeches were made and stories related, and the news was discussed. It was quite a center of interest at all times and especially during the Legislature of March, 1862, although as a rule the law makers of Dakota from first to last, as they appeared at Yankton, were not immoderate drinking men, and we cannot recall an instance of the intoxication of a member of either body during the session of any Legislature that met at Yankton covering a period of twenty-one years. It is more than probable that Antoine's attractive hall would have been less visited had there been other places, as there were later, for legislators and lobbyists to get together. In connection with Robeart's place an incident occurred during the pendency of the capitol fight that deserves mention. A large party of gentlemen had retired to the rear room of the saloon to discuss the situation. Suddenly the window, opening upon Third Street, flew up and Speaker Pinney popped out as though there had been a force behind him, and started down the street at a gait that was faster than a walk and slower than a run. Behind him pursued another member of the Legislature, and behind this member was Robeart swinging his arms furiously and behaving like a person very highly enraged. Pinney walked briskly across Broadway, and as he went along drew a pistol from a pocket. When he reached the east side of the street he stopped short and allowed the others to overtake him. Observing a remarkable change in the manner of the two pursuers when they reached Pinney's side, indicating that their belligerent ardor had moderated, it was evident that they had seen the weapon in Pinney's hand, and it was fortunate for both parties that they did not crowd him, for his subsequent career in Montana proved him a man of nerve who would use his gun if occasion called for it. The conversation that followed was not intelligible to parties who had witnessed the affair, but the gestures made by the pursuers were not belligerent, nor was their posture one that meditated assault.

Pinney shot and killed a former lieutenant governor of Wisconsin, named Beall, of Helena, Montana, a few years later, an account of which appears elsewhere; which would justify the assumption that he had decided to use his weapon on this occasion, and would have done so had there been sufficient provocation.

The first Legislature adjourned on the 16th day of May after a session of sixty days. It had enacted a body of very good laws, including criminal, civil, justice and probate codes; had defined the boundaries of the counties of Yankton, Clay, Cole (now Union), Bon Homme, Charles Mix and Brughier (now Buffalo), also Jayne and Hutchinson counties on James River; also Lincoln, Minnehaha and Brookings counties on the Big Sioux, and Deuel County east of Lake Kampeska; also Todd and Gregory counties, west of the Missouri and north of the Niobrara; also Cheyenne, Stevens, Chippewa and Kittson counties in the valley of the Red River of the North. In some cases like that of Yankton the county seat was located in the act, and in others provision was made for voting on the question, which was done in Cole County; an act to provide for locating county seats was passed; a number of territorial roads were authorized and a score or more of ferry charters granted; three private divorce bills were passed, and a general divorce law; also a good common school law, revenue, election and militia laws. There was only a slight change in the apportionment of members of the Legislature; this was an act giving to the Red River country one councilman and two house members. A law fixed the time of the annual election on the first Monday of September, and the time of the meeting of the Legislature on the first Monday of December. Nearly every legitimate subject was covered by various enactments, and the general sentiment was that the legislative body had acquitted itself very creditably in covering the field of necessary legislation so thoroughly. When the time came for adjournment the best feeling prevailed. All the unfriendliness occasioned by the capitol contest had apparently disappeared and the members sought their homes impressed with a conviction that they deserved to have it said of them: "Well done, good and faithful servants." And after a lapse of half a century one can find little unfriendly criticism of the work of this first session.

There was a third house organized during the week following the regular organization of the Legislature, with Capt. F. M. Ziebach as squatter governor, and James Tufts, speaker. (Governor Ziebach takes his title from this incident.) Ordinarily a matter of this kind would be deemed of very small importance, but for Yankton at that time, it was everything in the way of social entertainment, for fortunately its meetings were genuine feasts of wit and wisdom. With the exception of two or three social dances, the third house was the only public entertainment Yankton could offer.

The hotel and boarding house accommodations combined were severely taxed to accommodate the legislative members, officers, the military, the lobby and the traveling public, so that the ladies of the territory whose husbands were connected with the Legislature could find no place suitable to reside in had they been disposed to remain at Yankton during the legislative session. The capital was not therefore a very attractive place socially during the first or second session, and many improvements and plans that would have added largely to the attractions of the town were necessarily abandoned and undeveloped during the summer of 1862, because of the serious character of the Indian troubles. This is to be regretted because of the opportunity lost to the pioneer ladies of the territory to meet and become acquainted, and to make the acquaintance of the members of the Legislature, who were then emerging from comparative obscurity into a larger field where many of them were destined to become conspicuous in territorial affairs, wielding a strong influence in the arena of politics. To an intelligent and observing lady, a season at the capital in that pioneer day would have afforded her much enjoyment and probably embellished her memory with a fund of recollections regarding the notable people she had met during her sojourn, and how they appeared to her as promising an eminent future, and a score of incidents which in her later years she could narrate to her children and friends to their great delight and entertainment. It is to be regretted that Yankton at that time was not better prepared to fulfill its functions as host, and thus have preserved to posterity, through the storehouse of many memories, a thousand incidents that after generations would have appreciated. All this is lost, like the rose that blossomed in the desert and wasted its sweetness there.

There had been a great deal of wintry weather during the session. An unusual amount of snow had fallen and immense drifts had accumulated in places and were still visible when the Legislature adjourned. When the ice broke in the Missouri that spring, a gorge was formed in the big bend below the mouth of James River, backing the water up the stream and overflowing the bottom lands between Yankton and Vermillion and below; the overflow extending to the Big Sioux. In many places the sheet of water was twelve miles wide, stretching across from the Nebraska bluffs to the Dakota highlands. The settlers on the bottom hurriedly sought refuge on the highland, removing their household effects and live stock. The water finally broke over the Missouri bank between Picotte Street and the Rhine Creek at Yankton, swept across to the valley of the James, covering the low lands and forming a vast lake ten miles broad by thirty miles long. Travel between Yankton and Sioux City was confined to row boats and the mails were carried in small skiffs. Parties who patronized the boats followed the stage route as near as practicable, and enjoyed themselves spearing catfish along the way, that weighed from twelve to thirty pounds each, if they told the truth about it. The Greenway Ferry was used as a freight boat during an emergency, between Yankton and Vermillion, and landed its freight on the O. B. Wheeler farm, now Major Hanson's sightly "Prospect Place" two miles below town. The inundation continued three weeks, and the Indians declared that it far surpassed any of the overflows that had occurred during their generation. It may be well to mention that while this overflow practically covered the Missouri bottom from Yankton to the Big Sioux, the land at the lakes, now Gayville, was not submerged, and the same is true of Meckling and of Elk Point. There were a few other spots that kept their heads above water.

An Old Settlers' Historical Association was chartered by the first Legislature, and inasmuch as it was the first association of this character in Dakota, we herewith give the act of incorporation:

An Act to Incorporate the "Old Settlers' Historical Association."

Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota:

REV. MELANCTHON HOYT

Rev. Melancthon Hoyt was the first Christian clergyman to take up his residence with his family in the Territory of Dakota. The Methodists had preceded him with an itinerant clergyman, a single man, but to Mr. Hoyt must be accredited the title of pioneer, for he remained a Dakotan, and was actively engaged in the work of the church until called by death to relinquish his earthly pilgrimage.

Doctor Hoyt was born in Connecticut in 1807. Of his younger years we know but little, because we have never made inquiry, but we have learned that he received a liberal education, and graduated from Yale College in his twenty-fifth year. He had resolved to become a minister, and studied for that calling. In 1834, on the 14th of October, he was made a deacon of the Episcopal Church, and was assigned to missionary work on the 25th of March, 1835. He was then twenty-seven years old. He began his work as a minister on the frontiers of civilization in Indiana, in 1835. From Indiana he was called to Michigan, and the year 1843 found him laboring in Wisconsin, from Watertown to Green Bay.

In 1858 Doctor Hoyt removed, with his family, to Sioux City, Iowa. His family, in addition to himself and wife, consisted of three boys and five girls. Dakota was then Indian country. He was the first Episcopal pastor in Sioux City, and he not only gave attention to his church work, but took a leading part in the educational work of the city, secular and religious, in the meantime gaining a knowledge of the nearby Territory of Dakota and paying its scattered and meagre settlements an occasional visit. In 1861 Dakota was organized as a territory and was made a part of the Diocese of Nebraska, with Bishop Robert Clarkson as its bishop. Mr. Hoyt was placed in charge of the Dakota field by the Board of Domestic Missions, and in 1862 removed, with his family, to Yankton. He organized a parish at Yankton, and established mission stations at Vermillion, Elk Point, and probably at Bon Homme, then the only centers of population except those in the far-away Pembina country. In 1865 he built a substantial church edifice at Yankton, and until the coming in of Rev. Joseph Ward, late in 1868, ministered practically to the religious instruction of the entire community—those of all denominations—and was quite successful. He remained as the representative head of the Episcopal Church a number of years, maintaining his rectorship at Yankton, and organizing over fifty parishes and superintending the building of seventeen church edifices. His work, then, was largely the laying of the foundation for others to build upon. Doctor Hoyt had at this time resigned his pastorate at Yankton, and as dean of Dakota was engaged in looking after the interests of the church generally. At Sioux City he had conducted the principal school during the years 1858 and 1859, having an average of seventy pupils in attendance. In this work he was assisted by his daughters, Elizabeth and Anna, who were well qualified to instruct the young. A feature of his Sioux City school, and one that he found to be exceptionally popular with his scholars, as well as with the patrons of the school, was a weekly lecture given by some one of the learned men of the city on scientific subjects.

Rev. Melancthon Hoyt was an ardent worker in the cause of education—an earnest advocate and laborer for the establishment of schools, which new communities are sometimes indifferent about. He was one of the most active and useful promoters of the first historical society which flourished at Yankton in early days, and wherever enterprise and assistance were needed, in his character as a citizen, he was found with his shoulder to the wheel. His hospitality was proverbial, and his time and abilities were given to the promotion of all things beneficial to the community and to his fellowmen. While he was a rigid Episcopalian, he was a broad-minded, great-hearted Christian gentleman who reminded one of that unostentatious divine mentioned in Goldsmith's "Deserted Village," who took a personal interest in the material, as well as religious, welfare of all the people, and all the people held him in high esteem and bore for him a warm affection. Men and women of all denominations were members of his congregation during the early years, and many of these were among his strongest supporters and most valued friends.

CHAPTER XXII

THE FIRST ELECTION UNDER TERRITORIAL LAW

1862

UNITED STATES LAND OFFICE—THE POLITICAL CAMPAIGN—REPUBLICANS DIVIDED—GENERAL TODD VS. GOVERNOR JAYNE, THE ISSUE—FIRST REPUBLICAN AND UNION CONVENTION CALL—PROCEEDINGS OF THE COUNTY AND TERRITORIAL CONVENTIONS—GOVERNOR JAYNE NOMINATED FOR DELEGATE TO CONGRESS—GENERAL TODD NOMINATED BY PEOPLE'S CONVENTION—COUNTY CONVENTIONS AND COUNTY OFFICERS NOMINATED—FIRST ELECTION—GOVERNOR APPOINTED—FIRST COUNTY OFFICERS—VOTERS WITH GUNS ON THEIR SHOULDERS—MIDNIGHT VOTING—BALLOT BOX STUFFING—FRAUD IN NEARLY ONE-HALF THE PRECINCTS—JAYNE AWARDED CERTIFICATE OF ELECTION—RED RIVER RETURNS NOT RECEIVED—TODD GIVES NOTICE OF CONTEST—WHY RED RIVER RETURNS WERE NOT SENT FOR.

The Homestead Law, under which so many millions of western farmers have acquired homes and fortunes on the public lands of the United States, was passed at the session of Congress held in 1861-62. Andrew Johnson, afterward president and successor to Abraham Lincoln, is said to have been the originator of the homestead plan, and was its principal advocate in the Senate of the United States. The law was approved by President Lincoln May 20, 1862.

The first United States land office in the territory was opened for business at Vermillion on the 6th day of October, 1862. Prior to that time claim takers had made their pre-emption filings in the office of the surveyor general at Yankton by authority of the general land office. The land officers were J. M. Allen, of Springfield, Illinois, register; and Mahlon Wilkinson, of Indiana, receiver. The land district was named by the organic act the Yankton Land District. W. W. Brookings made the first filing in the office on the morning of the 6th, taking a quarter section of land at Sioux Falls.

Territorial and county politics began to engage the attention of the people during the early summer. There was a delegate to Congress to be elected and a territorial auditor and treasurer; also members of the House of Representatives of the Legislative Assembly of the territory and a full list of county officers. It need not be surmised that the pioneers of Dakota were without political ambition, or lacked in understanding practical politics according to modern methods.

The election under a law of the first legislature was appointed to be held on the first Monday in September, which in 1862 would fall on the first day of that month. Yankton was already the political headquarters of the territory, and the two candidates for Congress, Gov. William Jayne and Gen. J. B. Todd, were to all intents and purposes both Yankton men; and though neither had been formally placed in the field by nominating conventions, they were being very vigorously pressed by their respective partisans and the nomination of each was a foregone conclusion.

Governor Jayne was supported by the republicans and General Todd by the democrats and quite a faction of republicans under the lead of some of the federal officials. The main argument in support of Jayne was that politically he was in accord with the party in power, and therefore could obtain more favors from the National Government than could a dyed-in-the-wool democrat as Todd was supposed to be.

Todd's supporters argued that he had for years given his time and money to promote the interests of Dakota, which was true as the history proves. He had been at the head of all the progressive movements from the time when the Indians owned the soil and had shown himself to be an able, astute and successful leader; that he was thoroughly acquainted with those needs of the territory which the National Government was looked to to supply, and that his distant relationship to the President would enable him to secure many favors from the executive departments, which was no small item in his favor. The contest waxed warm and the feeling between the parties was at times extremely bitter. The older pioneers adhered to Todd. Jayne had the support of the Dakotian newspaper at Yankton and the Republican at Vermillion, a paper that was started September 6, 1861; while Todd was ably backed by the Sioux City Register, and also by a series of campaign letters written by M. K. Armstrong, over the nom-de-plume of "Log-Roller" and published in the Register. Of the federal officials Attorney-General Gleason and Provost Marshal Waldron openly espoused the cause of Todd, and Judge Bliss was also claimed as friendly to the general's ambition.

The "Republican and Union Territorial Congressional Convention" was called to meet at Vermillion on Wednesday, July 16, 1862, at 10 o'clock A. M. This was the first party convention to be held in the territory, subject to a formal and generally recognized call, and announced the commencement of political party construction and the birth of the republican organization in the territory. The call is here given, with the names of those who signed it:

REPUBLICAN AND UNION CONGRESSIONAL CONVENTION

To the Electors of Dakota Territory:

A republican and union delegate convention will be held at Vermillion, Dakota Territory, on Wednesday, July 16, A. D. 1862, at 10 o'clock A. M., for the purpose of nominating a candidate for delegate to Congress.

The proceedings of nearly all the county conventions held in the territory are given in this chapter. They were all what is termed mass conventions, being the first to be held. The party machinery of the counties had not been organized until this election campaign of 1862, which was the first after the organization of the territorial government, which is supposed to have been completed with the system of laws passed at the first session of the Legislative Assembly, begun in March of this year.

YANKTON COUNTY REPUBLICAN CONVENTION

In response to the call of the republican and union people so numerously signed, the republicans of Yankton County met at the office of the territorial secretary on Saturday, July 5, 1862, at 2 o'clock P. M. Joseph R. Hanson called the meeting to order. Justus Townsend was elected president, and Geo. W. Kingsbury, secretary.

On motion of Mr. Barge, a committee of three was appointed to select and present to the convention the names of eight persons to act as delegates to the territorial convention. The chair appointed Messrs. N. W. Barge, G. W. Lamson and J. R. Hanson such committee.

On motion of William Thompson, the chair appointed Messrs. Thompson, Edmunds and Druseron a Committee on Resolutions.

The committee to select the names of eight delegates to the territorial convention made a report recommending the following: Justus Townsend, Knud Larson, Otis B. Wheeler, Charles F. Picotte, Joseph R. Hanson, Newton Edmunds, Ole Sampson and Geo. W. Kingsbury.

The report was adopted.

Governor Jayne then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the following named persons be hereby chosen and constituted a county committee of the republican and union party for the County of Yankton and empowered to transact all business usual to such committee: Messrs. G. W. Kingsbury, chairman; M. K. Armstrong, Ole Sampson, G. W. Lamson, N. W. Barge, J. R. Hanson and Peter Johnson.

This was the first republican convention held in Yankton county, and the committee designated was the first committee appointed by any political party in the county. It is difficult to understand why Mr. Armstrong's name appears in this committee, as he was an avowed democrat and a supporter of the democratic ticket in this campaign, and a candidate on that ticket for the Legislature. It is probable that as there had been no lining up of parties before this campaign came on, the governor may not have been apprised of Mr. Armstrong's political affiliations. At that time, because of the war for the Union, tens of thousands of democrats all over the northern states had joined hands with the republicans for a vigorous prosecution of the war for the suppression of the rebellion, and in electing Mr. Armstrong a committeeman, the members of the convention were doubtless under the impression that their party had secured a valuable recruit.

The delegates elected to the territorial convention were instructed to vote as a unit.

The Committee on Resolutions reported as follows:

Resolved, That the unanimous prayer of this convention is for the perpetuity of our American Union, under the same old Constitution, which was the production of statesmen whose wisdom was equalled only by their patriotism, and which only can hold the states together in the bonds of love and guarantee that national greatness which all good citizens desire.

Resolved, That in the vigorous prosecution of the present war, we hail every success of our armies and navies as the most effective contributions to that real and only permanent peace which the country can accept as the termination of our present troubles.

Resolved, That our delegates to the convention to be held at Vermillion on the 16th of July, are expected to secure the nomination of a man for delegate to Congress who shall be known and a recognized endorser of these sentiments, and whom the friends of the administration and lovers of our Union, without regard to past political connections, can cordially support.

On motion the convention requested that the proceedings be published in the Dakotan, after which the convention adjourned sine die.

JUSTUS TOWNSEND, Chairman.

G. W. KINGSBURY, Secretary.

TODD COUNTY REPUBLICAN AND UNION CONVENTION

The republican and union electors of Todd County met at the house of Peter Kegan, in Running Water Settlement, on Saturday, July 5, 1862, pursuant to call, for the purpose of electing delegates to the territorial convention to be held at Vermillion on the 16th inst. Peter Kegan was placed in the chair, and Thomas Goodwin was elected secretary.

The convention resolved to elect two delegates to the territorial convention by ballot, which resulted in the choice of Robert M. Hagaman and Hollowell Lowe. No further business being ordered, the convention adjourned.

PETER KEGAN, Chairman.

THOS. GOODWIN, Secretary.

CLAY COUNTY REPUBLICAN AND UNION CONVENTION

The Clay County Republican and Union Delegate Convention was held at Vermillion on Saturday, July 5. J. W. Boyle was chairman and J. B. Glaze secretary. The following delegates to the territorial convention were elected: A. W. Puett, J. W. Boyle, Thomas Holverson, H. D. Betts, J. W. Tawney, L. Bothun, George Dimmick, J. B. Glaze, S. Lyon, Halver Burgess, J. A. Jacobson, B. W. Collar, Torge Ellifson and Israel Trumbo.

MINNEHAHA COUNTY REPUBLICAN AND UNION CONVENTION

Sioux Falls, July 6, 1862.

At a meeting held here on the 5th inst., Judge Amidon was called to the chair, and H. Masters appointed secretary.

The following delegates to the Vermillion convention on the 16th were unanimously chosen: H. Masters, W. W. Brookings and Barclay Jarrett.

The following named gentlemen were chosen as substitutes, in case all or either of the regular delegates failed to attend: B. C. Fowler, J. W. Amidon, J. W. Evans.

The annexed resolutions were then adopted unanimously:

Resolved, That we fully and cordially endorse the policy of the administration of Abraham Lincoln—that in the present condition of the country it deserves and ought to receive the cordial and earnest support of every true and patriotic citizen.

Resolved, That the territorial administration of Dakota Territory, by the faithful discharge of its duties, meets with our warmest approbation.

Resolved, That Governor Jayne, for the efforts he has made for the protection of the frontier settlements against Indian depredations, is entitled to the highest commendation of every son and daughter of Dakota.

Resolved, That the delegates of Minnehaha County to the convention to be held at Vermillion the 16th inst., are hereby instructed to vote for Hon. William Jayne for delegate to Congress.

The following resolutions were then offered and adopted:

Resolved, That if any of our delegates or substitutes be absent, those present shall vote for the entire delegation.

On motion the meeting adjourned sine die.

J. B. AMIDON, President.

H. MASTERS, Secretary.

REPUBLICAN AND UNION TERRITORIAL CONVENTION

The first territorial republican and union convention met at Vermillion Wednesday, July 16, 1862, at 10 o'clock A. M., and was called to order by George M. Paine.

1. name. A. W. Puett, of Clay County, was elected president of the convention, and Andrew J. Bell, of Cole County, and Geo. W. Kingsbury, of Yankton County, were elected secretaries.

W. W. Brookings, of Minnehaha County, moved the appointment of a Committee on Credentials, which motion was approved, and the chair appointed W. W. Brookings; J. B. Glaze, of Clay; M. M. Rich and Robt. M. Hagaman, of Todd County, the committee.

Mr. Pinney moved that the chair appoint a Committee on Resolutions, which motion being adopted, the chair appointed Geo. M. Pinney, John W. Boyle, of Clay County; William Mathews, of Union County; Henry Masters, of Minnehaha County; Ole Sampson, of Yankton County; and Robt. M. Hagaman, of Todd County, a Committee on Resolutions.

A recess was taken for fifteen minutes on motion of Newton Edmunds, of Yankton; at the expiration of which the convention reconvened and the Committee on Credentials reported as follows:

Mr. President—Your Committee on Credentials beg leave to make the following report: The delegates duly elected and entitled to seats in this convention are:

Clay County—A. W. Puett, J. B. Glaze, J. W. Boyle, Samuel Lyon, Thomas Halverson, H. Burgess, H. D. Betts, J. A. Jacobson, J. M. Tawney, B. M. Collar, Lasse Bothun, T. Ellefson, George Dimmick, and Israel Trumbo—14. Yankton County—Justus Townsend, Otis B. Wheeler, Joseph R. Hanson, Ole Sampson, Geo. W. Kingsbury, Kund Larson, Charles F. Picotte and Newton Edmunds—8. Cole County—Milton M. Rich, A. J. Bell, John R. Wood, H. Seamens, William Mathews, J. P. LaPlant—6. Minnehaha County—Henry Masters, W. W. Brookings, Jesse B. Jarrett—3. Bon Homme County—Geo. M. Pinney, Henry Hartsough, D. C. Gross, Laban H. Litchfield, Henry Brooks, and Charles E. Hedges—6. Todd County—Robert Hagaman and H. Lowe. Charles Mix County—Cortez Fessenden and G. W. Lamson.

On motion the report was adopted.

The Committee on Resolutions reported the following:

Resolved, That the old Constitution of our fathers, which inaugurated so beneficent a Government as ours, should still possess the virtue to perpetuate the glorious union of states which it initiated, and for the perpetuity of which all good citizens must ever pray.

Resolved, That the administration of Abraham Lincoln has been thus far eminently wise and patriotic, exhibiting at once the highest statesmanship and the most earnest devotion to the country and justly thereby securing the support and hearty approval of a generous and loyal people.

Resolved, That the present war should be vigorously prosecuted by all the means which the ingenuity and resources of the country can command, until the unreasonable and unholy rebellion shall be entirely crushed, federal power asserted, federal property recovered, and federal allegiance acknowledged in every part of the land.

Resolved, That while the welfare of Dakota is indissolubly embodied in the restoration of the Union and the prosperity of the nation at large, still, Dakota has many specific interests for which we must ever labor and which are to be protected only through a watchful and energetic policy which shall oppose all land monopolies and favor actual settlers; which shall secure to us every benefit that Dakota, through her admirable natural facilities can possibly derive from the railroad enterprises which are soon to be inaugurated in the West; that shall favor the expenditure in the territory of all moneys in future appropriated for public purposes of the territory by the general government, and the disbursement of the same to actual and bona fide residents of Dakota; a policy that shall contribute to the advancement of our educational interests through such schools and colleges as Congress may be induced to foster; and in fine, a wise and liberal policy that will at once brighten every aspect in which Dakota is to be viewed, which shall attract a large and intelligent population, and advance us rapidly on the road to rank and position which numbers and material wealth, combined with intelligence, never fail to secure.

Resolved, That we favor such an amendment of the Homestead Law as shall give to each actual settler on the public lands, in accordance with the provisions of that law, twenty acres of timber land in addition to the 160 acres conferred under the present act.

Resolved, That while nominating a candidate for delegate to Congress and territorial officers, to be supported by the people at the election in September next, we can advocate their election on this platform with every confidence of success, and we cheerfully extend an invitation to every Union man in Dakota, without the least reference to his past political connections, to join us in our pledges and our labors, for those ends which we sincerely believe involve Dakota's best interests.

On request of the delegates from Cole County, the apportionment of that county was increased from six to ten, those who had been admitted stating that they should feel compelled to retire from the convention if their request was denied. The four additional delegates were: Ole Halverson, Robert Hotchkiss, William Adams and William Mathews, who took their seats.

On motion, the convention then proceeded to an informal ballot for candidate for delegate to Congress, John R. Wood, J. R. Hanson and Halvor Burgess being appointed tellers. The informal ballot exhibited the following result: William Jayne, 20; Philemon Bliss, 13; John W. Boyle, 6; James Tufts, 4; A. J. Harlan, 1.

A resolution was then adopted pledging the members of the convention to support the nominee. Mr. Boyle withdrew his name. A formal ballot was then taken, resulting as follows: William Jayne, 37 votes; Philemon Bliss, 7, and Charles E. Booge, 1. William Jayne having received a majority of the votes, the president declared him to be the nominee of the convention, when on motion the nomination was made unanimous.

Justus Townsend, of Yankton, was then nominated for territorial auditor, and P. H. Jewell, of Clay, territorial treasurer.

Governor Jayne was not present at the convention and the president was instructed to notify him of his nomination.

On motion of Mr. Brookings, the following named persons were appointed by the chair to be the territorial central committee of the republican and union party, namely: J. B. Glaze, Clay County; A. J. Bell, Cole County; Newton Edmunds, Yankton County; Geo. M. Pinney, Bon Homme County; Robt. Hagaman, Todd County; F. D. Pease, Charles Mix County; W. W. Brookings, Minnehaha County, and Hugh S. Donaldson, Kitson and other counties in the Red River of the North District.

On motion of Newton Edmunds the proceedings of the convention were ordered published in the Vermillion Republican and Yankton Dakotian.

On motion of A. J. Bell, the convention adjourned.

A. W. PUETT, President.

A. J. BELL,
G. W. KINGSBURY,
Secretaries.

No territorial campaign was made or ticket nominated by the democratic party in 1862. The opposition to the republican and union territorial party adopted the title of "People's Union Party." Though the people's union party included the democrats, and was in fact their party, there was an element of republicans, including some federal officials, who were not acting with the new republican and union organization, and no doubt the title "People's Union" was much more congenial to them than the straight-out democratic title would have been. In deference to this element, which was an important and necessary factor if success was to be achieved, the "People's" name may have been adopted. It will be observed, however, that the title declared that the party was a "Union" party, which at that time was the dominating issue in national and territorial political affairs.

Under the "People's Union" title a call was issued about the 1st of July, of which the following is a copy:

People's Union Delegate Convention, to be held at Vermillion, July 24, 1862, for the purpose of nominating a candidate for Congress. The respective counties shall be entitled to the following number of delegates: Cole County, 6; Clay County, 12; Yankton County, 8; Bon Homme County, 5; Todd, Gregory, Charles Mix and Brughier counties, 4; Minnehaha County, 2; Red River District, 4.

Signed, MANY CITIZENS.

CLAY COUNTY PEOPLE'S UNION CONVENTION

At a meeting held at Vermillion on the 19th day of July, 1862, as per previous notice, to nominate delegates to attend a territorial convention to be held at the above named place on the 24th inst., for the purpose of nominating a candidate to represent the people of Dakota in the Congress of the United States, on motion of Mr. G. B. Bigelow Judge Wm. Shriner was called to the chair, and Jesse Wherry elected secretary. After which the chair stated the object of the meeting.

On motion of Mr. Kelley, the following resolution was offered:

Resolved, That this meeting proceed by ballot to elect fourteen delegates to represent this county in the territorial convention to be held at this place; and be it further resolved that we respectfully suggest to the said convention of the 24th to give the said county the number of fourteen delegates, humbly conceiving, as we do, that said county is entitled to the same upon the proper basis of representation.

On motion of T. Halverson, said resolution was adopted.

Mr. Bond offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the delegates be chosen separately, and a plurality vote entitles each delegate to an election.

On motion of Mr. Kennerly, for the adoption of the resolution, an argument ensued, which was participated in by Messrs. Bond, Kelley, Clark, Deuel, and others, and resulted in Mr. Bond's resolution being sustained.

On motion of Mr. Deuel, the chair was instructed to appoint two tellers to conduct the election. Mr. Chairman appointed Messrs. Bigelow and John Russel.

On motion of Mr. Bond, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That whereas P. H. Jewell has been a participant in the convention of this place on the 16th inst., for the purpose of nominating a delegate to Congress and territorial officers, and as the said P. H. Jewell suffered his name to be presented for territorial treasurer, and has received the nomination for the same and has not declined said nomination, yet denounces said convention, and wishing to force himself upon this meeting to secure the endorsement of this honest body for the purpose of obtaining a renomination; therefore be it resolved that we exclude the said Jewell from any participation in this meeting.

On motion of Mr. Kelley, the meeting proceeded to ballot. On the first ballot Mr. Deuel received the largest number of votes and was declared elected, he having received 29, Mr. Kelley, 18; Mr. Compton, 7; Mr. J. Whitehorn, 1; Mr. Kennerly, 1. The 2d, 3th, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th and 9th ballots resulted in the election of the following named gentlemen as delegates: H. Compton, Ole Bottolfson, H. S. Kelley, B. A. Collar, Frank Taylor, Thomas Halverson and Ole Anderson. At this period the chairman, either worn out by the balloting, or not deeming himself equal to the emergency, requested to be relieved from the chair, which was granted, and Mr. T. Elwood Clark was unanimously chosen chairman, and the balloting resumed, which resulted in the election of the following gentlemen: Messrs. E. M. Bond, Miles R. Hall, Judge Shriner, E. Vinton and Erick Oleson.

On motion of Mr. Deuel, the proceedings of this meeting be published in the Sioux City Register and Weekly Dakotan at Yankton.

On motion of Mr. Bond, the delegates were instructed that if a vacancy should occur in delegates to the territorial convention, a majority of those present should cast the vote of the absentees.

No further business appearing, on motion of Mr. Kennerly the meeting adjourned.

T. ELWOOD CLARK, President.

J. WHERRY, Secretary.

PEOPLE'S UNION TERRITORIAL CONVENTION

Pursuant to the regular call the delegates from the various organized counties in this territory met at the McHenry House in Vermillion, on Thursday, July 24, 1862, for the purpose of nominating a candidate for delegate to Congress and territorial auditor and treasurer.

At 2 o'clock P. M., James M. Allen, of Yankton, called the convention to order, and upon his motion, Hon. John H. Shober, of Bon Homme, was chosen temporary president, who, upon taking the chair made a few well timed and patriotic remarks.

On motion of E. M. Bond, of Clay, Henry S. Kelley and Franklin Taylor were elected secretaries.

On motion of Jesse Wherry, the chair appointed Maj. W. P. Lyman, Yankton; E. M. Bond and M. R. Hall, of Clay, Committee on Credentials.

A brief recess was taken on motion of Austin Cole, of Cole County; and the convention being called to order, the credentials committee reported as follows:

Mr. President—Your committee beg leave to report that they have examined the credentials presented by the parties claiming seats in this convention and find the following named persons entitled to the same: Cole County—Joseph LaBarge, Judson LaMoure, William Adams, Ole Halverson, William Frisbie, Ole Kittleson, Dr. A. R. Phillips, William Mathews, Austin Cole and W. R. Goodfellow—10. Clay County—Jacob Deuel, H. Compton, Ole Bottolfson, H. S. Kelley, B. A. Collar, Jesse Wherry, Franklin Taylor, Ole Anderson, Thomas Halverson, E. M. Bond, M. R. Hall, William Shriner, E. M. Vinton and E. Olson—14. Yankton County—Henry Bradley, Peter Johnson, Wm. P. Lyman, William Bordino, John Stanage, J. M. Allen, David Fisher, and W. Nelson Collamer—8. Bon Homme County—Reuben Wallace, Daniel C. Gifford, W. W. Warford, R. M. Johnson, James Skinner and John H. Shober—6. Todd County—Felix Le Blanc and Otto Knutson—2. Minnehaha County—William Stevens and Charles Wambole. Charles Mix County—F. D. Pease and Elias W. Wall.

On motion, the temporary officers of the convention were declared to be the permanent officers.

On motion of James M. Allen, the chairman appointed J. M. Allen, E. M. Bond and Jesse Wherry a Committee on Resolutions. On motion of F. D. Pease, the apportionment of Charles Mix County was increased by allowing that county two more delegates.

The convention then proceeded to nomination of a candidate for delegate to Congress. W. P. Lyman and E. M. Bond were appointed tellers.

On motion of Mr. Bond, the first ballot was informal, and resulted as follows: J. B. S. Todd, 27 votes; Chas. P. Booge, 9 votes; F. J. Dewitt, 4 votes.

On motion of Mr. Bond, the convention then took a recess for one hour, at the expiration of which it reconvened; and on motion of Mr. Wherry, proceeded to a formal ballot for a candidate for delegates, as follows: J. B. S. Todd received 34 votes, and F. J. Dewitt 5 votes. Todd's majority, 29.

The chairman of the convention then stated that he was requested to say that Mr. Dewitt was not a candidate before the convention and that he had been voted for without his request.

Mr. Booge also withdrew and the nomination of General Todd, on motion, was made unanimous. Maj. Wm. P. Lyon and H. Compton were appointed a committee to notify General Todd of his nomination.

Henry S. Kelley, of Clay, was then nominated by acclamation for territorial auditor, and S. G. Irish, of Bon Homme, for territorial treasurer.

The Committee on Resolutions reported the following, which were unanimously adopted as the platform of the people's union party:

Whereas, The Constitution of the United States especially reserves to the people the right peaceably to assemble to discuss public matters, and forbids any abridgement of the freedom of speech; and whereas, in the misfortunes that now surround our dearly beloved country, it is especially the duty of every citizen to support the Government established by the Federal Constitution and guard with a jealous eye all infringements of the rights of the people by any department of the Government thereof; therefore,

First. Resolved, As a sense of this convention, that the present war should be waged for the purpose of restoring the Union as it was, and for the preservation of the Constitution as it is, and until that object is accomplished, the war should be vigorously prosecuted.

Second. That the hopes of the country are not centered in the republican or democratic parties, but in the union of all loyal, patriotic and law abiding citizens, irrespective of former party proclivities or partisan tenets, and that it is enfeebling the administration and jeopardizing the preservation of the Union, to attempt to draw party lines until our national difficulties are settled, the Union restored, the Constitution preserved, and the supremacy of the laws enforced and recognized.

Third. That we invite all conservative voters, whatever may have been their past political associations, to unite with us in a vigorous effort in favor of the Union, the Constitution and the enforcement of the laws.

Fourth. That we believe it to be the desire of the administration, that our officials should reside within the territory, during their term of office, and as he who is the highest in position has not yet become a resident of the territory, but is demanding the suffrages of the people to represent them in Congress, therefore we call upon the people to mete out to him the rebuke which his conduct so justly deserves.

Fifth. That the present unlimited veto power of the governor strips the Legislature of its free expression of the will of the people, and we therefore favor amending the Organic Act by Congress, so as to confer upon the governor only the usual two-thirds veto power, and to give to the people, through their Legislature, control of the public printing.

Sixth. That the best interests of the people require that all appropriations made by the general Government for the benefit of Dakota Territory, be disbursed among the people thereof, hence we utterly condemn the conduct of our Government officials in employing non-resident persons in the service of the territory to the exclusion of competent residents, and paying out to them the money which should be disbursed and retained in the territory.

And we look upon those politicians who profess to advocate such a policy in their platform, but continually act otherwise, as a cheat upon the people, injury to the territory, and an imposition upon the general Government.

Seventh. That in view of the disproportion of timber and prairie lands in the Northwest, we urge the propriety of Congress so amending the Homestead law as to allow the applicant to select his claim in two tracts, so that the actual settler shall be able to procure timber to support the prairies.

Eighth. That we favor the complete and perfect protection of claims on our public domain belonging to our citizen soldiers who have enlisted to fight our battles, preserve our liberties, and defend our Government in its hour of peril. And we believe that patriotic soldiers, drawn from the ranks of freemen, should have the privilege of expressing their choice, and recommending the officers to be stationed over them.

Ninth. That we repose implicit confidence in the ability and integrity of our candidates this day put in nomination, and cheerfully recommend them to the people for their suffrages as citizens who are identified with and have at heart the best interests of Dakota.

On motion of W. P. Lyman the chair appointed a Territorial Central Committee as follows:

Jesse Wherry, Clay County, chairman W. P. Lyman, Yankton; John H. Shober, Bon Homme; Joel A. Potter, Todd County; E. W. Wall, Charles Mix; William Stevens, Minnehaha; James McFetridge, Kitson, and Joseph LaBarge, Cole County.

On motion of E. W. Bond the Sioux City Register and Vermillion Republican were requested to publish the proceedings.

On motion the convention then adjourned.

HENRY S. KELLY,
FRANKLIN TAYLOR,
Secretaries.

JOHN H. SHOBER,
President.

These proceedings completed the territorial political conventions for 1862 and have been given in full in this book in order that the reader may be informed regarding the first steps taken in forming the political parties of Dakota.

The campaign was now open and very active were the politicians in all the settlements during its progress. The contest, it was evident, was to be a close one. Many republicans were supporting General Todd openly, and many others were doing the same quietly, caused largely by the sentiment that Governor Jayne, being a newcomer, was not entitled to the best office in the gift of the people, while the federal officials who supported Todd averred that Governor Jayne, in permitting himself to be a candidate, was creating a prejudice in the public mind against the officials, who would be charged with banding together for the purpose of controlling the political patronage of the territory in their own interest. It was also urged that party lines were out of place in a territorial election where the Delegate selected would have no voice or vote in legislation, and therefore voters should exercise their judgment as to the best man for the place regardless of his political or party antecedents.

YANKTON COUNTY REPUBLICAN AND UNION CONVENTION

A republican and union county convention was called by the chairman of the county committee, G. W. Kingsbury, to meet at Yankton on the 9th of August, 1862, at 2 o'clock P. M. to nominate candidates for representatives in the Legislature and county officers.

The convention was held at the Union House in accordance with the call. B. F. Barge was elected chairman, on motion of Doctor Townsend, and William Miner, secretary.

The convention proceeded at once to nominate a ticket. J. K. Fowler and John Lawrence were appointed tellers. The members of the council elected in 1861 were chosen for two years, and therefore held over.

For representatives there were two to be nominated. On the first ballot Knud Larson, of the Lake Settlement, received 26 votes; O. B. Wheeler, 11; J. R. Hanson, 4, and J. M. Stone, 2.

Larson was declared nominated, and a second ballot taken for the remaining representative, resulting, Hanson, 21; Wheeler, 17; Stone, 7; no choice. A third ballot was had, resulting, Hanson, 26; Wheeler, 22. On Wheeler's motion Hanson's nomination was made unanimous.

The county officers, except sheriff, were now nominated by acclamation, as follows:

Register of deeds, William Miner.

For sheriff C. L. Rossteuscher and C. S. White were named, and a ballot being had, Rossteuscher received twenty-one votes and White seventeen. Rossteuscher was then unanimously nominated.

The purpose of these county convention sketches is simply to inform those who have since settled in the old counties, of the first step in the organization of political parties in their county, which organizations were probably continuous during the territorial days, and until the modern reforms displaced them.

I. COUNTIES AND COUNTY ORGANIZATIONS

At the first election in the Territory of Dakota, held in 1861, the only officers elected were a delegate to Congress and members of the Legislature. This election was called, and election districts set off, by proclamation of the governor under authority given that officer by the Organic Act. The Legislature elected at this election was, by the same proclamation, called to meet at Yankton on Monday, the 17th day of March, 1862. During the session of this Legislature, a law was enacted defining the boundaries of certain counties, to-wit: Cole, Lincoln, Minnehaha, Brookings and Deuel, on the Big Sioux River; Stevens, Chippewa, Cheyenne and Kittson, on the Red River of the North; and Clay, Yankton, Bon Homme, Charles Mix, Brughier, Gregory and Todd, along the Missouri River; and Jayne and Hutchinson, in the James River Valley, north of Yankton and Bon Homme counties. Temporary county seats were named for such of the counties as possessed white settlements; and the law required the governor to appoint the officers provided for, to hold until after the first election and until their successors were elected and qualified. The general election was appointed by law to be held on the first Monday in September, in every even numbered year, and an annual election every odd numbered year for the election of members of the Legislative Assembly and to supply vacancies that may have occurred in county offices. The members of the House of Representatives were, however, required by the organic act to be elected annually.

A law had been enacted by the first Legislature authorizing and requiring the governor to appoint the county officers provided for in various counties, who were to hold offices until their successors were elected and qualified. The first general election was appointed to be held on Monday, September 1, 1862. The officers so provided were three county commissioners; register of deeds, who was also county clerk and clerk of the board; sheriff; judge of probate, who was ex-officio county treasurer; county attorney; surveyor; coroner; superintendent of schools; two justices of the peace, and two constables.

The first meeting of the first board of county commissioners of Yankton County occurred on Monday, the 2d day of June, 1862. The body consisted of Dr. Justus Townsend, Henry Bradley and Otis B. Wheeler, who had been appointed by the governor. Doctor Townsend was elected chairman of the board, but no other business was transacted, the board adjourning until the second Monday of July. The meeting was held at the Ash Hotel. The other county officers appointed by the governor were William Bordino, register of deeds; William Miner, sheriff; J. R. Hanson, judge of probate; James M. Stone, county surveyor, and Charles S. White and J. S. Presho, justices of the peace. These were the first officers of the county, Judge Bliss administering the oath of office to them, and the event was looked upon of such importance that it was appropriately celebrated in accordance with frontier custom. The county attorney, coroner and constables were not designated, but they were mingled somewhere with those who volunteered to take part in the celebration as private citizens.

The governor also appointed a portion of the county officers for the other counties, but does not seem to have made the list complete.

For Clay County he appointed Aaron Carpenter, George W. Wilson and L. Bothum, county commissioners, and Franklin Taylor, register of deeds.

For Cole (now Union) County: J. Mathers, B. A. Hill and John R. Wood, county commissioners, and N. J. Wallace, register of deeds.

For Bon Homme County: County commissioners, Byron M. Smith, L. H. Litchfield and Henry Hartsough, and H. W. Granger, register of deeds. This board organized and appointed the remainder of county officers, as follows: Sheriff, J. F. Hook, judge of probate, D. C. Gross; county attorney, M. D. Metcalf; superintendent of schools, C. G. Irish; justices of the peace, D. T. Bradford and William Hammond.

For Charles Mix County, F. F. Wheeler, Felicia Fallas and C. P. Barbier were appointed county commissioners, and Colin Lamont, register of deeds. The county seat had been established at Papineau, on the Missouri, by the Legislature.

Kitson County, Red River of the North: Norman W. Kittson, Charles LeMay and Baptiste Shorette, county commissioners; Charles Marrian, register of deeds.

Todd County: James B. Gayton, register of deeds; Robert M. Hagaman, George Detwiler and Robert Barnum, commissioners.

Minnehaha County: Henry Masters, register of deeds; B. C. Fowler, William Stevens and William Amidon, commissioners; J. B. Amidon, judge of probate; J. W. Evans, sheriff; James McCall, justice of the peace.

The governor subsequently revoked the appointment of N. J. Wallace, register of deeds of Cole County, and appointed M. M. Rich. He also appointed L. H. Litchfield register of deeds of Bon Homme County, Mr. Granger neglecting to qualify.

This first general election to be held in Dakota Territory under the territorial law had been right in the midst of the exciting events of the Indian troubles related in subsequent chapters. It came off on Monday, September 1st, when service in the Dakota militia was the principal occupation of the citizens. It was a time when voters went to the polls carrying guns on their shoulders. The attendance of voters included nearly every one in the territory entitled to vote, possibly somewhat augmented by the ugly reports afloat regarding hostile Indians and the recent killing of the Amidons at Sioux Falls. In some precincts in the territory, Sioux Falls in particular, no election was held, the settlers having abandoned that place for Yankton a few days prior to election day.

At Brule Creek precinct, in Union County, the excitement and alarm grew so intense that many of the settlers resolved on leaving the settlement and going to Sioux City the night before the election and, in order that they might not lose their votes, the polls were opened during the night and a large number of votes were received and recorded, some of which were cast by minors and non-residents, and quite a large number were evidently placed in the ballot box surreptitiously by some party who had a large interest in locating the county seat on Brule Creek; the location of which was voted upon at this election and in fact was the predominating issue in the county. The polls were also regularly opened the following morning and the election held, but the vote of the precinct was so vitiated by these illegal proceedings that it was thrown out by the national House of Representatives and disregarded by the next Legislature.

The returns of the election, as made to the secretary of the territory, were all in that official's hands within the forty days prescribed by law except the returns from the Red River precincts, St. Joseph and Pembina, Kitson County. Under the law the board of territorial canvassers was composed of the governor, chief justice and secretary, but in this case the governor having been a candidate for delegate, was disqualified from sitting with the board. The two other members canvassed the returns on Tuesday, the 21st of October, with the result following:

For William Jayne:
Cole County—Elk Point and Willow Precinct	18
Cole County—Brule Creek.....	63
Clay County—First Precinct.....	43
Cole County—Second Precinct.....	34
Yankton County—Yankton Precinct.....	66
Todd County—One precinct.....	13

237

Also these votes, which the canvassing board threw out:

Charles Mix County—One precinct.....	138
Dakota Cavalry	90

147

For J. B. S. Todd:
Cole County—Elk Point and Willow Precinct	50
Cole County—Brule Creek.....	8
Clay County—First Precinct.....	40
Clay County—Second Precinct.....	33
Yankton County—Yankton Precinct.....	66

221

Also these votes, which the board threw out:

Charles Mix County.....	7
Bon Homme County.....	22
Dakota Cavalry	9

38

William Jayne having received a majority was declared elected and proclamation to that effect was made by Acting Governor Hutchinson, November 20, 1862.

General Todd, who was sojourning in Yankton, was present at the canvass.

It will be observed that no returns appear to have been received from the Red River of the North precincts.

Under the election law of the territory passed at the first session of the Legislature, which was held a few months previous to this election, the secretary of the territory was required, in case the returns for delegate to Congress from any county had not been received within forty days after the election, to send a messenger after them, the compensation of said messenger to be 10 cents a mile for each mile necessarily traveled going and returning, the 10 cents a mile to be paid out of the treasury. The returns from Kitson County had not been received when the forty days expired, and under the law it was the duty of the secretary to forthwith send a messenger after them. But right here a peculiar condition confronted him. Pembina, on the Red River, was 1,000 miles away according to the only route that had been traveled which was via St. Paul. A few miles beyond St. Paul the route laid through an almost unbroken wilderness for several hundred miles. It would probably require at least fifty days to make the journey and return, providing the messenger was not scalped en route or lost on the plains. There was a stage line and may have been a short piece of railway between Yankton and St. Paul, but from that city to Pembina, there was no public conveyance except for a short distance. A person making the trip would require a good camping outfit and a team with forage and provision. It would cost about one thousand dollars to send a messenger to Pembina from Yankton at that time and pay his expenses. The 10 cents a mile would pay only one-tenth of the expense; and even this sum would have to be raised by contribution, for the machinery of territorial and county government had not yet been set in motion and no taxes had been levied. But there was still another phase of this particular case that would have shouldered the burden of paying the expenses entirely upon private parties. The law declared that the expense of 10 cents a mile would have to be paid out of the treasury. What treasury did the law contemplate? Manifestly the treasury of the delinquent county as a penalty for neglecting to send in its returns. Now this Kitson County was laid out over land that belonged to the Chippewa Indians, and had not been ceded to the United States. How long would it be before Kitson County could be expected to organize and pay a fraction of this expense. As a matter of fact and of history, it was never organized.

The Red River returns were afterwards received but the canvass had been made and the result declared, and the board of canvassers had no authority to reopen. It had exhausted its powers. These returns showed that the election was held September 1st, the abstract was dated September 5th, and the register of deeds affidavit was made September 13th, in ample time to have reached Yankton before the canvass.

According to these returns there were 144 votes cast at Pembina, a greater vote than was polled at any other precinct in the territory. Todd received 125 and Jayne 19. Had these returns been received and counted by the board of canvassers, Todd would have had a majority of ninety votes.

A public proclamation, as required, was later made by the secretary, announcing the result as follows:

To the People of Dakota Territory:

I, John Hutchinson, secretary and acting governor of the Territory of Dakota, do hereby proclaim: That at a general election held on the 1st day of September, 1862, in said territory, William Jayne received a majority of the votes cast for delegate to Congress, and was therefore duly elected as such; that Justus Townsend received a majority of the votes cast for territorial auditor, and was duly elected as such, and that S. G. Irish received a majority of the votes cast for territorial treasurer and was duly elected as such.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal. Done at Yankton this 29th day of November, 1862.

JOHN HUTCHINSON, Secretary and Acting Governor.

The Legislature had provided for the election of a territorial auditor and treasurer, and these officers were elected, no one questioning that such procedure was in conformity with law. It was later discovered that the Organic Act provided for the appointment by the governor of all territorial offices created by the Legislature, and thereafter such officials were so appointed and confirmed by the council. And thereafter, these, who had been elected were also formally appointed by the governor and confirmed.

CHAPTER XXIII

THE GREAT INDIAN WAR

1862

BEGINNING OF THE GREAT INDIAN WAR—THE OUTBREAK IN MINNESOTA—CAUSES OF THE REVOLT—THE LITTLE CROW MASSACRE—HOSTILE INDIANS DRIVEN INTO DAKOTA BY MINNESOTA TROOPS—GOVERNOR CALLS OUT MILITIA; MILITIA RESPONDS—DEFENSIVE WORKS HASTILY CONSTRUCTED AT YANKTON—INDIANS DRIVE SETTLERS FROM THE TERRITORY—YANKTON ONLY OCCUPIED SETTLEMENT—SKETCH OF PICOTTE—CAPTIVE WOMEN AND CHILDREN RESCUED.

A squad of the cavalry troops under Captain Miner, while scouting on Turkey Creek, ran into a band of pillaging Indians early in August in 1862, who claimed they were Sissetons from Brown Valley, Minnesota. They had been roaming at will through the settlements, and annoyed and alarmed the settlers by their boldness in begging and sometimes by offensive threats. Nearly all the settlers were without arms, and many of them were quite ignorant regarding their practical use, which fact came out later when the troubles grew very serious. Captain Miner explained to the Indians that they had no right to be wandering through the settlements terrifying the farmers; that it was unsafe for them to remain in this section, and that he would take them all into custody unless they would go back to their reservation without delay. This they prepared to do, packed up, and started in the direction of the reservation, 200 miles away.

It became known to the Dakota settlers early in August, mainly through Indian sources, that the Santee Indians in Minnesota were very defiant and threatened hostilities. Their chief was Little Crow, an intelligent and daring leader, but for many years had led the life of a civilized Indian, pursuing farming and cattle raising and mingling freely with the white people. There had been indiscreet and possibly dishonest management on the part of some of the Government agents in Minnesota sufficient to furnish a pretext for hostilities where the Indians were inclined in a hostile direction. They were emboldened also by what they had learned of the great war then pending, and which they regarded with much indifference, except that the Great Father would have to employ all his soldiers against his own children and would have none to fight the Indians with in case they should take to the warpath. So the hostile spirit grew and increased and at length culminated in one of the most brutal and ferocious massacres ever committed by Indians. The scene of the disturbance was first at near Red Wing, Minnesota, but spread until the entire frontier of the state was alarmed and settlers fleeing for protection. New Ulm was besieged, a battle fought, and a general Indian war lasting several years followed with Dakota for its battleground. Regarding the direct causes of this Little Crow outbreak, the historian of the Minnesota Society gives the following account:

The Indian reservation set apart by the treaties of 1851, a tract twenty miles wide on the upper part of the Minnesota River, embracing some of the finest lands in the state, was becoming a barrier to settlements in the Upper Minnesota Valley. Settlers had taken lands close up to the reservation, and there was considerable complaint that Indians were coming off the reservation and committing petty depredations, and the Indians had more or less complaint to make regarding the extortions practiced by the post traders. The encroachments of the whites were viewed with suspicion by the Indians, and sooner or later, from these causes alone, a conflict would probably have occurred. The War of the Rebellion, calling away so many of the able-bodied men of the state, left the frontier settlements almost defenseless, and doubtless causing the younger members of the tribes to become more offensive to the settlers and more exacting in their demands.

The lands embraced within the reservation under the treaty of 1851 were in the heart of Minnesota, and considering the forests and streams, were the choicest farming lands. The settlers on the border were anxiously coveting this Garden of Eden. A sentiment was created throughout the state that the Indians should abandon their tribal relations and become civilized. To this end the head men of the Dakota Nation were induced, in 1858, to go to Washington, under charge of the Hon. Joseph R. Brown, in whom they had great confidence, for the purpose of negotiating for the whole or part of this reservation. Treaties were signed, ceding the ten-mile strip on the north side of the river, upon the payment of $140,000, and the Government provided that every head of a family or single person over the age of twenty-one years, adopting a civilized life, should secure in fee eighty acres of land. From some cause the payments of $140,000 were never made; and there was great dissatisfaction on account of this treaty among those of the tribes who were averse to accepting the conditions of civilization. From the fact that there was no money divided among them on account of this relinquishment, a bitter dissension arose between the older chiefs and the younger members, the latter claiming that they had been robbed either by the chiefs or by the Government, and they proposed to have the settlement, peaceful or otherwise.

This internal strife was augmented from year to year by the withdrawal of families who were willing to accept the civilization fund, the number in three years succeeding the treaty amounting to 160 persons. They were, however, still annuity Indians, and claimed the right to be heard in the councils. The annuity Indians, all told, numbered about six thousand two hundred, and the annual cash payment to each person amounted to about fifteen dollars. The Indians were treated as wards of the United States. Two agencies were established around which were gathered storekeepers to sell the Indians goods in anticipation of the annuity payments; and usually, the annual payment was simply a settlement of the claims of the traders, who took the risk of furnishing the goods in advance. That there was injustice practiced upon the Indians is doubtless true; probably not so great as the disaffected Indians imagined. There was enough, however, to make the time of the annual payment an anxious period for fear of an outbreak. The failure of the Government in its attempt to punish the Spirit Lake murderers had a tendency to create a feeling among the leaders of the rebellious spirit that if they could only unite the whole body of Sioux in an uprising they could make a successful attack upon the settlers, and perhaps regain the lands formerly held by the Indians. The War of the Rebellion, starting in 1861, gave renewed energy to the discontent. The Indians were well aware of the reverses of the Union forces during the first year of the war. The calls for troops were taking the able-bodied men from the farms in all the northern states, and many of the half-breeds had volunteered for the army. All these conditions had a disquieting effect; and, added to this, in 1862 the June payment was not made; and as there was no satisfactory answer for the delay, the traders took the advantage of the necessities of the Indians, and insinuated that perhaps the Government would go to pieces and there would be no further payments. The missionaries endeavored to counteract these evil influences, and, with the aid of the civilized Indians, succeeded in averting a deliberate outbreak. The delay in payment of annuities, however, tended to keep up the discontent, particularly among the younger braves, who were the hunters. Their vagabond life brought them into the settlements, and in contact with the whites; and their worthless, lazy habits made them offensive to the families as beggars of meals or money, or anything that took their fancy.

These were, in brief, the circumstances that led up to the great massacre of 1862, which for a short time threatened the lives of all the settlers on the western boundary of the state. There was no concerted action for the massacre, and to some extent there is an uncertainty as to why the first murders were committed. Four young men, or boys, are believed to have commenced the massacre in a spirit of bravado, making a threatening attack first upon a family, driving them from their homes, and afterwards following them to a neighbor's house, where, after an altercation with the families, they killed three men and two women. These occurrences took place on the 17th of August, in the Township of Acton, twelve miles west of Litchfield. Realizing that if they remained in the vicinity punishment would soon overtake their murderous acts, they lost no time in going back to camp, relating what they had done, and asked protection. A hasty consultation was had between two of the chiefs; they realized that the murderers must be delivered up, or the annuities would be stopped, and a war of extermination inaugurated. They chose to stand by the murderers, and immediately following there was an uprising of the entire Sioux bands. So swift were their movements, before any effective resistance could be brought against them, that about eight hundred of the settlers, men, women and children, were murdered within a few days. The prompt action of the state authorities, aided by the National Government, resulted in the capture of about two thousand of the belligerent Indians, and the withdrawal of the remainder beyond the boundaries of the state, into the wilds of Dakota. Of the captured Indians 303 were found guilty of murder and rape, and were condemned to death by a military court martial, of this number 265 were reprieved by President Lincoln, and the remainder thirty-eight of the most prominent engaged in the massacre, were hung in Mankato on the 26th of December, 1862. The next year the Federal Government authorized an expedition against the Indians who had escaped to the Dakota plains.

This outbreak in Minnesota occurred about the middle of August, 1862, and was followed by the energetic organization of the Minnesota Militia, who under General Sibley hurried to the frontier and not only subdued the insurrection but made prisoners of a large number of the Indians and drove other large numbers westward into Dakota where a portion of them divided into small parties and began their depredations on the Dakota settlements.

Sioux Falls was the first in their path, and near that town on the 25th of August, they killed Judge J. B. Amidon and his son, William, who were at work in a hay field within a mile of the village.

MILITIA CALLED OUT

Governor Jayne, realizing the defenseless condition of the settlements in Dakota, by proclamation issued on the 30th day of August, 1862, called upon the settlers to organize military companies for their own protection and defense without delay. Here follows the governor's proclamation:

Whereas, The recent Indian outbreak and war in Minnesota, and the still more recent attack at Sioux Falls, and the murder in open daylight of one of our oldest and most respected settlers and his son, in their field within a mile of a place guarded by a detachment of Dakota cavalry, gives good reason to fear Indian depredations and warns us to prepare for defense.

It is ordered, that every male citizen in the territory between the ages of eighteen and fifty, shall at once enroll himself in a company to be formed for home defense, in his respective county, with such arms as he may have in his possession.

Immediately on the reception of this proclamation it is ordered that the citizens of Cole County assemble at Elk Point for the purpose of organizing a company for home protection. That the citizens of Clay County meet in the Town of Vermillion; that the citizens of Yankton County meet at the Town of Yankton; that the citizens of Bon Homme meet in the Town of Bon Homme; the citizens of Todd County will meet at the settlement at the mouth of the Running Water; and the citizens of Charles Mix County will meet at Pease's settlement.

I have already made a requisition on the commanding officer at Fort Randall for arms and ammunition which will at once be distributed among the companies formed. If a sufficient supply of arms cannot be had at Fort Randall, I will at once supply each company with arms from Fort Leavenworth.

The citizens of each county will, after assembling together, proceed to elect their own officers, who will be commissioned by me as soon as the returns of such election shall be received at the office. I will endeavor to secure from the Yankton Agency a few reliable Yankton Indians to act as scouts.

In witness whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my seal. Done at Yankton, this 30th day of August, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two.

W. JAYNE, Governor.

The governor proceeded immediately to appoint and organize his staff, Charles P. Booge was appointed adjutant general, and Robert M. Hagaman, aid-de-camp. General Booge appointed M. K. Armstrong, aid-de-camp; D. F. Bram-ble, brigade quartermaster; J. R. Hanson, judge advocate and Rev. Melancthon Hoyt, brigade chaplain.

Responding to the proclamation of the governor the citizens of Yankton assembled at the log church on the corner of Fourth and Linn streets, on Saturday, August 30th, at 8 o'clock in the evening, and proceeded to enroll themselves preparatory to organizing a company of militia. Enos Stutsman was made president of the meeting and G. W. Kingsbury, secretary. About sixty names were enrolled as fast as they could be written down, and twenty others were added as the settlers came in from their claims:

We here affix the names of the signers, all but twenty being present at the first meeting. The list includes every white male inhabitant of the county of lawful age, except the members of Company A, First Dakota, and the settlers at "the Lakes," which was a settlement of Norwegians founded in 1860. These people were cut off from Yankton by the early Indian raid, and were obliged to seek refuge in Nebraska. Had they remained in their settlement they would undoubtedly have met the war party, and all been slain.

Hoyt.

The meeting then elected A. S. Chase as temporary captain, adjourned until 2 o'clock the following day, and at once went to work fortifying a portion of the town.

The same night sentinels were stationed around the village, a precaution that was continued for several weeks.

The following day, which was Sunday, the adjourned militia meeting reconvened at the log church, and was called to order by President Stutsman, who stated that the object of the meeting was the permanent organization of the militia company. It was then resolved to select the commissioned officers by ballot. A vote was taken which resulted in the choice of F. M. Ziebach, captain; David Fisher, first lieutenant; and John Lawrence, second lieutenant. The non-commissioned officers were also elected, but the balloting was dispensed with, and they were selected by acclamation as follows: Orderly sergeant, B. F. Barge; second sergeant, Antonie Robeart; third sergeant, Samuel Mortimer; fourth sergeant, F. Wadsworth; first corporal, G. W. Kingsbury; second corporal, A. S. Chase; third corporal, Obed Foote; fourth corporal, H. T. Bailey; fifth corporal, D. T. Bramble; sixth corporal, J. C. Trask; seventh corporal, John Rouse; eighth corporal, Newton Edmunds.

The meeting then adjourned and its members immediately turned their attention to the construction of defensive fortifications that would afford security for the women and children, and furnish a rampart for the protection of the citizen soldiery in case of a general attack. It was decided to build a stockade inclosing a square whose dimensions would be about four hundred and fifty feet on each side, having the intersection of Broadway and Third Street as its central point. This would inclose a number of buildings, including the Ash Hotel, Paver's Store, Rossteuscher's Meat Market, Printing Office and Robeart's Saloon, which would afford shelter to the people in case of storms. Work was almost immediately begun. The original plan was to build the walls of the stockade with the prairie sod, excavating a wide and deep ditch outside, and building up a six-foot embankment. Probably the scarcity of other material suggested this. This plan was followed in building the north wall and would have been pursued further had there been time in which to complete it. On the 2d of September, Tuesday, a delegation, made up of William P. Lyman, Josiah C. Trask and John K. Fowler, of Company A, Dakota Cavalry, was sent up to Yankton Agency to interview men "Strike the Ree" and other leading Yanktons, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they were inclined to join in the hostilities or remain on friendly terms with the whites, for it was beginning to be suspected that many of the young men of the Yankton Tribe were already on the warpath but concealed their tribal identity under the Santee cloak.

A strong guard of sentinels was stationed around the stockade at night, and a mounted picket did duty as occasion demanded. Inside the stockade during the first few days of September there were in the neighborhood of sixty militiamen, all fairly well armed. During this time the people of Bon Homme came down adding quite a number of resolute men to the Yankton force.

On the 6th the delegation of citizens, Lyman, Trask and Fowler, who had been sent up to interview the Yankton Indians, returned. Acting upon the advice of some of Lyman's Indian friends, they had crossed to the south side of the Missouri on leaving the Yankton Agency and made the home trip on that side for the purpose of avoiding any hostile scouting parties that, it was suspected, were infesting the country on the Dakota side. The delegation brought a most disheartening report. Strike the Ree informed them that there was great danger of the young men of the Yankton tribe joining Little Crow. That he had used all his powers of persuasion to check the movement, but he feared that he would not be able to prevent it, and he felt it his duty to warn the people of Yankton, for whom he personally entertained friendly feelings, to abandon the town and leave the territory without delay.

This report tended to heighten excitement and increase the alarm. It was feared that the Yanktons had already taken the warpath and were even then hovering near their old camping grounds awaiting an opportunity to strike. The advocates of evacuation were growing in numbers, and heated discussions were frequent between those who wished to leave and those who did not. In the midst of this tumult of discussion, the married men, who had families in the stockade, held a meeting to determine whether to abandon their homes or remain and fight it out. There was a general consent that this class had the most at stake, and if they desired to leave it would be the duty of all to aid them in their departure and see them safely beyond danger. The meeting assembled in the street between the Ash Hotel and Robeart's, and was attended by every married man in town. The formality of choosing a presiding officer was neglected, and the discussion, pro and con, opened immediately. There was a vigorous expression of opinion. The advocates of leaving were very anxious to go, while the opposition were no less determined and the war of words at one time threatened to lead to blows when one brawny champion (Robeart) of leaving, threatened another who opposed him and who chanced to be the smallest man at the meeting (Griffith) with personal chastisement, if he didn't vote to leave. Threatening gestures and violent language was a feature of the remarkable gathering, and finally a vote was taken, which resulted in one majority for standing by the town. This deciding vote was cast by Mr. Griffith, whose marriage to Miss Maggie Stone a few weeks earlier we have already noted. This action seemed to quiet the discussion about leaving and though it did not prevent any from going who desired to, it had a good effect on the general sentiment.

On the morning of September 6th, just as the guard had been relieved, a courier from Sergeant English's camp, rode furiously into town bringing the alarming intelligence that a large band of Indians were committing depredations and firing upon the settlers along the east side of James River not over five miles from town. Following the trooper came Ferryman Greenway with a lumber wagon into which had been hastily thrown some articles of furniture, bedding and a mattress, himself and wife completing the load, and his foaming horses thundering into town at breakneck speed. He reported that he had been attacked by a band of Indians at his ferry house, and had returned their fire and was sure that he had killed at least one and wounded a number. As he was known to be a good shot and a man of unflinching courage, his story set the people ablaze with excitement.

Sergt. A. M. English, with a detachment of twenty men of Company A, Dakota Cavalry, encamped that morning on the high land overlooking the Jim River Valley about a quarter of a mile north of Major Hanson's place. He received a message shortly after daybreak from Captain Zeibach, requesting him to notify Captain Miner, who was at Vermillion, of the serious situation at Yankton and of the danger of hostilities from the Yankton Indians as reported by Lyman, Trask and Fowler. English at once dispatched Michael Fisher and Merrill Lathrop to Vermillion with this unpleasant information. When the couriers reached the ferry, Greenway had not yet left his bed, and their calls aroused him. As he left the house and started for the ferry, a dozen Indians suddenly arose from the grass and poured a volley of rifle and musket balls after him, but fortunately not a shot took effect. Greenway turned, ran back to the house, seized his rifle and screened by one corner of his cabin, returned the fire, shooting wherever he could see an Indian. Fisher made all haste back to English's camp.

The grass on the bottom was as high as his head with a horse under him, and as he approached he yelled "Indians, Indians," which apprised the boys, who had not yet breakfasted, that they had a foe to meet without delay. Fisher related the shooting affair at the ferry; and English, with eight men, including George Pike, Merrill Lathrop, Michael Fisher, P. C. Conway, H. J. Austin, and three others, set out for the scene of the trouble, leaving orders with the boys left in camp to at once remove their camp to Yankton. English reached the ferry just as Greenway and his wife crossed to the west bank, and the ferry man recrossed with English's squad, and then came on to town.

The Indians had then started down the east bank of the James to John Stanage's farm. Mr. and Mrs. Bradley and his brother John had stayed at Stanage's the night before. Since the excitement began Mr. Stanage and wife and children had either spent the night at Bradley's, or Bradley's people at the Stanage home, and this chanced to be Bradley's night at Stanage's. Bradley was an early riser. He was up early that morning and had walked down to the river bank for a pail of water. He heard a shout or a whoop up the road and looking in that direction saw a band of Indians approaching on horseback at full speed and making the air ring with their war whoop. As he ran for the house the Indians sent a volley of shots after him, but he got inside without being hit. The men at Stanage's had guns and kept them loaded for just such an emergency. The Indians surrounded the cabin and tried to force an entrance; but Stanage knocked some of the chinking out between the logs preparing to fire on them, when they pulled away to a safe distance. The occupants of the cabin were fearing that the Indians would set the building on fire as everything was very dry and would have burned readily. The Indians continued to shoot, their bullets lodging in the logs. Suddenly they set up a great hallo, and started off down the road. The cabin people then unbolted the door and heard the clatter of hoofs and the voices of white men who were coming down the road, and a good English voice yelled out "Stanage, are any of you alive?" It was English and his squad of cavalry in pursuit of the marauders. Mrs. Stanage says there was a great joy and a feeling of unspeakable happiness in her heart at this timely relief.

The soldiers followed after the Indians, who broke away from the river and took off through the tall grass toward the lake settlement, where they were able to protect themselves behind the deserted cabins of the Norwegian settlers, who had prudently removed a few days before to the banks of the Missouri, and many of them had crossed into Nebraska, deeming their homes at the lakes insecure.

A skirmishing fire, lasting an hour, followed, when the Indians made a successful break for a marshy grass grown spot below the lakes, where they were screened by the coarse slough grass, six to seven feet high, and were beyond the reach of the small pursuing force.

One Indian was killed in this skirmish. The soldiers escaped without a scratch and started on their return, gathering up the settlers along the valley, including Stanages and Bradleys, and escorted them to town. On their return trip it was learned that two war parties had followed English down the trail, but had disappeared on his return. Stanage, Bradley, Van Osdel, Old Dakota, in fact every white settler in the James Valley, came in with the soldiers, and all told the same story, and nearly all had lost their horses, which the Indians had driven off.

It was apparent that the danger was now imminent, and an attack upon the town was regarded as almost certain to be attempted. It then became necessary to abandon the construction of the earth wall defenses, which was slow work, and hasten the completion of the stockade with material that could be put up more rapidly. The lumber provided by Armstrong and Picotte for the new capitol building was confiscated, long posts were set in the ground at frequent intervals along the east and west walls, boards nailed on each side and the space between the boards filled in with earth. The south wall was built of cedar posts obtained from citizens who were getting ready to fence their lots. These were placed upright in the ground close together, and made a very formidable protection. In this wall in the center of the street, a wide gateway was built, and this was the only entrance or exit in the entire structure.

A bastion was constructed on the southwest and northwest corners of the stockade, about ten feet square, with suitable port holes that covered the four sides of the square. The entire work was completed before daylight the following morning, when many of its defenders seemed quite anxious for the foe to appear. One of the old frontiersmen, "old Dakota" from James River, with his gun resting in the hollow of his left arm, is quoted as saying that "I've affeared him Indians wouldn't come." It was now the 7th of September, and Yankton had been receiving accessions to its population since the beginning of the alarm which was at least a week before. The settlers of Yankton and Bon Homme counties were all gathered within or near the stockade as well as those from Sioux Falls. Quite a number of single men occupied the day outside the defense, but came inside at night. There were a large number of families, women and children. Some of them had brought along a few necessary articles of clothing, and some bedding, which they found a place for in some of the buildings or tents within the enclosure, which was now peopled with a population of at least three hundred.

Most of the Clay County settlers either crossed the river or went to Sioux City. A few families of French people living near the Missouri remained, not having learned of the Indian raids. A small company of soldiers under Captain Miner had been stationed at Vermillion; but Miner, upon receiving English's dispatches regarding the Jim River raid and the skirmish at the lakes, mounted his men and came on to the lakes, thence to Yankton. This left Vermillion without protection and the settlers left with the exception of Henry Kennerly and seven others who remained until near night when they repaired to a small island in the Missouri. During the night a detachment of Company A that had been stationed at Brule Creek reached Vermillion and the boys on the island came back into town and camped with them. The refugees almost wholly found their way back within a few days.

Nearly all the settlers of Union County, then Cole County, left their settlements and farms and went to Sioux City or to the Sioux River. At Elk Point Mr. Hotchkiss, Eli B. Wixson, Mr. Whitcomb and two or three others remained

The evacuation of the Brule Creek settlement was complete and is thus related by Mr. H. H. Fate, now of Elk Point, who resided with his parents in that settlement at the time:

During the forenoon of Saturday, September 1st, A. J. Bell borrowed a horse of Thomas Fate and went to Elk Point, returning in the afternoon with the intelligence that hostile Indians had made unfriendly demonstrations at Greenway's Ferry on Jim River, and were driving and destroying everything on their way down the Missouri Valley. An hour or two before sunset the whole neighborhood, with their teams of cattle and horses and herds of cattle were en route for Sioux City, arriving at Paquette's Ferry on the Sioux about midnight, where they lay until morning, when they were safely ferried over.

On Sunday morning, September 7th, a scouting party, consisting of M. M. Rich, Mahlon Gore, and I think William Frisbie, returned Sunday afternoon to Brule Creek by way of Elk Point and reconnoitered, returning Monday with the report that no particular damage had been done and the country was clear of Indians. On Tuesday morning most of the settlers started on their return to their homes, getting back Wednesday evening, and then organized a militia company for home defense with Mahlon Gore as captain. A stockade had been commenced before the stampede and was completed after the return from Sioux City. For the protection of settlers a detachment of Captain Miner's company was detailed there during the fall, or a part of it. A number of families lived within the stockade, including the pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Rev. J. L. Paine, who had for his circuit Brule Creek, Vermillion, Yankton, Bon Homme and Fort Randall.

The settlers of Bon Homme so far as was known, without an exception, abandoned nearly every thing and came to Yankton. This county (Bon Homme), because of its proximity to the Yankton Indian Reserve and the frontier, was more exposed than the others and had the Yanktons taken to the war path their first onslaught would have been on that settlement.

Many of the settlers sent their wives and children east, but themselves remained to assist in defending the settlements. After the first few days of feverish excitement, a more hopeful and cheerful feeling succeeded, and at Vermillion, Elk Point and Brule Creek, settlers constructed stockades and block houses and resolved to defend their possessions.

At Sioux City great anxiety also prevailed, and a number of families went back among their friends and relatives east to remain until the storm blew over.

The Norwegian settlers at the lakes (now Gayville) in Yankton County, abandoned their settlement, and fearing that the Indians had cut them off from reaching Yankton, made their way to the Missouri River, and crossed in a flat boat and skiffs to the Nebraska shore, under the direction of Ole Sampson. The Indians were driven through this settlement and into the tall slough grass by English's squad where they evaded pursuit. Had the settlers remained in their cabins it is probable that many or all of them would have fallen a prey to the merciless tomahawk of the savage, who returned to the cabins after English's force withdrew, slaughtered a number of hogs, and left some silent threatening messages in the form of arrows whose points were deeply imbedded in the logs of the cabins.

The Scandinavians, who had more than any other or all nationalities, occupied the bottom lands, exhibited heroic courage and fortitude in the face of all difficulties, and none of them were known to have left the territory or abandoned their claims permanently, during the Indian troubles, though for many months they were exposed to danger from the marauding bands of hostile Sioux.

It will be observed that the names of the Norwegian settlers at the Lakes do not appear among those enrolled in Company A, Dakota Militia which was organized at Yankton. Lewis Sampson, a brother of Ole, then a boy of twelve years, tells the following which explains their whereabouts.

On learning of the massacre at Sioux Falls about September 1st, we had crossed over to St. Helena, Nebraska, and were occupying the four company houses so-called at St. Helena, as they were built by a certain company to acquire titles to some lots, and we were comfortably situated there, only a little crowded. We had organized ourselves into a kind of company, with Ole Sampson as leader or captain. We had remained there about a week or so, all the time keeping in touch with the surrounding country the best we could, and had guards out at different points.

One day a man came on horseback, riding into town at full speed, and said that the Indians were about ten or twelve miles southeast of town coming this way and that they were killing everyone they got hold of and destroying and burning the property they found, and he started off again. He said he had to hurry up to notify all he possibly could. (Some weeks later it was ascertained that a band of white desperadoes, partially disguised as Indians, were the perpetrators of these outrages in Nebraska, but that they had killed none of the settlers.) We were frightened, of course, and especially the women and children, and they wanted to recross to the Dakota side again. After a short and speedy consultation it was agreed upon to cross to the other side, but we had placed some guards on the highest hills where they could have seen the Indians for miles had they come that way. The same morning we had sent two of our swiftest men, fairly well armed with our best guns and revolvers, up to the lakes where our Dakota homes were to see how things looked. They first arrived at Peter Amundson's place, but they found nothing there to indicate any disturbance, so they went on up to mother's place, Mrs. Ingeri Sampson, and there they found things different. They found fresh Indian tracks and foot prints all around the house and on top of the house.

Our house was a log cabin with sod roof. Two arrows were shot into the logs and left there, and going down to the stable they found two hogs, which were left in the corral, just butchered, the blood still being warm and everything taken away except the heads. This frightened the men and they took to their heels as fast as they could, all the time keeping a good lookout. Had our men reached there a half an hour earlier, they no doubt would have been killed. They could see no Indians and they had not the slightest idea which way they had taken, but were afraid that they might have taken their way towards the timber where we were, and every time they saw the grass, which was then as high and some places higher than a man, when they saw it move, they thought an Indian was hiding there. When they reached Ole Sampson's place, we were nearly all there and as soon as the men had told their story there was a wild rush for the river, and the women insisted on being crossed back to St. Helena again. On this side was the timber and tall grass and the Indians could sneak right up to a person and do anything to him, while at St. Helena we had pretty good protection, the grass was short and being located on a side hill we had a good outlook. There was a rush for the river and for the boats, and in their anxiety to get across the women crowded themselves with the children into the boats, which were not very good and overloaded them and one boat nearly sank as they reached the other shore, but we at last got safely over and then we commenced to cross over oxen, wagons and cows. We took nothing but the best, and what we got over (if we had then to lose the property we left) was to become common property belonging to the company or crowd. We remained there a while and hearing no more about the Indians, we all went back to our places which had not suffered very much during our absence. Some of the parties sold their improvements and left.

In regard to the Indians at mother's place, where they had killed two hogs, we found afterwards the following: A small party of soldiers were sent out from Yankton to Turkey Creek. I think Capt. A. M. English was in command of the men. At about where Volin is located they ran onto about thirty Indians and the Indians started to run across the bottom right towards mother's place and the soldiers on horseback followed them up. The Indians were also provided with guns and a constant fire was kept up on both sides. The Indians would run and load and turn to fire. When the Indians reached mother's cabin they danced a regular war dance around the house and on the roof, all the time keeping up firing. The soldiers did not have their horses well enough trained and some became unmanageable and the Indians having just as good rifles as the soldiers, they did not dare to approach them close enough to have their shots take effect. The soldiers rode up to the bluffs again and the Indians followed them right up. The soldiers went home and the Indians were not heard from any more in this section.

This account of the skirmish on the bottom near Turkey Creek or Volin has reference to another affair that occurred a few days later, and was participated in by the squad of Company A, stationed at Turkey Creek or Clay Creek under Lieut. Dave Benjamin. The squad under Sergeant English, or their return, stopped at all the cabins and escorted the settlers to the defenses at Yankton.

For a brief time, it will be seen, there was a virtual abandonment of all the settlements in the ceded territory, except the one at Yankton. Had Yankton been abandoned it would have left the territory without any population, the Indians would have been encouraged in their hostilities and would have burned and destroyed the improvements until checked by the military. It was no secret at the time that the leading military authorities favored the entire abandonment of the territory by the whites for the time being. They looked for a general Indian war of greater magnitude than any in which the Government had ever engaged, and they reasoned that if the settlements were abandoned, the troops would be free to follow and fight the redskins, and not be required to stand guard around a few widely scattered settlements whose entire money value was much less than it would cost to protect them. Soldiers at that time were in great demand in the Union armies east and south, and there were none to spare for troubles in Dakota.

As evening approached on the 6th inst., a genuine war scare occurred that for a time was a very serious affair. Captain Zeibach quietly moved around the stockade and ordered his men to get their arms and be ready for a fight; that a band of mounted Indians had crossed the James River and were marching on the town. The men shouldered their muskets and gathered along the unfinished fortifications on the east, Stutsman, who had but one leg to stand upon, leading the advance, with a nail keg in front of him upon which he rested his rifle. The heads of the enemy could now be discovered far down the road; and to add to the excitement of such an occasion, the women were on the lookout, having taken possession of a broad platform in front of the Ash Hotel, and were talking excitedly and pointing to the oncoming enemy. There was a good deal of hurrying and scurrying, and loud ejaculations, which continued for possibly fifteen minutes, when it was discovered by nearly everyone simultaneously that the supposed Indians were a body of soldiers, who a little later rode up to the stockade, and proved to be Captain Miner with his Vermillion detachment, who had come out to search for the hostiles in answer to the dispatches from Captain English. It is perfectly safe to say that the captain and his men were very welcome, and if any were disappointed they managed to conceal their chagrin most successfully behind a mask of cheerfulness that had all the appearance of the genuine article.

The decision of the married men's meeting at Yankton was well received. As a rule the settlers felt that they were in a position to defend themselves against a thousand red men, and unless their ammunition should fail, or suffering should come from lack of provisions, or a contagious disease broke out, they felt that they would "pull through" safely, and now they were hopeful that they would have the assistance of Company A to do the scouting. English's squad remained throughout the trouble and was a host in giving a feeling of security to the women and young people. They were in the saddle a good portion of the time so as to detect any indications of approach on the part of hostiles. So far there had been no loss of life, thanks to the poor marksmanship of the Indians and coolness of the assailed settlers, but a number of cabins had been burned, homes pillaged, and horses and cattle captured and driven away. All semblance of civil pursuits had been abandoned at Yankton at the outset of the trouble, the male population turning their attention to building their stockade and to strict military duties. The raw militia men were given frequent lessons in the rudimentary course of military discipline, the soldiers acting as drill masters—they were taught the use of arms and how to handle them. A small troop of cavalry was got together under command of Major Lyman, that made frequent excursions outside. Enclosed within the stockade was the new Ash Hotel, and the old log hotel buildings, Robeart's saloon, Fisher's blacksmith shop on Third Street, three log buildings and the Dakotan office. The women and children were made as comfortable as possible under the various roofs.

Food had been furnished from a number of sources—many of the people had brought along a few days' supply; all the provisions in the two stores were finally turned over to the commander of the stockade, Captain Zeibach, and duly receipted for. Captain Zeibach's authority was cheerfully recognized, and he acquitted himself throughout the most trying ordeal with great credit, growing in the confidence of the people every day. The saloon was closed and there was not the slightest disturbance from drunkenness.

Among the settlers none seemed to be more alarmed and uneasy than our half-breed Yankton citizen, Charley Picotte. He had probably no fear of personal injury, but he seemed convinced that the Indian hostilities had commenced in earnest, and would continue until the whites had been driven from the territory. He knew that the Santees were intriguing with the Yanktons to join them; he was certain that some progress had been made, and a few of the young bucks had left the reservation and gone into the hostile camp.

He had more information that he would impart to his white fellow citizens, and his conduct for weeks was that of a man watching for a sign of the enemy's approach, and informing himself of the whereabouts of the small bands who were known to be lurking in this vicinity, and with whom he undoubtedly held communication through three or four friendly Yanktons (who were visiting at his place during the trouble) with the view of averting their threatened attack on the town. Picotte usually spent the days at his cabin in lower Yankton, but he slept every night within the stockade.

On one occasion our eccentric townsman "Limber Jim," who didn't believe there would be much of a war and had very little fear of the Indians, took it into his head to burn the tall prairie grass around Stutsman's claim cabin which stood on the summit of a knoll just north of the present city water tanks. Hostile Indians have a code of signal fires to announce their attacks and retreats. Jim had appraised no one of his incendiary design. The sun had disappeared, and the curtains of night had begun to fall, when a great blaze was discovered around the cabin, and five minutes later Picotte came thundering through the gates of the stockade standing upright and bareheaded in a lumber wagon, to which was attached a span of foaming big mules. He had seen the signal fire on the hill and knew that it meant an attack upon the town without delay. The alarm was given and the garrison's defenders were preparing for the onslaught, when "Jim" returned and soon quieted all fear by telling in what manner he was the innocent cause of it all. There was that about the incident that was so supremely ludicrous that men who had refrained from all semblance of mirth for many days relaxed, and laughed until they were red in the face, and there were some, Picotte among the number, who thought it would serve Jim right to duck him in the river. Jim wobbled around, wiped his nose on his sleeve, and retired out of the gaze of the people, until both indignation and mirth were forgotten in more serious incidents that followed.

So many human beings penned up in such circumscribed quarters rendered anything like comfort out of the question, and the wonder is that there was so little sickness in the camp. There were some beds, but not enough to accommodate the women and little children, but what there were, by general consent, were given to the mothers and daughters and little people. The men were forbidden to occupy them. Still there were a few who would not heed the prohibitive edict, but would sneak into the hotel rooms after dark, possess themselves of a bed, lock the door and sleep soundly. The Ash Hotel was crowded from basement to garret during the night with weary women and children sleeping wherever they could find a place to lie down. They were packed in, apparently, as closely as sardines in the box. The other buildings inside the stockade need not be described regarding their lodging accommodations, for a description of one is a description of all.

Fortunately the nights, for a good portion of the time during the height of the excitement, were moonlit, and the skies were clear. One beautiful evening, the 8th or 9th of September, a militiaman was passing the Ash Hotel on Third Street, when a female voice called to him from an upper window of the hotel. He approached the house and discovered Mrs. Edgar, sister of Mrs. Obed Foote, sitting at the open window apparently enjoying the charming loveliness of the night. But she was not, it seems, indulging in any such pleasing reveries. She immediately and earnestly inquired if the militiaman had a pistol he would loan her. That very morning this party had placed an old single-barreled pistol in his coat pocket intending to have it repaired and made fit for service, and he replied to the lady telling her that he had such a weapon, but that it was useless in its present condition. She answered that she would be very glad to have it any way, that she would have it repaired. It was well known that many of the women would never submit to be taken prisoners by the Indians. They had learned how brutally white women prisoners were treated, and they had concluded to die by their own hands rather than be captured. Mrs. Edgar was one of these, and the militiaman understood that in the last resort she would turn the weapon upon herself. It was an uncomfortable reflection; but he drew the weapon from his pocket, placed the muzzle on the point of his bayonet, and passed it up. The lady received it with a bow, and the militiaman passed on. About two hours after this incident, at midnight, there came ringing out on the quiet air an ominous alarm. Bang, bang, bang, bang, in rapid succession four guns were fired outside the stockade, and down in the plum patch, near Picotte's, there was a fusillade of musketry. The whole camp was aroused almost instantly, and there was a rush to the four walls of the stockade and the bastions. Captain Zeibach had well prepared for any attack and had his men instructed as to the place they would occupy. The several walls were under the command of a subordinate officer. (A small three pounder iron cannon, mounted on cart wheels and loaded with powder and scraps of iron from the blacksmiths, stood near the gateway in charge of William Bordino and John Stanage.) A troop of cavalry went out to ascertain the cause of the alarm. At the Ash Hotel there was great commotion and confusion, resulting from the efforts of some to get out while others were trying to get in. The sleepers were all awakened by the confusion. The women supposed the stockade had been attacked, but they suppressed any exhibition of fear if they felt it—only the children awakened from their sound sleep cried, and were difficult to pacify. Mrs. Edgar, being awake, heard the alarm, and like a Joan of Arc, armed with her single barreled unloaded pistol, she declared she would shoot the first man she caught in the house who was not on his way out to defend the town. She went to all the rooms and awakened the occupants. She knew that some of them were occupied by men who had surreptitiously got possession. These she routed out and sent them forth at the muzzle of her gun. She did valiant service in cheering the other women, who felt strengthened and encouraged by her example.

In half an hour the cavalry returned, having found that the friendly Yanktons at Picotte's had been firing on a party of Santees who were trying to steal their ponies. A feeling of relief came over the camp, but the men were kept on duty during the night and were not further disturbed. The three pounder field piece that stood near the gateway of the stockade was not called into service during this troublous time. There was no occasion to use it against the foe, but a month later, after the danger had measurably melted away, the cannon was taken out on the prairie where the tall weeds were abundant, and touched off. If the slaughter of the weeds and grass could be taken as representing Indians, the discharge would have slain a regiment.

Captain Zeibach proved himself a very competent commander in chief, and his administration was of a character that won for him the warmest gratitude of the penned-up colony.

THE GREAT INDIAN WAR

Yankton had had a very fortunate and narrow escape from much more serious trouble. During J. R. Hanson's incumbency of the United States Agency for the Upper Missouri Sioux Indians, which covered a period from 1866 to 1869 inclusive, he was thrown in contact with individuals from all the former hostile tribes, and learned much of interest regarding the operations of the hostiles during the period from 1862 to 1865. Among other things, he learned that about five hundred hostile Sioux were scattered along the Jim River north of the ferry and within a distance of three or four miles of Yankton, early in September, 1862, for the purpose of attacking and destroying the town and the people. They had set the night of September 6, 1862, for the attack and had noticed that our fortifications were at that time not completed on the east side. Such a force, if determined and persistent, and well armed, would have outnumbered Yankton's armed force, which could not have exceeded one hundred and twenty-five armed with guns, and as many more who had small arms. About 6 o'clock the same evening, Captain Miner with forty cavalry reached Yankton from Vermillion. The hostile Indians on the highlands to the north saw the troops, watched their movements carefully and finally concluded not to make the attack, as they were not supplied with ponies. Fearing discovery, they set out up the James River Valley the following morning and made their first halt near the Yankton reservation.

Intelligence of a similar character was afterwards given by some Yankton Indians and also by Santees, for while the Yanktons remained friendly as a tribe, bands of hostiles paid them a number of clandestine visits for the purpose of inducing them to join in the war on the white people, and during these visits related their exploits.

The Indians dug a lookout station on the top of the hill near Van Antwerp's residence from which they overlooked Yankton and scanned its defenses. There were other points on the highlands where they screened themselves and watched their pale-faced adversaries as they prepared to give them a hot reception should they attack the town. A little later Picotte reported that the danger was past for the present, and the Indians had withdrawn. He called attention to a number of small fires strung along the highlands at intervals of half a mile, which had been observed the evening before to the north of town. He said these were signals which Indians understood and were to inform the hostiles that the siege of Yankton had been raised, and the war parties were retiring into the country of the Upper Jim. A few days later a small band of the boldest settlers, well armed, went out to their claims for the purpose of ascertaining the condition of their live stock and homes, and day by day thereafter, the population of the stockade diminished in numbers, some returning to their deserted cabins, while others, thoroughly disheartened and almost penniless, "threw up the sponge" and bid a final farewell to the territory.

These Indian troubles had aroused widespread distrust and fear all through the new West extending far into Iowa, Minnesota and Nebraska. The general belief was that an Indian war, unparalleled in extent by any in recent times, was inevitable, and particularly was this the belief of those engaged in military affairs, who were outspoken in proclaiming it, as if they felt constrained to give a warning to the settlers of their danger, and arouse them to a sense of their insecurity, that they might escape the perils incident to a frontier war by removing to some less hazardous or dangerous locality. It was understood that the Indian people of all nations and tribes throughout the entire country had been apprised of the great war then on between the "pale faces" of the North and South, and the Indians had been advised that this was an opportune time for them to unite and strike a blow that would drive the whites from the frontiers and restore to the native inhabitants their old hunting grounds. It must be borne in mind that this state of hostility among the Indians extended from Kansas through Nebraska and Dakota to Minnesota, and throughout the mountain country. The Indians had apparently been convinced that the "Great Father" would not be able to spare enough soldiers from the Union armies to successfully oppose them, and their triumph, if united, was assured.

Dakota had but a few feeble settlements, strung along the Missouri and Big Sioux valleys, peopled by a frugal, industrious, peace-loving class who had little more than their strong arms to depend upon to win the necessities of life for themselves and those dependent upon them, and it should not be considered at all remarkable that a large percentage of the settlers, anxious for the security of their families, concluded to seek a home where the promise of peace was less hazardous; and it was estimated, shortly after the local troubles of 1862, that the territory lost at least one-half its farming population.

The determined stand taken by the pioneers had not been without a most salutary effect upon the good Indians. They had become convinced, by the firm attitude and ample preparation Yankton had exhibited, that the whites would not be driven off. The story of Yankton's preparations for defense was afterwards known and discussed in Little Crow's camps, and in many of the Indian camps along the upper river, as was learned from reliable Indian sources after peace was restored, and the fortifications and other particulars described with an accuracy that could only have been obtained by eye witnesses. So far as the Yankton Indians were concerned they were completely tamed, and Strike-the-Ree no longer feared that any great number of his young men would join the hostiles. To such an extent was the loyalty of the Yanktons carried that Agent Burleigh, with the assent of the authorities, raised a company, numbering 100, of young braves, for service against the hostiles. They were mustered into the service, and made themselves of great value to General Sully during his campaigns as scouts, and in frequent skirmishes throughout the two years following.

Mr. Washington Reed moved his family from Smutty Bear into the stockade during the excitement, and as soon as the alarm had in a measure subsided, he returned with his wife and sons to his claim. They were accustomed to border life and had little apprehension for their personal safety, but were solicitous for their cattle and horses and other property left behind with no one to look after it. The morning following the departure of the Reeds, Captain Miner, who had come up from his headquarters at Vermillion, received a message from Mrs. Reed that her husband and two sons were missing, having left home the evening before to search for their cattle. The captain dispatched Sergeant English with a squad of Company A's boys to look up the truants. About an hour before this, Sergt. William Neuman, of Company A, a tall German and a fearless soldier, had discovered that his horse had strayed away and he set out on foot to find the animal. His search led him as far away as the cement works' ravine. Still another party, made up of Samuel Mortimer (Spot), Sam Jerou and A. B. Smith, who had spent the night at Spot's cabin just above Reed's, had learned that the Reed men folks were missing and that Mrs. Reed was in great distress fearing that Indians had waylaid them; and being men of intrepid mold who could not close their ears to the cries of a woman in distress, they sallied out on fleet ponies in quest of the lost. Just as "Spot" and his party had got fairly under way, English and his cavalry emerged from the timber and came in sight of them. Spot's forces were about two miles in advance, and Sergeant English saw at once that they were a band of Indian marauders and possibly had the scalps of the Reed men dangling at their belts. They now put spurs to their steeds and fairly flew up the road in pursuit. Spot and his gallant band had not as yet discovered that they were pursued, so intently had their attention been directed to an Indian on the brow of a hill near the cement works ravine, and with all the speed their ponies could muster, goaded by whip and spur and urgent shouts, they were furiously galloping to overtake him, for no doubt he was standing there as a decoy for quite a band who were hidden in the tall grass around him, and had already tomahawked the Reed people. The cavalry ponies at breakneck speed were gaining on Spot's detachment, and the report of a rifle shot told that one of the boys had opened fire. Spot and his chivalrous companions were arrayed in the ordinary garb of border men and closely resembled children of the plains. The cavalry boys had donned some bright red flannel shirts that had been issued that morning and under the enchantment of distance, if hurriedly viewed, looked very much like a band of fleeing or pursuing savages. The report of the gun caused Spot and his men to look around when they discovered the red devils coming after them. Here was a situation perilous in the extreme. Indians in front and rear; the Missouri River on the left, and frowning, precipitous bluffs on the right. Spot afterwards declared that he had just decided upon striking for a near by ravine and trying to escape by the bluff, when he discovered that the lone Indian on the bluff was a white man like himself, and putting more energy into whip and spur his small force sped along with the speed of race horses toward the solitary figure on the hill, expecting every moment that the attack in their rear would be renewed. At this juncture Sergeant English discovered the lone Indian on the highland, and could not fail to note that "Spot" and his followers were making the utmost haste to reach him. He saw in an instant that it was all one party, who had doubtless disposed of the Reeds and had probably been engaged in other atrocities. Spot had now reached the lone Indian and the barbarous cut throats were holding a parley, as English could see, though now about a mile away, and he conjectured that they were preparing for a rapid retreat into the ravine, where under cover of the bushes they could keep up a running fight, and where cavalry would be at a disadvantage. He was very anxious to reach them before this could be accomplished, and on his troopers dashed, their good steeds reeking with foam, and their sabers clanging, as they thundered along the road. An order to open fire was just about to be given, when English discovered a bright gleam of sunlight reflected from the scabbard of Sergeant Neuman's saber, and the flash informed him that the lone Indian on the bluff was the sergeant himself in quest of his lost horse. Chief Spot and his men then resolved themselves into distinguished shapes. The recognition was a mutual one and not unpleasant, for just then the bluff party began a burlesque performance as if defying the oncoming cavalry to battle; and when the soldiers rode up the comedy of errors, which for a time threatened a tragedy, was fully explained.

And what about the Reeds? They had reached home safely, and explained that they had discovered the trail of their straying herd the evening before, and camped out during the night in order to follow it up early in the morning, which they did and soon recovered their animals. Some one asked Neuman if he wasn't frightened when he saw so many Indians bearing down upon him, and he replied that he knew they were white people—he could distinguish them from Indians as far as he could see them. Neuman recovered his horse, and the incident furnished a great deal of cheerful gossip and wholesome fun, and aided in dispersing the apprehensions of many who believed that the hostile Indians were hovering near the settlement. It strengthened the faltering and furnished a strong point for the "never surrender" faction.

While the immediate excitement and alarm had measurably subsided, there was a prevailing sentiment of insecurity and danger that foreboded ill for Dakota. The settlers who had gone back to their claims were not in a contended or hopeful frame of mind. They looked for further trouble, and were easily convinced that the savages were still lurking near their homes. Reports that small bands of Indians had been seen at different points reached Yankton very soon after the settlers had ventured back to their claims, and urgent appeals were made to the governor for troops at various points. Company A, Dakota Cavalry, was the only body of government troops in the territory outside of Fort Randall, and this company was engaged in patrolling the frontier reaching from the Big Sioux River to Choteau Creek, a distance of a hundred miles. The emergency demanded a large force, and detachments scattered through the settlements in permanent camps, where they could inspire the exposed settlers with a feeling of security, otherwise it was feared that the entire farming population would abandon the territory. The alarming reports and the feeling of insecurity were regarded by many who were more securely located in the towns, as the echoes of the previous troubles; but there could be no doubt that whether the sentiment of insecurity was from real or imaginary causes, the situation was one that threatened the stability of the farming communities, whose loss at such a time meant years of waiting before their places would be filled.

Urgent efforts were made by the governor to secure troops from outside but he was not successful, owing to the demands of the Civil war; and appreciating the pressing necessity and the train of misfortunes that would follow if the fears of the settlers were not quieted, he resolved to call into actual service several companies of territorial troops, and trust to the general government subsequently sanctioning his act and paying the bills. This had been done in Nebraska and the militiamen were employed in constructing forts and block houses at exposed points in the settlements and were encouraged by an officer of General Pope's staff who was personally in the field directing operations. The headquarters of this department, under General Pope, were at St. Paul and communication, which was altogether by mail, and a large part of the way by stage, was tediously and sometimes dangerously slow and difficult. Dakota was the home of all the hostiles at this time, and to protect her borders was, in effect, to protect the entire western frontier. But the other border states and territories excelled Dakota in political influence, and obtained the lion's share of attention from the military authorities, though barely within the field of actual danger. The order of the governor calling for these volunteers is here given:

SPECIAL ORDER

Headquarters Dakota Militia.

Yankton, Dakota Territory, October 7, 1862.

Whereas, Indian depredations have recently been committed within the limits of our territory, and a feeling of anxiety and insecurity prevails among the inhabitants, which is rapidly depopulating the territory, and having applied by a special messenger to General Blunt, commanding the Department of Kansas, for troops from without our limits to protect our settlements, and owing to a change in this military department the application not having yet been complied with;

Therefore, believing that longer delay will endanger the lives and property of our inhabitants, it is hereby ordered that the militia shall forthwith enter upon active service. I have concluded to accept eight companies of volunteer militia—four companies of infantry and four of cavalry—to serve for nine months unless sooner discharged.

This force will be tendered to Major General Pope for his acceptance into the United States service for the said term of nine months.

The officers and men of the cavalry companies will be required to furnish their own horses, equipments and clothing, until such time as the same can be furnished them. Rations will be furnished the men as soon as they are accepted by me.

The pay will be the same as allowed to similar companies in the United States service.

Those militia companies in the territory now organized will be accepted as soon as tendered with a full complement of men—which requires by law thirty men as the minimum number for cavalry, and forty for infantry.

In addition to those companies now organized, other companies will be accepted until the full number is obtained. Rendezvous will be designated to each company as soon as it shall be accepted.

It is hoped that in this time of danger to our frontier, and national embarrassment, that our citizens will promptly respond to this call, and defend their firesides from the outrages of the Indians, and restore to our inhabitants that quiet and security which but recently prevailed, and reestablish Dakota as a safe and inviting home to the emigrant.

WILLIAM JAYNE,

Governor and Commander-in-Chief of Militia of Dakota Territory.

The work of raising and perfecting the companies called for by the governor's proclamation was immediately entered upon. Commissions had been issued prior to this time, to T. Elwood Clark, as second lieutenant to recruit cavalry; A. J. Bell, as captain of Company D, to recruit infantry; M. H. Somer, as first lieutenant, Company D; Wm. W. Tripp, as captain, to recruit cavalry, and all these parties had been at work with more or less success. Adams had raised twenty-seven men in the County of Cole; John R. Wood, of Elk Point, was later commissioned as a lieutenant to recruit cavalry, and Capt. A. G. Fuller, then of Fort Randall, as captain to recruit cavalry. At the same time the first militia companies maintained their organizations. These were Company A, Yankton, Capt. F. M. Ziebach; Co. B, Bon Homme, Capt. Samuel Gifford; Company C, Vermillion, Capt. A. W. Puett; Company D, Elk Point, Capt. A. J. Bell; Company E, Brule Creek, Capt. Mahlon Gore; Company F, Yankton, Capt. A. G. Fuller. Fuller's company was intended for the volunteer service, and it was expected that it would be mustered in as Company C, Dakota Cavalry. The work of recruiting was very slow and discouraging, and in the meantime alarm had measurably subsided and the military authorities had provided additional protection to the settlements.

None of the militia companies under the proclamation of October 7 were accepted by the governor; in fact the recruiting of so many companies was found impossible, and on the 13th of December the governor issued an order consolidating Company C. Capt. A. G. Fuller recruited at Bon Homme; a company recruited by Lieut. W. W. Adams, of Elk Point, twenty-seven men; and a company recruited in Cole County by Capt. A. J. Bell, twenty men, into Company B. Dakota Cavalry for the regular volunteer service, and this company under Capt. William Tripp was mustered into the service of the United States at Sioux City in April, 1863. These detachments, however, had regularly performed military duty from about the 1st of September, 1862, and their claims for service were recognized by the government and the troops received pay and subsistence for several months prior to being mustered in.

After the excitement and trouble had subsided, an attempt was made to deny the authenticity of the report made by the delegation of Yankton citizens who were sent up to Yankton Agency to ascertain the feeling of those Indians toward the settlers. It was now apparent that the Yanktons as a tribe had resisted the importunities of the hostiles, and had remained true to their treaty obligations, but there is little doubt that this was largely due to the active work of Agent Burleigh, at Yankton Agency, and the Minnesota and Dakota troops in pursuing and scattering the hostile bands who had fled from Minnesota into Dakota. The Yanktons observing this were impressed with the hopelessness of Little Crow's cause and took early occasion to reinstate their reputation as "friendlies" and denied that they had ever been in the least infected with the hostile spirit, even claiming that the report made by the Yankton delegation placed them in a false light. But the character of the men who composed that delegation, and the entire lack of any motive on their part to misrepresent, in fact all the circumstances of their visit, and the friendly counsel given them on leaving, to return on the south side of the river, all forbids even a suspicion that the report they made was other than a truthful statement of the situation revealed to them by the head-chief with the warning he sent to his friends and people of Yankton.

During the fall of 1862, Captain Fuller, assisted by Lieut. David Fisher of Company A Militia, erected the walls of an excellent hewn log block house on the Ash Hotel lots north of the hostelry, facing Broadway. It was a very substantial fortification, impregnable to any arms at that time in use by the redmen. It was designed for two stories and to accommodate 100 people. It was never completed because Yankton became a military camp about that time, with Iowa, Minnesota and Nebraska troops coming and going and the block house was deemed unnecessary.

CHARLES FRANCOIS PICOTTE

Charles F. Picotte, who has been so conspicuous and useful in the affairs of the territory up to this time, was a Yankton half breed Indian, six feet tall and straight as an arrow. His complexion was rather dark even for a half breed, but not more so than was usual where one of the parents was a native Frenchman, and this parent as a rule, the father. The father of Charles was Honore Picotte, a wealthy citizen of St. Louis, and one of the directors and active members of the American Fur Company. He is said to have been a native of Canada; but there was a good sprinkling of native French people in St. Louis, families who had quietly sought our shores during the French Revolution to escape the civil discords and violence that characterized the government of that unhappy country during the close of the eighteenth and opening of the nineteenth centuries. St. Louis at that time was the greatest commercial mart of the West, and belonged to France, and the French immigration for years made that city and New Orleans objective points, and many of the immigrants took up their permanent homes there feeling that they were forever exiled from their native land.

The mother of Charles Picotte was a full-blooded Yankton Sioux and one of the belles of the tribe. Her son Charles was born during the year of 1830, near the mouth of the Big Cheyenne River, while his mother was making a trip on one of the Fur Company's boats. Mrs. Picotte afterwards married Charles E. Galpin. She had other children, but her affection for Picotte's son was sincere and lasting. The father also took a very lively interest in his half breed progeny, something not common in that day for the sires of half-bloods to do, and when Charles had reached the age of eight years or thereabouts he was placed in the care of Rev. Father De Smet, who at that time was foremost among the Christian missionaries in this Dakota field, and this reverend priest took the boy with him to St. Joseph, Missouri, and enrolled him in an excellent private boarding school.

He remained there at school about fourteen years all told (occasionally taking a steamboat ride to visit his mother during the summer vacations). He acquired during this time a very good education, and a very fair knowledge of the rules of commercial business, as his father had in mind putting him in charge of one of the Fur Company's trading posts; and he also learned to speak the English language well, though not fluently. At the age of twenty-four he returned to his mother's people and became identified with the welfare of the tribe.

His Indian nature and Indian affections had been very slightly, if at all, affected by his long absence and residence in the midst of a highly civilized and cultivated people. During all the school period his heart was in the rude tepee with his mother, which he claimed was the only real home he ever knew; and he yearned for the freedom which characterize the Indian customs and mode of life, and to be relieved from the bondage of social restraint which grew more irksome as he grew older. He was fond of relating incidents of his childhood days, passed among his own people, when as a papoose his devoted mother packed him on her back. He had always a warm corner in his heart for his maternal ancestor, but seldom referred to his father, with whom he never had a familiar personal acquaintance. The father, however, it is said, did not grow unmindful of the welfare of the mother or his son, showing his paternal affection and interest by a cheerful readiness to provide sumptuously for their comfort. For a few years after leaving St. Joseph, Charles took employment from Maj. C. E. Galpin, who was engaged in the Indian trade at Fort Pierre, and who had now become the husband of Mr. Picotte's mother. He also attended to business affairs for other traders, all of whom testified to his integrity and diligence. In the meantime his acquaintance with his own people was growing more extensive and their interests were increasing in value and importance. Picotte's education gave him great advantages in the eyes of the Indians, who attributed to him many good qualities he did not possess and also vastly overrated his influence with the whites; but Picotte, if he understood this, was not disposed to undeceive his kindred. On the contrary he did what he could to justify the confidence they had in him, and circumstances at this time greatly favored the chief who possessed knowledge, over those whose principal recommendation was their valor and prowess on the war path and the number of scalps they had taken. As early as 1854 negotiations were set on foot to secure a treaty of cession with the Yanktons, and from that time until the treaty was finally made as heretofore noted, Picotte, Strike-the-Ree, and others were frequently besieged by small delegations of white men who came to secure their influence in favor of a treaty. Scores of shrewd business men in the Missouri Valley at Sioux City and below were then figuring on this project with the view of self enrichment. They were not working in unison, however, not even with any knowledge possibly that there were others after the same big prize. But their efforts to enlist Picotte and Old Strike in their schemes were unavailing. These two Indians, one educated according to the customs of the whites and the other gifted with great shrewdness and thought by large experience, made a very strong working force and easily controlled the situation among their own people. Between these two there was a full and frank understanding and they worked together harmoniously, never having the slightest open disagreement. Old Strike was a chief selected by his own people and also recognized as the principal chief by the "Great Father" at Washington, and Picotte had also received a chief's medal from President Buchanan. But while they turned a deaf ear to all other treaty makers they were glad to entertain the proposition when it came from Captain Todd and were not long in perfecting an agreement with the Todd party that finally secured the assent of the Indians and was acceptable to the Government. It was not entirely satisfactory to all Yanktons. There were some bands that did not want to treat and still they treated, but they were never satisfied or placated. In addition to his influence and labors in making the treaty, Picotte was of great value as a peace maker and peace restorer. The first agent, Redfield, was not the right man in the right place on all occasions, and was frequently in trouble; even his life was in jeopardy on more than one occasion and a plot to burn his house and massacre the inmates was discovered and frustrated by this white man's friend, Picotte. His good offices to Redfield, however, were not prompted by personal regard for the two seldom agreed and Picotte had no confidence in and little respect for the agent.

The liberal grants made by the treaty had placed Picotte in an independent position so far as his material welfare was concerned, and under ordinary good management his landed estate would have made him the wealthiest man in Dakota, to say nothing of the $30,000 paid to him in cash during the ten years succeeding the making of the treaty. But Picotte was not disposed to conserve his opportunity, and instead of bestowing upon his estate the care of "ordinary good management" he seems to have given it no other consideration than to study how rapidly he could dispose of it. He became a good liver. His annuity of $3,000 paid him by the Government was, as a rule, expended before he received it, and he began very early to dispose of his landed property. Dr. W. A. Burleigh bought an undivided half of it in 1863, and Hon. W. P. Dale, commissioner of Indian affairs at that time, bought an eighty-acre tract.

Picotte entertained lavishly and generously, but his hospitalities were confined exclusively to his Indian kindred and Indian friends. He had cousins by the score and numerous aunts and uncles and nephews and nieces; also a family of his own. He had built a very comfortable home on the corner of the levee or Front Street and the street which bears his name, and here one could see on most any day of the year from three or four to a dozen Indian guests—men and women and papooses who were very royally entertained by Etakecha, as they called their great hearted host. This mode of dispensing his fortune might have set a good pace for Mr. Carnegie who is conscientiously opposed to dying rich, but who doubtless has never learned the method Mr. Picotte made use of, and which all too soon bore the inevitable result. There was a limit to Picotte's purse and he was not many years in finding the bottom of it. But in the meantime he had made himself very popular with the members of his tribe and seemed to regard the separation that had taken place between his fortune and himself with great complacency. And now when the time came that he was obliged to retrench and close forever his hospitable doors, there was a fervent and hearty welcome for him at Greenwood on the Yankton reservation, and thither he repaired in a cheerful frame of mind to spend the remainder of his days with his own people. He became a government interpreter, and partially discarded the raiment of the whites to which he had so long been accustomed, and put on the traditional blanket as more befitting his racial character and his station. Here he remained to the close of his life, the principal chief of his people, possessing their complete confidence. He died at his home in Greenwood. His wife and two sons, Henry and Peter, survived him and are still living near their old agency home.

SANTEE CAPTIVES RESCUED

December 31, 1862, an ambulance reached Yankton from Fort Randall, bringing two women and six children, who had been taken prisoners by the hostile Santees during the Little Crow massacre in Minnesota a few months previous, and had been in captivity between four and five months. They were cared for at the New England house, the name given to the White Union Hotel. They were on their way back to Minnesota and Iowa where they had relatives and friends, but they were not going home, for they had none—their homes had been destroyed during the early days of the Little Crow outbreak and they were taken prisoners by a band of Santee Indians August 22, 1862, at Lake Shetek, Minnesota. The Indians, after securing their captives, set out across the prairies for the Missouri River, and for several days traveled as fast as the women could be compelled to walk. The youngest girls were carried at times to facilitate the march, but the oldest of the children and the two women walked the entire distance to the Missouri. There were five half-breeds captured with the whites but they managed to escape. The names of these released prisoners were Mrs. Julia Wright, wife of John A. Wright, and her daughter, aged five years; Mrs. Laura Duley and her daughter, aged nine years; a little niece of J. M. Duley, aged five years; also Rosanna and Ella, daughters of Thomas Ireland, aged nine and seven years, and Lilla, daughter of William Everett. The husband of Mrs. Duley was killed during the massacre. He was one of the pioneers of Sioux Falls who had returned to Minnesota. The captives, as they were called, received a cordial welcome at Yankton, and the ladies of the city very soon made them as comfortable as it was possible to do, and provided them with ample and suitable apparel which they sadly needed. They had remained about two weeks at Fort Randall on their way down, where they were tenderly cared for, and the rest they enjoyed had done much to improve the health and appearance of the women; but all of them, including the children, plainly exhibited the baneful effects of the life they had been compelled to lead during their captivity. It had been a period of continual privation and exposure for all of them. It is not necessary to chronicle here the statements made by the women regarding the treatment they were subjected to. It differed in no essential feature from the customary treatment white women receive when made captive by hostile Indians. It is sufficient to say that it was a marvel how they endured it all and came out of it alive. Both these women were quite intelligent and ladylike, and keenly felt the indignities and outrages they had suffered. The party remained here a week, and in addition to some individual donations, a collection amounting to $40 was taken up for them at the Sunday evening service of the Episcopal Church. Mr. Wright joined his wife here, and on Wednesday, the 7th of January, the entire party took their departure by stage, the Wrights going back to Minnesota, and Mrs. Duley and her children going to Cedar Falls, Iowa. The other children were taken to Minnesota, but it was not known whether their parents were living. In case they were slain, the children were to be given into the care of near relatives.

The discovery of these captives and the manner of their release will now be of much interest to the reader.

It will be recalled that as rapidly as possible, after the Little Crow outbreak, a body of mounted Minnesota troops was sent out against the hostiles, the main body of whom retreated into the northern portion of Dakota Territory, in the direction of Devil's Lake. The party having these women and children as prisoners did not take that direction, but followed generally a westerly course, and struck the Missouri River about one hundred miles above Fort Pierre, near Standing Rock, early in October, and went into camp on the west side. The chief of the band was known by the name of White Lodge. Here they were located when Maj. Charles E. Galpin, with his wife, a Yankton Indian woman and mother of Charles F. Picotte, came down the river about the middle of November. Galpin, with eleven white men and Mrs. Galpin, had left Fort Benton, in a Mackinaw boat, about two weeks before and were coming through to Yankton. On the trip Mrs. Galpin was delivered of a child that had afterwards died on the boat, and the major designed to take the little body to Fort Pierre and bury it, that place having been a former home. The Santees at White Lodge's Camp induced the Galpin party to land, much against the major's wishes, as he knew their hostile character and had little faith that his wife and himself would be able to protect the others who were white passengers. But there seemed no alternative. The first intention of the Santees was to massacre the whole party, but a young Indian who had known Mrs. Galpin interposed and succeeded in having the massacre postponed until he could have an interview with Mrs. G. In this interview Galpin learned about the female prisoners, and also that a much larger band of Santees numbering 450 lodges were in camp a few miles below, and that there were three Yanktonnais Indians with them. A further parley and an armistice was arranged until the Yanktonnais Indians could be sent for. While the courier was absent to bring up the Yanktonnais, Galpin improved the time by enticing a number of Indians aboard the boat and managed to have them sit in such positions as would screen the occupants of the boat should the Indians on shore shoot. In about an hour the Yanktonnais came up and proved to be friendly to the white passengers, urging the Santees to let them go. For a long time their intercessions fell on deaf ears. The Santees wanted white man's blood, and here was an opportunity to get their fill of it without much risk to themselves. It seems that the object of the visit of these Yanktonnais to the Santee Camp had been to make an offensive alliance against the whites—the Yanktonnais, except Big Head's band, not having declared themselves at this time; and as a last resort the Yanktonnais informed the Santees that all negotiations were off unless the Galpin party was released. This brought them to terms—the whites were released. Having escaped this peril, the next danger was the big camp of Santees four miles below. The three Yanktonnais remained aboard the Mackinaw and when they came into view of the Santee Camp there was a great shouting and halloing, drums were beating and the Indians cocked and leveled their guns at the boat to bring it ashore. Galpin saw that he must land or they would probably all be killed, the Indians being well armed, and he turned the boat in shore. As soon as he reached the bank the three Yanktonnais jumped out, seized the boat and pushed it back into the river, telling Galpin to go on regardless of the threat of the Santees. The Yanktonnais did not care to risk another parley with this large party, but felt confident that they could restrain the Santees from firing on the boat, and they did. Just as the Galpin party had got fairly started a white woman came running down the bank of the river and implored him to release her. This he was powerless to do, but promised to send a ransom after he reached Fort Pierre that would secure her release and that of the other prisoners. She told him her name, which he did not hear distinctly but he understood her to say that she was a daughter-in-law of John Price or Rice, of Green County, Illinois. In the meantime the three Yanktonnais were able to prevent any attack on the boat by the Santees. As soon as practicable after the Galpin party reached Fort Pierre, where the major had a trading post, he sent a delegation to purchase the prisoners, who took with them twenty horses and a large supply of provisions with which to pay the ransom. It was learned at Fort Pierre that the prisoners numbered two women and six children. The band of Santees having them in custody was under the command of White Lodge. The foregoing particulars were learned from the lips of Major Galpin who arrived at Yankton in his Mackinaw on the 23d of November, remaining here one day, when he went on east intending to visit Washington and urge the importance of more troops and military posts in the upper country. This the major did, returning to Yankton in January, and after a brief stay went up the river intending to get through to Benton as early as possible.

About the middle of November, Major Pattee, who was stationed at Fort Randall, fitted out a winter expedition for the purpose of reconnoitering in the hostile Indian country, in according with orders received from commanding General Pope. He was instructed to ascertain the whereabouts of Little Crow and his army of hostiles, and any other information that would be of value to the forces, who were to be led against these Indians in the spring. Pattee was also instructed to secure the release of white prisoners, without defining any particular individuals. A large number of captives were made in Minnesota, and as many as ninety had been recovered from Little Crow's main army. Major Pattee's military force was made up of Company A, Dakota Cavalry, and Company C, Forty-first Iowa Infantry. Pattee's expedition got away from Fort Randall November 26th, accompanied by Maj. W. A. Burleigh, agent of the Yanktons, Adjt. Gen. Charles P. Booge, of the governor's staff, and Dr. Justice Townsend, company surgeon.

On the 2nd of December following, Major Campbell, a paymaster in the United States Army, reached Yankton from Fort Randall, and brought the information that Major Burleigh had returned and he had learned from him that the white captives at Beaver Creek above Fort Pierre had been ransomed and released. This was the Santee Camp under White Lodge to which Galpin had sent the horses and provisions from Fort Pierre. The ransoming party had considerable trouble in effecting negotiations. They were backed up, however, by a number of Yanktonnais, and finally made terms by giving a horse and some provisions for each prisoner, two women and six girls. The prisoners were sent down to Fort Pierre, and on their way met the expedition under Colonel Pattee and were turned over to that officer. The prisoners were in charge of Mr. Dupuis (pronounced Dupee) and Colin La Plant, at the time Pattee met them. Pattee's troops had recently been paid, and they raised a purse of $250 and gave it to the captives. Pattee detailed a small escort and sent the whole party directly to Fort Randall. After a fortnight's rest at Randall, the captives came to Yankton.

With the main portion of his two companies Pattee spent a couple of weeks reconnoitering, picking up such information as was available, when he returned to Randall with Company A, leaving the Iowa troops at Fort Pierre for the winter.

FIRST CAPITOL BUILDING

Messrs. Charles F. Picotte and Moses K. Armstrong had concluded to erect a building suitable for the meeting of the two legislative bodies, and selected a site for the edifice on the corner of Capital and Fourth streets, Yankton. The lumber for the structure had all been delivered on ground in August, 1862, but the Indian troubles became so menacing that construction work was not at that time begun; and a few weeks later the building material which they had accumulated at great pains and at considerable expense was confiscated by the local militia under the unwritten law of "military necessity," and entered into the construction of the fortifications at Yankton during the Indian war in September following. After the Indian troubles had in a measure subsided, the same parties procured a second supply of material, not however, equal in quality to the first, and with the aid of a large force of mechanics, erected a two-story frame building on the northeast corner of Capital and Fourth streets, which was arranged for the accommodation of the legislative assembly and the sessions of that body were held in the completed structure in December following, and annually thereafter until 1888-89, when Congress discontinued the annual sessions of the Legislature. The building stood on the Picotte grant, and was the first capitol building of Dakota. When not in use for legislative purposes, the building was used by religious societies, Sunday schools, private schools, historical society and other lectures, church festivals, school exhibitions, public meetings of various kinds, by the surveyor general's office a few months in 1869, and for a brief time the first Masonic lodge of the territory held its meetings in the second story. When the annual sessions of the Legislature were discontinued, the building lost its best patron, and the structure was thereafter fitted upon for a private residence. The view of the building in this work was taken during the pendency of the election in 1866, when the democrats, aiding the Johnson republicans, captured a majority of the legislative members and also the county offices. The latter, however, were accepted under protest.

BEAR'S RIB KILLED FOR RECEIVING GOODS

In the fall of 1862 the sentiment of hostility toward the whites and the Government was quite general throughout the Indian population of the Northwest, but did not include them all. There were a respectable number who refrained from the warpath, and from hostilities; but who kept secluded and quiet, fearful of provoking the wrath of their red brethren who were at war and who were disposed to treat the non-combatants of their own people as enemies. As these hostiles had now severed their friendly relations with the Government, they had resolved to accept no further annuity goods or presents from the Great Father, and would also prohibit the non-combatants from receiving any favors from the same source under penalty of death. An instance of their determination to enforce their non-intercourse policy is related by Judge Samuel A. Latta, of Leavenworth, Kansas, who was appointed agent of the Upper Missouri Indian tribes, in 1861, and made an annual voyage as far up the Missouri as Fort Union during his term.

In 1862 he had called the Indians of the Brule, Two Kettle, Uncpapas, Minneconjoux and Sans Arcs, and possibly Yanktonnais tribes to assemble at Fort Pierre and receive their annuities during the latter part of the month of May. There should have been about six thousand Indians assembled, but there was only a small fraction of that number, and these explained that their tribes were hostile to the Government. They further stated that they could not receive the annuity goods and presents sent by the Great Father, because it would arouse the anger of the hostile Indians and they would all be killed. They also made serious complaints of the Great Father's neglect of their welfare, and charged that the treaty pledges had been frequently violated by the Great Father's children. The goods intended for the Indians were taken from the boat, however, and piled up on the bank of the river in separate piles in quantity conforming to the number of each tribe, though the Indians insisted that their lives would pay the penalty if they received them. Finally, Bear's Rib, an Uncpapa chief, and a life-long friend of the United States, made a speech, declaring his loyalty and his long years of steadfast friendship for the whites. He reiterated that to receive the goods would endanger his life and the lives of all his people, but to show his fealty to the Government he had made up his mind to accept them this time, but warned the agent not to bring any more unless the soldiers were sent with them to guard the lives of the friendly Indians.

After Agent Latta had left that point for the upper river, where he was to make further distributions, a numerous band of the Sans Arc Sioux of the hostile faction came into the fort, which was the Fort Pierre built by LaFromboise, and killed the old chief with several others.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT OF THE RESCUE

Ex-Governor Edmunds, while engaged with the Sioux Indian Treaty Commission in 1882-3, which endeavored to make an agreement with the Indians for a portion of the Great Sioux reservation, came across an aged chief of the Two Kettle Tribe of Sioux whom he had known at the time he was governor of the territory, and knew him to be a sincere friend of the whites. The old chief's name was Mah-to-to-pah, or Four Bear. He was head chief of the Two Kettles, who occupied a small reservation opposite Crow Creek with their relatives the Lower Brules. Four Bear was born at the mouth of Bad River, just below Fort Pierre, in 1833, and was then living in a comfortable house and was a devoted Christian and an industrious Indian who had made commendable progress toward civilization. He claimed to have led the party which rescued the white captives from the Santees, and the following was his account of the rescue:

In November, 1862, he heard that the Santees had broke loose in Minnesota that fall, and had killed a good many white people, and had taken some women and children captives and were treating them very badly. He called a council of his braves, and it was determined among them that they would rescue these prisoners and restore them to their friends.

There was bad feeling existing between the Two Kettles and Santees from the fact that the Santees had stolen most of the Two Kettles' ponies that year, and he thought that his party would have trouble in rescuing the captives. Four Bear selected fourteen of his best men and with eight good horses started up the river in a blinding snow storm. They took their rifles and bows and arrows, as they would if going to war. They were seven days traveling, nearly all the time day and night, with frequent snows impeding their way, and finally reached the Santee camp at the mouth of Grand River. They went into camp close to the hostiles, and in the morning early were invited by the Santees to a council. They tied up their eight horses close to the tepee and went in. They found all the hostiles there, each with his gun in his hands pointing upward. He was asked what urgent business had brought him and his handful of braves so far from home at that time of year. Four Bear arose and made them a speech in which he told them he had heard that they had been on the warpath and had taken some prisoners. He told them that he and his little party had come for the captives and would not return without them.

In reply to this one of the Santees told him, in a very abusive way: "You are all Indians and belong to the same confederation that we do, and instead of being friendly to the accursed paleface you should unite with us and help slay them as long as there is a Sioux on the face of the earth."

At the conclusion of the speech Four Bear and his braves arose and replied that they were friends of the whites, had never lifted a hand against them, and never would.

Black Hawk, one of the prominent Santee chiefs, said they had captives and they were worth money, and nothing less than $1,000 in ponies would get them. The council was an angry, stormy one, lasting the entire day. No man among the Santees had a kind word for Four Bear and his party.

At sundown the Santees had concluded that they must give up the captives or go to war with Four Bear and his party. Black Hawk then arose and stated that they would give up the captives for the eight horses and saddles. This proposition was accepted, and the exchange began. Black Hawk led in a small girl that had been wounded in one of her arms, and gave her to Four Bear and then went and took Four Bear's war horse. Black Hawk's father had a prisoner, Mrs. Julia Wright, and he had taken her for a wife, and he was not in favor of the agreement, but his son brought her in and gave her up. After the captives were all brought in, they smoked the pipe of peace and went to their camp. The Santees on their retreat from Minnesota with their prisoners were so afraid of being overtaken by the white soldiers that they took no time to hunt, and in consequence the prisoners were nearly starved. The first good meal for long weeks was indulged in that night, consisting of venison and coffee.

The prisoners were so destitute of clothing that Four Bear's band was compelled to divide theirs with them. Four Bear gave his little girl his blanket, stockings and moccasins. The weather was very cold, but the homeward march was undertaken. The six children had to be carried every step of the way, and the two women a part of it. Some of the Indians would go ahead and kill game and have the camp ready at night when they arrived. Because of the depth of snow, the journey was slow and full of labor. At Swan Lake they met some of their people and traded ammunition and blankets for sugar and coffee for the captives, and in the morning they all contributed everything they could spare for the use of a big horse to get home with. They made a "travoise," which is two long poles, one end of each fastened to the saddle, extending backwards on each side of the horse, with cross pieces lashed on. The six children were bundled on this vehicle and they got along splendidly. At this point on the road they were overtaken by Black Hawk's father, who wanted his wife back, and told Four Bear he would have her or there would be trouble. Red Dog was detailed to look after him, and he was told to show them the flat of his foot instantly or he would be shot. He followed at a distance for a day and then went back. The captive party arrived at last at their camp, and the next day took the captives across the river to old Fort Sully or near there, and turned them over to Colonel Pattee, who was in command of an expedition sent out from Fort Randall to secure these same whites. Pattee, on receiving the prisoners, gave Four Bear a letter, of which the following is a copy and was still in possession of the chief:

"Fort Pierre, Dakota Territory, December 12, 1862.

"The bearer, Mah-to-to-pah, is one of the eleven Indians that recovered Mrs. Julia Wright, Mrs. Emma Daly, and six children from the Ih-Sanu-ta, near the Grand River, in November, 1862. He deserves to be kindly treated by all. JOHN PATTEE,

"Major, Forty-first Iowa Cavalry Expedition, in Search of Prisoners."

The officer told the Indians that they had done something of great service for the Great Father and he would remember them and pay them for their horses and their trouble. But this reward had not reached Four Bear in 1881. There were then living but three of the rescue party, Charger, Swift Bird and Four Bear. The Two Kettle band of Sioux were called by the other tribes "the fool band," from the fact that they were always friendly to the whites.

CHAPTER XXV

THE SECOND SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE

1862-63

SECOND SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE—THE HOUSE DIVIDES—ELECTION FRAUDS INVESTIGATED—TWO LOWER HOUSES IN SESSION—BRULE CREEK INVESTIGATED—JAYNE'S SECOND MESSAGE—GREAT SEAL OF SUPREME COURT—BIOGRAPHIES RED RIVER MEMBERS—THE ELECTION FRAUDS.

The second session of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Dakota convened at Yankton on Monday, December 1, 1862. The Red River country had been allowed an increased membership by an act of the first Legislature giving that county a councilman and two representatives, which made the membership of the council of the second session ten, and of the House fourteen. A new edifice had been erected during the fall for the accommodation of the Legislature. It stood on the northeast corner of Capitol and Fourth streets, and was dignified with the name of the Capitol Building. Picotte and Armstrong were the owners. It was a two-story building—the council chamber upstairs, and the House in the first floor. There was also a committee room and a cloak room partitioned off on each floor. The dimensions of the structure were 24x60 feet.

The two Houses met at 12 o'clock A. M. The council was made up of the old members who had been elected for two years, namely: W. W. Brookings, Minnehaha; Austin Cole, Cole County; J. W. Boyle and Jacob Deuel, Clay County; Enos Stutsman and D. T. Bramble, Yankton; John H. Shober, Bon Homme County; J. Shaw Gregory, Todd County; and James McFetridge, Kittson County, Red River. There were no contested seats and after calling to order by President Shober, of the first session, permanent organization was effected by the election of Enos Stutsman, president; James Tufts, secretary; W. W. Warford, Bon Homme, assistant secretary; Lorenzo Robinson, of Clay, sergeant-at-arms; Hans Gunderson, of Clay, messenger; Ole Halverson, of Cole, fireman; and Rev. M. Hoyt, of Yankton, chaplain.

Councilman Betts, of Clay, with his family had left the territory during the Indian troubles, and he did not return. His seat was vacant during the session. A brief sketch of his life is given elsewhere.

This House of Representatives convened under most troublesome auspices. The election in Bon Homme, Charles Mix and Cole counties had been characterized by gross irregularities and unlawful methods, and the result was that there were contesting claimants for all the seats from those districts. It became the duty of the secretary of the territory, Mr. Hutchinson, to prepare the roll of the members of the House, and he declined to place any name on the roll except those whose seats were not contested. This done, the secretary called the roll, omitting the names of members claiming seats from Cole, Bon Homme and Charles Mix, six in all. As called by the secretary, the House was made up of A. J. Harlan and A. W. Puett, Vermillion, Lassa Bothun and Jacob A. Jacobson, West Vermillion; M. K. Armstrong and Knud Larson, Yankton; H. I. Donaldson and Joseph Y. Buckman, Kittson County, Red River, eight in all. Attorney General Gleason administered the required oath of office, whereupon a temporary organization was effected by electing A. J. Harlan, speaker; R. M. Hagaman, Mixville, chief clerk; and William High, Yankton, sergeant-at-arms. No further business was done and the House adjourned until the following day, when it reassembled. An effort was made to effect a permanent organization, but it failed. Harlan and Puett were both candidates for speaker, but neither could muster a majority, there being a pronounced sentiment against permanently organizing while so many of the seats remained vacant, and without transacting any business the house adjourned until 10 o'clock, Wednesday.

In explanation of the division existing in the House it may be well to say that the members were peculiarly divided. Harlan and Puett, the two candidates for speaker, were both radical republicans and both from Clay County, but Harlan had been a supporter of Todd at the late election, as was also Attorney General Gleason and quite a number of republicans of prominence, and the contest for control of this Legislature was conducted with the view of aiding either Jayne or Todd in the contest which General Todd instituted to unseat Governor Jayne, who had been awarded the certificate of election as delegate. The eight sitting members were equally divided on this issue. Puett, Bothun, Larson and Jacobson being supporters of Jayne; and Harlan, Armstrong, Donaldson and Buckman supporting Todd. The contestants were divided on similar lines. The election had occurred during the first days of the Indian troubles when there was great excitement and alarm throughout the settlements, and advantage had been taken of this condition by some unprincipled men to commit frauds on the ballot box, and as it now presented itself to the sitting members, it seemed a tangled mess to unravel.

On the third day the House made no attempt to permanently organize, but a number of petitions, certificates and affidavits bearing on the contested cases were presented as follows: N. J. Wallace and M. H. Somers v. Wm. Mathews and William Frisbie, claimants from Cole County; F. D. Pease from Charles Mix v. Henry A. Kennerly, from Todd; and R. M. Johnson and Edward Gifford v. Laban H. Litchfield and Henry Hartsough from Bon Homme. These papers were referred to a select committee composed of Armstrong, Puett and Donaldson.

The House also elected Byron M. Smith, of Minnehaha, assistant clerk, and Rev. M. Payne, Methodist clergyman at Yankton, chaplain, both pro tem., and then adjourned.

On the fourth day the list of temporary officers was completed by electing John Lawrence, of Yankton, messenger, and J. S. Presho, of Yankton, fireman. No report was made by the committee having charge of the contest papers. Another effort was made to effect a permanent organization, but it failed, though on one ballot, Armstrong received the four republican votes, but his own vote was given to Harlan, and it was understood that he was uncompromisingly opposed to the speakership coming to Yankton. An adjournment was taken to the next day, Friday, when upon the convening of the House, Messrs. Armstrong and Donaldson, forming the select committee appointed to investigate and report on the claims of the several contestants, made the following report which will explain the political mix up in Cole County, the difficulties incident to instituting among men the lawful and orderly methods of organized society, and the additional local difficulties growing out of the Indian troubles and a county seat contest.

To the Honorable House of Representatives of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota:

The select committee to whom was referred the memorial of N. J. Wallace, M. H. Somers, Wm. Mathews and William Frisbie, of the first representative district; Laban H. Gifford, R. M. Johnson, Laban H. Litchfield and Henry Hartsough, of the seventh representative district; Henry Kennerly and F. D. Pease, of the eighth representative district, claiming seats upon the floor of this House of Representatives from the said representative districts, beg leave to report to the house that time has been allowed the contestants to adduce all the proofs necessary and pertinent to elucidate the truth and aid your committee in the determination arrived at in this report; that they have with much diffition and care considered the testimony in these several contests, and beg leave to present hereby their conclusions and recommendations in the premises. Your committee would ask to be excused from here reciting in detail the evidence elicited in the examination, and will allude to, in brief and in their order, the conclusion of fact which the testimony afforded to their minds, referring the house to the proofs themselves, herewith accompanying, as to the propriety and right of the views taken of the subject matter by your committee.

[This evidence will be found in full in this chapter in the contest testimony in the Todd-Jayne case, taken before Chief Justice Bliss at Yankton during this session of the Legislature, as also the evidence in the Bon Homme and Charles Mix cases.]

Your committee find that in the first representative district, comprising Cole County, that three election or voting precincts were held, to wit: One at what is known as Big Sioux Point, one at Elk Point, and the third at Brule Creek, on the 1st day of September last, agreeably with legal notice; that at said election in said first representative district, N. J. Wallace, M. H. Somers, William Mathews and William Frisbie were candidates, respectively, for the office of representatives in the House of Representatives in the Second Legislature of the Territory of Dakota; that the elections at Elk Point and Big Sioux Point precincts held on that day were conducted in a fair, formal, legal and orderly manner; that the election at Brule Creek was characterized by systematic, deliberate and obviously preconcerted fraud, and a predetermination to outvote, by fraudulent and factitious means, the other two precincts before mentioned, without regard to consequence, to character, or the elective franchise. The location of the county seat of Cole County, submitted to the popular vote, doubtless more than any other motive, instigated, planned and effected the most flagitious wrong upon the rights and interest of the residue of the voters of the county, furnishing a precedent unrivaled if equaled, in the history of fraudulent elections—a fraud by common consent and participation, without the usually attendant circumstances of violence in such cases; and if interest such as might be enhanced by an achievement of this character, can aught extenuate, your committee are fain to say is all that can be suggested or found in the transaction to cover from reproach and infamy the participants in that election fraud.

Therefore, in view of all the foregoing circumstances, and influenced only by a desire to do justice to all parties, they can arrive to but one conclusion in the premises, viz.: That N. J. Wallace and M. H. Somers are the legally and fairly elected representatives for this district, and are now legally and justly entitled to seats in this house.

M. K. ARMSTRONG,
H. S. DONALDSON.

This report was not acted upon, except to lay it on the table, and further time was granted for reports in the other cases. There was no minority report made, though Mr. Puett had declined to join in the report submitted. A permanent organization was then effected on a compromise plan. The business of the Legislature was at a standstill, and no progress could be made until the House had permanently organized. There had been a caucus the previous evening, and the hatchet had been temporarily buried. A vote on permanent organization resulted as follows:

For speaker, A. J. Harlan; for chief clerk, Byron M. Smith; assistant clerk, R. M. Hagaman; sergeant-at-arms, Gustav Jacobson, Clay; fireman, J. S. Prescho; messenger, Thomas Halverson, Clay; chaplain, Rev. J. L. Payne.

The customary notices to the governor and council notifying them of the permanent organization were ordered, when the House adjourned.

Upon reassembling the sixth day, the House immediately took up the contested seat matter independent of the report of the select committee, and on motion of Mr. Bothun, N. J. Wallace and William H. Frisbie were admitted to seats from Cole County; and L. H. Litchfield and R. M. Johnson were admitted from Bon Homme County. This action was simply a temporary compromise, Litchfield and Frisbie being Jayne men, and Wallace and Johnson, Todd men. It served the purpose, however, of giving the district their full representative vote in the Legislature. The House then adjourned until Monday at 10 A. M. Monday the standing committees were appointed and a skirmish took place between the factions brought on by an effort to seat Pease of Charles Mix, who was opposed by Kennerly. A hot debate followed, the speaker taking a hand. When it came to a vote all the affirmative motions were lost. And the House finally adjourned. Tuesday there was a stormy and exciting session. Harlan, Armstrong and Puett doing the debating. Armstrong accused the Jayne members with violating the compromise pledges. Harlan went after the Jayne people in a pitchfork fashion, and Puett retaliated with accusations that threatened a general combat. Finally a motion was made to admit Hartsough of Bon Homme and remove Johnson. Donaldson offered an amendment to this motion to insert the names of Litchfield and Frisbie, both of whom were then occupying seats. The speaker instructed the clerk not to call the names of Litchfield, Frisbie or Johnson on the motion. This took off two Jayne votes and one Todd vote, and gave the Todd men one majority. This ruling brought matters to a crisis—the Jayne men discovered that they would be outvoted, and under the leadership of Puett they quietly withdrew from the House, which left that body without a quorum. The retiring members were Puett, Bothun, Frisbie, Jacobson, Larson and Litchfield. The House then adjourned.

When the House convened Wednesday morning Armstrong presented the credentials of Henry Kennerly, of Charles Mix, and George P. Waldron, of Minnehaha, and they were sworn in by Attorney General Gleason. It was well known that no election had been held in Minnehaha County. Every white settler including Mr. Waldron had left the county and the Town of Sioux Falls on the 30th of August, two days before election, and had come to Yankton, and remained here. Where Mr. Waldron obtained his credentials from was a mystery and what they consisted of was another mystery. Minnehaha was entitled to one member and Waldron had been elected the year before and served at the first session, and he may have claimed that he was entitled to the seat until his successor was elected. He was anti-Jayne republican, and his vote would be of great service as matters stood in the House. He had refrained from making any claim to a seat for ten days after the session began, and now at an opportune time, when the House is left without a quorum by the bolting of six members, he quietly enters and is given a seat without protest. Mr. Armstrong, from the Committee on Elections, which committee had taken over the contested cases first given to a special committee, submitted a report embodying the report heretofore given as to Cole County, recommending the seating of Somers in place of Frisbie. The report took up the Bon Homme County contest between Gifford and Litchfield and found:

That from all the evidence and affidavits furnished by the contestants it is proven that only thirty-nine votes were polled in said district on the 1st day of September, as is established by the affidavits of the judges and clerks of the election; that out of said thirty-nine votes the petitioner, Edward Gifford, received twenty-five votes, as is proven by affidavits coming direct from the individual electors who voted for said Gifford; that Mr. Gifford holds a certificate of election from the acting register of deeds of said district; that, although a disturbance was created at the closing of the polls on the ground of a presumed fraud on the candidate for delegate to Congress, thereby preventing the canvass of the votes, yet it is proven that twenty-two of said thirty-nine voters voted open tickets for said Gifford at a second election, and that twenty-six of said thirty-nine voted for Mr. Gifford at the first election. Therefore your committee can arrive at no other conclusion than that your petitioner, Edward Gifford, is endorsed by a large majority of the legal electors of his district, and is therefore justly entitled to the seat now occupied in this house by Laban H. Litchfield as representative from the seventh district.

M. K. ARMSTRONG,
H. S. DONALDSON.

This report was adopted and Gifford and Somers were sworn in as members, giving the House eleven members. The next ceremony was the joint convention to receive the message of the governor, which had been fixed for 2 o'clock this day, and at that hour the two bodies met in the hall of the House and Mr. Armstrong and Councilman Shoher were appointed a committee to wait on the governor and inform him that the two houses were ready to receive any communication he had to make.

The governor replied to the committee that he had no communication to make at present, and that he did not "recognize the branch of the Legislature to which M. K. Armstrong belongs."

This report being submitted to the joint convention that body dissolved, each returning to their respective chambers. The officers of the House who were in sympathy with the members who withdrew, now absented themselves. These were Assistant Clerk Hagaman, Sergeant-at-Arms Jacobson and Fireman Presho. Their places were filled pro tem. by the election of James M. Allen, Daniel Gifford and William M. Stevens, when the House adjourned.

We must now inquire into the whereabouts of the bolting members who abruptly left the House on the ninth day. They assembled at Bramble's Building on the levee, occupied by the governor, who vacated the rooms and organized a House of Representatives, admitting to seats the claimants from Cole, Bon Homme and Charles Mix, namely Wm. Mathews, Henry Hartsough, and F. D. Pease. This gave them a quorum and they organized by electing A. W. Puett, speaker; R. M. Hagaman, chief clerk, and Gustav Jacobson, sergeant-at-arms. They notified the council of their organization but that body declined to recognize them, having already recognized the other house, which left them in at least an anomalous position, but they met and adjourned from day to day and awaited developments.

The regular House continued its sessions but did nothing in the way of legislation. The first bill introduced was by Mr. Somers, on the fifteenth day, to locate the county seat of Cole County, which was referred to a select committee. It was evident that the leaders of the House were uneasy and dissatisfied with their position. The council was going along with its business, introducing and passing bills, and apparently paying no attention to the House troubles. The governor had not yet recognized this Legislature, and at that time he had absolute power under the organic act to veto any bill, and there was no appeal. It was also a question how far the secretary, who paid the members their per diem, would be justified in disbursing the public funds. So matters ran along to the fifteenth day, when Representative Kennerly, of Charles Mix, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. William E. Gleason, attorney general of the territory, be respectfully requested to furnish to this house his opinion, in writing, as to whether the recognition of the governor is essential to the competency of this house to proceed with the business of legislation.

The resolution was adopted. An unsuccessful effort was made to fill the list of House officers by electing them permanently, and the House adjourned.

After the House convened on the sixteenth day, a communication was received and read from Attorney General Gleason, giving his views of the powers of the governor and the rightful authority of the Legislature, deciding that the governor had no authority to interfere with the membership and organization of the legislative bodies.

The opinion of the attorney-general apparently failed to do much more than disclose the profundity of his legal accomplishments, while it enabled him at the same time to exhibit his animosity toward the governor, whom he greatly disliked, a feeling that was most cordially reciprocated, but was supposed to extend only to their political differences.

And now the peace-makers appear—those who have the oil and pour it freely on the troubled waters. Civilized man will never be able to discharge the debt he owes to the one who first discovered that successful resort of all good statesmen, "compromise." How marvelously it works to bring order out of chaos. How gratefully is it recognized as it steps into the breach in the nick of time and saves the state, when all seems hopelessly rushing to ruin.

The reluctance of the House to take up the work of legislation discloses a lack of confidence on the part of the leaders in their position. They were not satisfied and were waiting for the peace-maker to step in and suggest a solution of the difficulty. The members of the council were also interested in a speedy settlement of the trouble. They had passed a score of bills of value to their constituents and to their reputations and twice as many remained to be acted upon, and while all were interested closely or remotely, in the delegate contest, they were not prepared to make that event a pretext for neglecting their legitimate duties.

The peacemakers, after frequent canvassing, finally hit upon a plan, and on the seventeenth day at the opening session in representative hall, the bolting members whose seats were not contested, appeared and took their places; while the subsequent proceedings plainly indicates that the friends of Jayne have received concessions. Immediately after the session opened for business, Speaker Harlan tendered his resignation as speaker as follows:

Gentlemen: I feel very grateful to you for the honor you did me by electing me as your presiding officer at an early day of the session, but believing that I can better serve the interests of my immediate constituents occupying a place on the floor of the house, therefore, for the sake of harmony, order and law, I now most respectfully tender to you my resignation as speaker of this house, to date from and after the present moment.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. J. HARLAN.

The resignation was accepted.

Immediately following the resignation of Speaker Harlan, M. K. Armstrong was elected speaker, receiving every vote except that of Wallace, Donaldson and his own. On taking the chair Armstrong spoke as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives.

While returning to you my heartfelt thanks for the honor you have conferred upon me, it is with reluctance and embarrassment that I assume the responsibilities of the position to which I have been assigned. I accept it, gentlemen, at your hands, with the hope of aiding to heal the wounds of discord, to disperse the clouds of commotion, and bring the distracted bodies back to the folds of harmony and compromise.

In assuming the chair I shall yield no principle, and sacrifice no stand in behalf of my party and friends. But at present the life of the territory hangs upon the action of this body, and in such crisis it is the duty of every representative of the people to discard all party ties and throw off all personal prejudice, and to act, not for himself, but for the people; not for the victory of his personal opinion, but for the general welfare of the common territory.

To this object, gentlemen, I shall endeavor to stand acquitted before God and my country, and shall attentively labor to observe, not to divert; to facilitate, and not to hinder, the will of the assembly.

It was evident that a compromise had been effected not entirely satisfactory to either party, but much nearer suiting the Jayne people than the Todd party, notwithstanding Armstrong, a Todd democrat, had been taken as speaker and Harlan, a Todd republican, deposed. But it is generally admitted that the foes of your own household are much more bitter and relentless than those of a different household, hence anybody under the circumstances except Harlan would have been the first demand of Mr. Puett, who was Harlan's colleague from Clay County, and a staunch supporter of Jayne.

The next proceeding was the summary unseating of Somers, of Cole, who was succeeded by Frisbie; also the unseating of Kennerly (General Todd's right-hand man), of Charles Mix. The following day the members answering to roll call were Messrs. Bothun, Buckman, Donaldson, Frisbie, Gifford, Harlan, Johnson, Jacobson, Larson, Puett, Wallace, Waldron and Speaker Armstrong. Byron M. Smith, who had been elected chief clerk, presented his resignation in writing after the roll was called.

Mr. Smith's resignation was followed by that of the other officers, all of whom undoubtedly foresaw that they would be required to vacate under the new order. The House then reelected Robert Hagaman chief clerk and James M. Stone, assistant clerk.

The Charles Mix County contest case was again taken up on a report of the elections committee and F. D. Pease was seated in place of Henry Kennerly.

At 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the seventeenth day the two Houses met in joint convention and received the governor's message as follows:

[This message serves to show the extent of the Indian war then pending, the early construction of a railroad across the great western plains, the discovery gold in Western Dakota, now Montana, and other interesting and important incidents in our early history].

Gentlemen of the Council and House of Representatives:

While humbly acknowledging our dependence on the kindness of God, let us return thanks for the many blessings which our people have enjoyed during the past year—peace in the midst of war, abundant harvests and general health. While the whole country has been convulsed with the throes of a mighty civil rebellion, devastating the finest regions of our country, destroying the crops, and wasting the hard-earned accumulations of the husbandman, depopulating and laying waste whole districts of country, sacking and destroying towns, ruining commercial marts, and carrying want and destitution into tens of thousands of once happy homes; while Indian depredations and massacres of untold ferocity and brutality, and to an extent unheard of in all the annals of savage war, have been committed only just without our limits, yet Dakota has been spared all the immediate calamities of civil and to a great extent the horrors of Indian war, and our people have been blessed with security and prosperity.

The First Legislative Assembly enacted a civil and criminal code, established a revenue, militia and educational system, formed all the counties which our settlements seemed to require, and passed many other acts of necessary legislation. I am not aware of many alterations or amendments to our laws which are at present demanded, though doubtless time and more experience in their practical operations will suggest some. I would recommend some legislation in reference to our territorial courts. No time or place for the holding of terms of the territorial courts having as yet been designated by any act of the Legislature, many cases which cannot be brought before the federal courts will have to be postponed until some action is taken by your honorable body upon this subject.

The questions which are most intimately connected with the welfare and settlement of Dakota, and which will require your attention and consideration, are Indian affairs and military protection of the frontier. Although the Legislature has no direct control and authority over these matters, yet it is very desirable, and, I think, absolutely necessary, that you take cognizance of these subjects, and that you memorialize Congress in reference to them, and ask for the adoption of prompt and vigorous measures, which shall quiet the apprehensions of the settlers, and give peace and perfect security to all the border settlements. During the past year we have had no formidable attack or appalling massacres, yet our people have suffered from Indian depredations, and the continual fear of being plundered and murdered by the roving bands of lawless savages who have been prowling around our settlements has been the source of annoyance and alarm to all our citizens. The murder of Judge J. B. Amidon and son, at Sioux Falls, occurring immediately upon the receipt of the news of the first massacre of men, women and children, in Minnesota, very justly alarmed the settlers in that portion of the territory. Knowing their entire inability to protect themselves against any considerable force of Indians with the small detachment of Dakota Cavalry I had stationed there, they wisely concluded to withdraw to the more thickly settled portions of the territory lying upon the Missouri River. After the abandonment of that place the Indians came in and destroyed and burned the town and all the improvements in the surrounding country. Upon the reception of this news of the attack upon Sioux Falls, coupled with the news of a great savage war in Minnesota, and the actual presence of hostile bands in the vicinity of our towns, engaged in plunder and threatening war, a feeling of general alarm naturally spread through the territory, and many of our citizens moved temporarily into Iowa. The settlers on the lower James River were attacked by a mounted force of Minnesota outlaws on the morning of September 6th, but were able to barricade their doors and windows to screen themselves from the bullets of the foe, when the timely arrival of a detachment of Dakota Cavalry that had been stationed near Yankton reached the scene and dispersed the assailants. At Yankton a large stockade was constructed, to which the settlers fled for protection, and the entire population of Bon Homme County took refuge within the enclosure. The territory that had been partially occupied by settlers, from the Big Sioux to Fort Randall, was almost literally depopulated for a number of days, and the ordinary pursuits of the people broken up and demoralized, women and children were hurried off to their eastern friends, while the men remained to care for their few worldly possessions. The fall work of the farmers was necessarily neglected, entailing in the aggregate a large financial loss, which affected all kinds of industry and trade, and produced a general sentiment among all classes of people inimical to the improvement of our farms and settlements, and a serious impediment to immigration. As we have but one military company stationed in the whole district of country between the Big Sioux and Fort Randall, and as this company was divided into several detachments, and could render only very limited protection to our scattered settlements, I issued a proclamation calling for the immediate organization of the entire militia of the territory. Finding, however, that the feeling of insecurity was likely to depopulate some of our counties, I dispatched Lieutenant Kellam, a special messenger, to General Blunt, commanding the Department of Kansas, with letters and a requisition for arms, ammunition and additional troops. Just at this time the Department of the Northwest was created and Dakota was transferred from the Department of Kansas to the Department of the Northwest. Some delay was thus occasioned in the reception of arms, but as soon as the requisition was forwarded to General Pope he promptly responded to it, and we are now in possession of arms and ammunition sufficient for all our military force. As no troops could be sent to us immediately, I thought it necessary to call into active service a part of our militia, which would tend to restore confidence and give us protection until United States troops could be stationed in our midst.

I would recommend that an act be passed authorizing the auditor of the territory to audit the military accounts of the territory, and to issue warrants sufficient to defray the expense connected with subsisting and paying the militia for the time they have been in actual service; and that, when the amount is ascertained, the Legislature memorialize Congress for an appropriation sufficient to refund to the territory all the expenses incurred by her in providing for the maintenance of the militia force.

The Yankton Sioux and the Ponca Indians, the annuity tribes which are located upon their own reservations in close proximity to our settlements, have remained friendly, and I see no good reason to apprehend any trouble with them, but believe that the same friendly relations will continue with those tribes which heretofore existed. I regret to say that I fear we are to have trouble with the Sioux of the Upper Missouri Agency. They have for some time past been uneasy, restless and dissatisfied with the Government, and disposed to war. The unusual amount of travel during the past year through the region of the country claimed and occupied by the Upper Sioux has excited and alarmed them. The news of new gold fields, of unsurpassed richness, on the Salmon River and the headwaters of the Missouri, has made a highway through a part of this territory never before marked by the footprint of the white man, save an occasional hunter and trapper. The presence of the stranger, and this passage to and fro through their lands, has awakened their jealousy and made them suspicious that they, too, would be crowded from the hunting grounds of their fathers, and be pressed farther west toward the setting sun. Portions of those tribes who are friendly and who desire to remain in peace are becoming intimidated by the more bold and lawless members of their bands, and are fast being won over to the views and feelings of the hostile ones. "Four Bears," one of the friendly Yanktonnais chiefs, was murdered last year by his own people on account of his friendship for the Government. "Bear's Rib," one of the head chiefs of the Ouckpapas, and most devoted friend of the whites, was murdered by members of his own tribe because he opposed any hostility against the United States and consented to still receive the goods brought up for distribution by Mr. Latta, the Indian agent for the Upper Missouri. This year the Mandans, Rees and Gros Ventres, who are the most peaceful of all the upper tribes, though they are not Sioux Indians, were twice attacked in their own village by the Sioux, for the reason that they refused to combine with them to make war on the whites. The Sioux were promised by the Government that so long as they remained at peace, and faithfully observed their treaty stipulations, they should have aid and protection against all hostile tribes. How has this been observed? Experience has taught these friendly disposed Indians and the friendly tribes that the greatest safety is to be found in hostility to the whites, the Government having neglected and failed to give the friendly disposed Indians the promised aid. The hostile Indians embrace a large majority of the tribes of the Upper Missouri, and unless prompt measures are taken to suppress any uprising there, and to punish the hostile bands, we have every reason to expect a combination of all the numerous tribes of Dakota, and a general Indian war of unparalleled proportions and untold ferocity.

We require, for the purpose of giving ample security to our settlements, and to preserve peace throughout our territory, the establishment of three military posts—one at Sioux Falls; one at or near Fort Berthold, now a fur traders' post, and one at or near the fur trading post of Fort Benton. Ample protection to Dakota is protection to Western Minnesota, Northwestern Iowa and Northern Nebraska. When Dakota is left unprotected, then the frontier settlements of Minnesota, Iowa and Nebraska are liable to a repetition of the horrible massacre which last August devastated 200 miles of frontier settlements in Minnesota, and wrought desolation and ruin to hundreds of pioneers in Dakota. This question of protection is vital to all frontier settlements. Without it settlements must recede and not advance; with it, emigration, the hardy pioneer with his ax and plow, will push forward the advanced line of civilization and open up new lands which will furnish happy homes for thousands who are looking to the great Northwest. I take great pleasure in informing you that I now believe that we are to have protection, and that a powerful expedition is now being organized which will visit summary punishment upon all the hostile tribes and teach them a proper respect for, and fear of the authority of, the Federal Government. Major Gen. John Pope, commanding the Department of the Northwest, is fully alive to the interests and the military necessities of his department, and he intends that these Indian difficulties shall be thoroughly attended to. General Pope has created the first military district of his department, which is to embrace Dakota and a portion of Northwestern Iowa, he has assigned to this command Gen. John Cook, of Illinois, one of the heroes of Fort Donelson and Shiloh—an officer whose ability and gallantry in the field are only equalled by his executive talent. The appointment of General Cook to the command of this district is a guarantee of a prompt, vigorous and effective campaign—one which shall either severely punish upon a treacherous foe, give peace to our borders, and create a feeling of security among our people which shall tend to the settlement and development of Dakota. I have said of some length upon our Indian relations, because I consider it a matter of the most vital importance, and one that shall enlist your most hearty cooperation.

At the last session of Congress an appropriation was made for the purpose of defraying the expense of making a treaty with the Chippewa Indians, living on the Red River of the North, and but for the late Indian war in Minnesota this treaty would have been made and that section of our territory opened to white settlement. I trust that treaty may not long be delayed, thereby affording encouragement and protection to the large and remunerative trade already established between that region of country and St. Paul on the Mississippi.

I would again call to your notice some recommendations made in my first message to the Legislature of Dakota. I would urge that Congress be memorialized in reference to a geological survey of the territory; to make Fort Randall the distributing post for supplying the forts to the west of it, and for the establishment of military roads from the Big Sioux River to Fort Randall, and from the Red River of the North to points on the Missouri River at or near Fort Union and Fort Benton. The reasons for these recommendations were given at length in my last message, and it would seem unnecessary to repeat them at this time.

It is not my intention to enlarge to you upon the future of this territory, and discuss the many advantages offered to those desirous of leaving the older states for the purpose of seeking new locations, and participating in the many benefits incident to a young and prosperous territory. Dakota, unsurpassed in soil and climate, and the abundance and variety of her own resources, has already attracted the attention of the whole country, and promises soon to be filled up by a hardy, industrious and intelligent population. With a satisfactory adjustment of Indian affairs, and the end of the rebellion, we shall witness the checked immigration of the past few years again spring up, and soon the rich valleys of the Missouri, the Big Sioux, Dakota, Red River and Niobrara will be crowded with dense settlements, thriving towns and commercial cities.

At the last session of Congress an act was passed authorizing the construction of the Pacific Railroad. The idea of a great central railway across the continent has been a popular one for some years, and has received the approval of the whole country. While this is a great enterprise of public improvement, identified with every interest of the nation, which we in common with others will participate in, yet we have every reason to expect local and immediate benefits to flow from its construction. Sioux City has been very properly designated as the point from which the north branch shall start. We are especially interested in an amendment to the bill as passed, which shall require that this branch shall be located on the north side of the Missouri, and thence up the valley of the Niobrara River to the most practicable point of connection with the main trunk. As the bill will be amended in many particulars at the present session of Congress, I think, with the proper effort, that the amendment which most interests our territory may be carried.

My former message contained several suggestions and recommendations which, under the great pressure of local and general business, were not acted upon by the last Legislature, and as I believe some of them vital to the best interests of the territory, and equally appropriate at the present time, I trust you will give them the attention and consideration that you, in your wisdom, may deem necessary.

I would also most respectfully bespeak your counsel and hearty cooperation in all public measures for the promotion of the general well-being of the territory; and I trust that your deliberations will be harmonious—guided by wisdom and justice. And in conclusion I ask you to join me in the hope that before the coming of another Legislative Assembly in your respective halls the dark clouds of civil and Indian wars, which now overcast our political sky, through the interposition of an overruling Providence, will have been swept away forever, letting in the sunshine of peace, liberty and prosperity upon our once more happy country.

W. JAYNE, Governor.

At the conclusion of the message the joint convention dissolved, and the House proceeded with legislative business, until adjourned.

In the report of the Committee on Elections, regarding Charles Mix County, it is stated that eighty votes were thrown out but no explanation is given. This vote had been disregarded by the territorial board of canvassers, who were satisfied that it was illegal and had been cast by members of the Seventh Iowa Cavalry then stationed at Fort Randall. This committee had the same information that was given to the board.

During the Civil war, which at this time was convulsing the country from center to circumference, great care was taken by the several states and territories to protect their citizen soldiery in their right of franchise. Polls were opened on the tented fields, judges and clerks chosen, and the soldier was permitted to cast his vote for the officers he would have been entitled to vote for if at home; and these votes were carefully canvassed and the returns made to the proper authorities, and such a thing as fraud in these elections was seldom known. The law of Dakota Territory regulating the soldier vote was passed at the first session and formed part of the regular election law. Section 49 provided that Any citizen of Dakota Territory who is a qualified voter shall not be deprived of his vote because he is in the military service of the United States; Provided, he resided in said territory at the time he enlisted. The officers and privates of any company or part of any company of Dakota Volunteers who are in the military service of the United States shall be permitted to vote at the polls in any authorized district, at any authorized election, for any of the following named officers, to wit: Delegate to Congress and all territorial officers; Provided, such officers or officer are required by law to be elected at such election; but no officer or private of such military company shall be allowed to vote at such election for any precinct or county officers, nor for the member of the Legislative Assembly, unless such volunteer officer or private be in the county in which he resided at the time of his enlistment. In case any company or detachment of Dakota Volunteers in the service of the United States be without the limits of an organized county, or more than five miles distant from an authorized precinct, on the day of an election authorized by law, the officers and privates of any such company or part of company may elect three judges of election, which judges shall appoint two clerks, and the judges shall take and administer such oaths as are required by this act; and the polls shall be opened and conducted in like manner as prescribed in this act for elections in authorized precincts; and when the board shall have been organized as aforesaid, and the polls proclaimed open, all such volunteer officers and privates then present shall be allowed to vote in like manner and for such officers as prescribed in this section, and return shall be made of such election to the secretary of this territory.

On the twenty-fourth day M. H. Somers presented a petition through Representative Wallace, claiming the seat occupied by William Frisbie, from Cole County, which was referred to the Committee on Elections, who reported thereon on the thirty-first day, as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Your Committee on Elections, to whom was referred the contested case of Messrs. Somers and Frisbie, from the first representative district, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to report that Mr. Somers and Mr. Frisbie were opposing candidates for the office of representative in said district. That there were three election precincts in said district or county, to wit: Big Sioux, Elk Point and Brule Creek. That at Big Sioux Precinct Mr. Somers received 22 votes, and Mr. Frisbie, 5 votes; at Elk Point Precinct Mr. Somers received 24 votes, and Mr. Frisbie, 4 votes. Making for Somers at the two precincts, 46 votes, and for Frisbie, 9 votes.

Your committee has had before it a voluminous amount of testimony in regard to the election at Brule Creek Precinct. Very much of this testimony is of such a contradictory character that your committee is embarrassed in arriving at a safe and just conclusion. They can therefore only submit their own common sense view of the case. And it is the opinion of your committee from all the evidence before it that there were not more than thirty legal votes polled at Brule Creek Precinct for the office of representative. It is the opinion of your committee that the votes polled at Big Sioux and Elk Point were strictly legal, and even allowing the entire legal vote cast at Brule Creek to have been in favor of Mr. Frisbie, he could not have received a majority of the votes of said district or of the County of Cole. It is therefore the opinion of your committee that the contestant, M. H. Somers, received a majority of the legal votes of said district or of the County of Cole; therefore, be it

Resolved, That William Frisbie, who now holds a seat on the floor of this house as a member of the first representative district, is not entitled to the same; and be it further

Resolved, That M. H. Somers is entitled to a seat on the floor of this house as representative from the first representative district, and that he be and is hereby admitted to the same.

J. V. BECKMAN, Chairman.
A. J. HARRIS.

The report was adopted and Mr. Somers was sworn in. This closed the contested seat cases for the session, the remainder of the time being wholly given to the work of legislation. And as the House had been working diligently since the joint convention, that body had caught up with the Council, and matters moved along without unpleasant incident to the end. A new apportionment bill was among the most important laws enacted as it increased the membership of the Council to the maximum allowed by the organic act—thirteen councilmen and twenty-four members of the House, twenty-six being the maximum, distributed as follows:

Cole County, the First Legislative District, three councilmen and five House members.

Clay, Lincoln, Deuel, Minnehaha and Brookings, the Second District, three councilmen and six House members.

Yankton and Jayne counties, the Third District, three councilmen and five House members.

Bon Homme and Hutchinson counties, the Fourth District, one councilman and two House members.

Charles Mix and Brughier counties, the Fifth District, one councilman and two House members.

Todd and Gregory, the Third District, one councilman and two House members.

Kittson, Chippewa, Stevens and Cheyenne counties, Red River, the Seventh District, one councilman and two House members.

The Legislature adjourned on the 9th of January, 1863, after an exciting session of forty days. The apportionment bill was very unsatisfactory to the Red River members, who claimed to have the largest vote of any district, and was also unpopular with the Bon Homme delegation. It would seem to have been the outcome of a combination in which Union, Clay, Yankton, Charles Mix joined, voting population and political predilections being entirely ignored.

A number of wholesome laws were passed at this session, including an entire criminal and justice's code, and a law authorizing and prescribing a territorial seal. Congress was memorialized regarding military posts; additional troops for the protection of the settlements; for roads; bridges; mail routes; land endowment for the university, and other needs of the territory.

It cannot be said that all was peace and good will among the members at the close. The session had been one of constant friction in the House, and the partisans of the two congressmen were apparently much more zealous and defiant than before the session. A full year and more would elapse before Congress would act upon the contest, and in the meantime the scandals growing out of the election of 1862 were enough to keep the public mind in a disturbed and antagonistic condition. It was evident too that a serious division among the leading republicans was imminent, growing out of the election frauds and personal ambitions and the control of Federal patronage.

It would seem that these election frauds were largely the outgrowth of the Indian troubles, and the excitement they produced at the time the election was held, when a number of lawless and unscrupulous characters took advantage of the prevailing confusion and undertook to advance their personal interests by corrupting the ballot box. It is gratifying to know that, in nearly every instance, they failed to secure any advantage from their lawless proceedings.

THE GREAT SEAL

At the session of the Legislature of 1862-63 a law was enacted establishing a great seal for the Territory of Dakota. The bill was introduced in the Council by Hon. John Shober, of Bon Homme County, and became a law without opposition.

An act to establish a seal for the Territory of Dakota.

Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota:

Section 1. That the following described seal is hereby declared to be and is hereby constituted the great seal of Dakota Territory, to wit: A tree in the open field, the trunk of which is surrounded by a bundle of rods, bound with three bands; on the right plow, anvil, sledge, rake and fork; on the left, bow crossed with three arrows; Indian on horseback pursuing a buffalo toward the setting sun; foliage of the tree arched by half circle of thirteen stars, surrounded by the motto: "Liberty and Union, one and inseparable, now and forever," the words "Great Seal" at the top, and at the bottom, "Dakota Territory; on the left, "March 2;" on the right, "1861." Seal 2½ inches in diameter.

Sec. 2. This act to take effect from and after its passage and approval by the governor.

Approved, January 3, 1863.

tiful, but ill-fated Queen Mary. He was a native of Canada, where several branches of that name had emigrated. His childhood and early youth were spent in that country, under the glorious and happy reign of Queen Victoria. In 1849 he removed to Minnesota and resided in that territory, engaged in successful business, until President Pierce appointed him collector of the port of Pembina, in 1854. He retained that position until superseded in 1861 by Norman Kitson, appointed by Mr. Lincoln. In 1861 Mr. McFetridge was elected councilman from the Red River District of the Legislative Assembly of Dakota, but W. W. Brookings, of Sioux Falls, held the certificate from that district, and had been given the seat before Mr. McFetridge reached the territorial capital, and for reasons of policy Mr. McFetridge did not contest; but a special law was enacted at the same session giving the Red River a separate council and representative district, and Mr. McFetridge was again chosen and took his seat at the opening of the second session. In 1862 McFetridge was a democrat, but politics cut little figure in the Legislature of that early day. He proved to be an excellent member and promoted such legislation as the times demanded, and sought to secure through the Legislature the opening up of the Red River Valley to white settlement through a treaty that would transfer the title to the lands from the Chippewa Indian nation to the Government. Prior to the organization of Dakota, Mr. McFetridge had labored to secure a separate organization for the northern part of the territory to be called Chippewa. He was highly respected by his fellow members, and in a general way cheerfully performed his duties, serving the interests of the Missouri slope as heartily as those of his district, though stoutly affirming that there was little of mutual interest to justify the binding of them together in one political organization.

The law granting a legislative district to the Red River country was repealed at the third session of the Legislature, and the Red River remained without representation until 1867, when Mr. Stutsman was sent down as the first representative, but it had no representation in the Council until four years later, when Mr. Stutsman was chosen as the first member to that body from that district.

Hugh Stuart Donaldson was a native of Canada and came to Minnesota about the year 1850. He pursued the business of land dealer and agent until the year 1857, when he removed to the Red River of the North, having received the appointment of postmaster at Pembina, Dakota, from President Buchanan, which office he held until the appointment of his successor by Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. Donaldson was chosen the first representative from the Red River District, in 1861, under the governor's proclamation, representing all the territory above the head of the Red River of the North, and was reelected in 1862. He served his constituents with signal success during the first session, and by patient effort and prudent management, secured the passage of the only apportionment law enacted at the first session which gave to his region a separate council district and doubled the membership of his representative district.

Mr. Donaldson was uniformly courteous and painstaking in his legislative work, giving patient study to every matter of legislation before him and voting conscientiously. He was both a prominent and influential member.

Mr. Donaldson was not hasty in adopting an opinion or coming to a conclusion, but once he became settled in his convictions, it was a difficult matter to get him to reconsider. There must have been some of the stubbornness of the Scotch in his make-up. He would never yield until voted out—beaten but not conquered—but was good natured, as much so in defeat as in victory, hence he was popular with his fellows. He was a democrat of the old school, and wavered not a jot, and enjoyed political debate. The Civil war was on, and the only test was the question, "Do you favor the Union?" Donaldson was plainly for the Government of the United States, but it was evident that the political discussions on the international boundary line were carried on with a wider latitude for opinion than was patiently tolerated among the white people East and South. Mr. Donaldson was a man of enterprise, earnest and intelligent in his views regarding what should be done to advance the interests of Dakota, and first of all, as everyone agreed, adopt measures to bring population to the territory, and farmers preferred.

Mr. Donaldson removed to Winnipeg a few years later, and identified himself with the business interests of that city, achieving moderate success.

Joseph Yardley Buckman, one of the representatives of Kittson County, was of "Broadbrim" origin. Both his father's and mother's ancestors were associates of William Penn, the famous Quaker, and were in the council with him when was consummated one of the most notable treaties ever made between the white race and the Indians of North America.

The Buckmans and the Yardleys are not only one of the earliest, but of the most respectable and prolific families of the old Pennsylvania colony. They are today numerously represented throughout that commonwealth, and their descendants may be found in many sections of our common country.

Joseph, the subject of this sketch, was born in Bucks County, Pennsylvania, in 1833, and remained in his native state, on the farm, at school, and in the counting room, until twenty-two years of age, when in the spring of 1855 he removed to Minnesota. He resided at St. Paul and Superior City during the real estate inflation of 1855, 1856 and 1857. In 1860 he removed to Pembina, Dakota, and at the commencement of Mr. Lincoln's administration as President, he was appointed postmaster at Pembina, which office he was holding at the time this sketch was written, 1862-63. At the territorial election in 1862 Mr. Buckman was chosen one of the representatives from the Red River District. He took his seat at the beginning of the session, and though for the first time a member of a legislative body, he aptly invested himself with the habit and form of a legislator, and had throughout discharged his obligations with wise discernment and sound judgment.

Mr. Buckman was a republican, and an honest Quaker in his faith, yet unselfish in action and catholic in his belief. Intelligent, kind-hearted and liberal, he was both companion and friend. Lively and mirthful, his rubicund visage always gratefully welcomes whatever will produce good cheer.

Dakota's first general election under the statutes, which occurred on Monday, the first day of September, 1862, was marked by gross frauds and irregularities in one-third of the election precincts of the territory. These were the precincts of Brule Creek in Cole County, Bon Homme, Charles Mix and alleged also at the Red River polls. The election occurred just at the beginning of the great excitement growing out of the Indian hostilities of that year, and the public disorder and alarm attendant upon the period of anxiety gave opportunity and possibly suggested the scandalous occurrences at the precincts mentioned, with the exception of those on Red River. These frauds furnished ground for a contest before Congress for the right to a seat in the House. The territorial board of canvassers having found from the returns that a majority of the legal votes were cast for Gov. William Jayne, had awarded him the certificate. General Todd thereupon declared his purpose to contest, and served notice of such intention upon the governor, November 17, 1862, stating that he would begin the taking of testimony before Judge Bliss at the office of Attorney General Gleason at Yankton on January 6, 1863. The Legislature was in session at Yankton during December and the early part of January, and the lower House had been engaged in settling the contested cases of members from disputed counties for nearly one-half its term. The testimony that had been adduced before the legislative committees was the same as that taken before Judge Bliss in the delegate contest. First was the evidence of Thaddeus Andrews, one of the judges of election at the Brule Creek precinct. This election, it will be understood, was before the day of the Australian ballot, when the election ballots were furnished by the committee of the different political parties, and were given out in quantities before election, to whoever wanted them. Any person was also privileged to write or print tickets, selecting his own candidates if he so preferred.

My name is Thaddeus Andrews; I reside at Brule Creek, Cole County, Dakota Territory. I was present at the election held at the Brule Creek Precinct on the 1st day of September, 1862. I was one of the judges of election at said precinct.

First interrogatory: Were the judges of election and clerk sworn at said election?

(Witness refuses to answer.)

The polls were opened at said election at the house of A. R. Phillips, at Brule Creek aforesaid. They were opened at 9 o'clock in the morning of the 1st day of September, 1862. The judges and clerks were present at said election. One of the judges who were appointed by the commissioners refused to serve, and A. R. Phillips nominated Milton M. Rich, who was elected by the persons present in the house. I do not recollect the number present; I think there were about forty votes cast during the day, after the polls were opened at 9 o'clock A. M.

Second interrogatory: Was the ballot box opened and examined before the voting commenced, after the polls were opened at 9 o'clock on said day?

(Witness refuses to answer.)

I should think there were ballots in the ballot box before the voting commenced after the polls were opened; there were about thirty ballots in the ballot box before the polls were opened. I cannot tell for whom the ballots were cast, but I suppose they were cast for William Jayne for delegate to Congress. They were cast for the south half of the northeast quarter of Section No. 29, Township 92 North for county seat. These ballots were put in the ballot box by some person; I am unable to state by whom. The ballots were put in between Sunday evening and 9 o'clock Monday morning; I think about 3 o'clock Monday morning. I think they were put in at A. R. Phillips' house, but I am not sure that that was the place. I was present at the time they were put in; there were quite a number around while this was going on.

Third interrogatory: Do you know that those ballots were put in the ballot box at the house of Timothy Andrews?

(Witness refuses to answer.)

I cannot state whether the ballots that were in the ballot box when the voting commenced were all put in by one man or not. The polls were closed and we commenced canvassing the votes publicly. We counted all the ballots in the ballot box. We found that the number of ballots in the ballot box did not agree with the number of names on the poll list. There were six ballots more in the ballot box than there were names on the poll list. Six ballots were then picked out from the top of the ballots in the box, which were destroyed; the remainder of the ballots we then canvassed, and returned them to the office of the clerk of the Board of County Commissioners of Cole County. The names of persons voting during the day were taken down by the clerk of the election. There are names of persons on the poll list who did not vote during election day. I think there are about thirty names on the list who did not vote.

Fourth interrogatory: How came those names on the poll list?

(Witness refuses to answer.)

One of the poll lists was returned to the clerk of the board of county commissioners. The clerks of the election were Mahlon Gore and William C. Butts. The judges were myself, A. R. Phillips and Milton M. Rich.

THADDEUS ANDREWS.

Other witnesses testified corroborating Mr. Andrews.

In the Bon Homme precinct the testimony was the same as that reported by the elections committee of the Territorial House and will be found under the legislative proceedings of 1862-63.

In Charles Mix County the evidence showed that 145 votes were cast, 138 for Jayne and seven for Todd. Of this number there were from sixty-five to seventy-five votes cast by Iowa soldiers stationed at Fort Randall as proven by the poll list.

This concluded the proceedings before Judge Bliss at Yankton. Sixty days was the time allowed by law for the taking of testimony and this period expired on the 16th of January, 1863, but notwithstanding the expiration of the time, the contestant received notice that the deposition of Joseph Y. Buckman, regarding the vote on Red River, would be taken before Hon. W. F. Purcell, judge of the Orphans Court in the District of Columbia, March 11, 1863. At this time both parties appeared, General Todd under protest, objecting that the judge had no jurisdiction.

Mr. Buckman testified in substance that he had been an Indian trader and postmaster at Pembina for several years; that he did not think there were more than ten to twelve white persons present on the day of election; that of these there were three who claimed to be native born citizens and three others who claimed to be naturalized citizens, and more who had declared their intentions to become citizens. He testified that there were forty-six or forty-eight votes cast for de-gate at the election; that the excess over the number of legal voters present was cast by illegal voters, mostly half-breeds, and that there were added to the votes cast, after the close of the polls, a little over one hundred votes, and that Charles Morneau, who was clerk of the board of county commissioners and who signed and sent the certificate to the secretary of the territory, was present at the election.

Congress not being in session at the time the taking of the testimony was concluded, the matter went over until the next session which began in December, 1863. Neither of the parties were given a seat until January 14, 1864, when Mr. Davis, from the committee on elections, reported a resolution giving the seat to Mr. Jayne, on the ground that he held the legal certificate from the governor of Dakota, without prejudice to General Todd's claims.

The matter was given investigation quite thoroughly by the congressional Committee on Elections, of which Mr. Davis was chairman. The majority of this committee submitted a report May 24, 1864, which was ordered to be printed; and on the 1st of June following a minority report was also submitted. On the 18th of June the matter came before the House for final action. The majority report recommended the exclusion of Buckman's testimony on the ground that it was not taken within the time prescribed by law. It also threw out the vote of Bon Homme County entirely, stigmatizing the election proceedings as disgraceful. The report found as follows:

The official canvass of the territorial board of canvassers stated the result to be:

For Wm. Jayne.....	237	For J. B. S. Todd.....	221

Giving General Todd a majority of eighty-eight votes, and the committee recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That William Jayne is not entitled to a seat in this House as a delegate from the Territory of Dakota in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

Resolved, That J. B. S. Todd is entitled to a seat in the House as a delegate from Dakota to the Thirty-eighth Congress.

Congress finally reached a vote on the report and resolutions June 18, 1864, by which the first resolution was adopted by a vote of sixty-four to thirty-one, eighty six members not voting. Thereupon General Todd was sworn in, and the matter was settled.

The minority report objected to counting the vote of the Red River precincts, contending that the census returns of the year before showed but forty-two white males in the whole Red River country over the age of twenty-one, and these were all residents on lands to which the Indian title had not been extinguished. There had been no emigration to that country, for emigrants would not be permitted to settle on Indian lands. The testimony of Buckman was also presented, and a strong argument made for throwing out the Red River vote entirely. This report was not acted upon.

The votes thrown out from those cast at the Yankton precinct were those of D. T. Fessenden, C. Fessenden, A. B. Wood, J. Mellin, Albert Mellin, who were in Dakota temporarily as United States deputy surveyors and returned to Michigan after the election; also G. W. Lamson, of the surveyor general's office, who left the territory right after the election and whose family resided in Michigan; also George N. Propper, who had not resided in the territory six months prior to election, and also P. C. Conway of Company A, Dakota Cavalry, whose residence at the time of enlistment was at St. Johns, Nebraska.

In answering the position of Mr. Jayne regarding the Indian title to the land in the Red River country, the majority report contended that the sitting member was mistaken in his construction of the law, found in the first section of the organic act, which says:

Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to impair the right of persons or property now pertaining to the Indians in said territory, so long as such right shall remain unextinguished by treaty between the United States and such Indians, or to include any territory which by treaty with any Indian tribe is not, without the consent of said tribe, to be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any state or territory; but all such territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries and form no part of the Territory of Dakota, until said tribe shall signify their assent to the President of the United States.

It is apparent, upon reading the proviso, that the territory which it is therein provided shall be set apart for any particular tribe of Indians, and thereby to be excepted out of the limits of the territory, is that which is set apart by treaty with any particular tribe, and is so excepted by the treaty itself. It does not apply to any portion of the territory upon which Indians may happen to live, but only such portions as are held by particular tribes under and by virtue of treaties defining boundaries, and stipulating for exclusive jurisdiction to be exercised by the tribes holding them. No such treaty existed covering any portion of the precinct under consideration and therefore the vote cast there cannot for this reason be excluded.

As bearing upon the voting population of the Red River country:

In 1867 Hon. M. K. Armstrong had occasion to visit the Red River region for the purpose of prosecuting the survey of a body of lands which had recently been ceded to the Government by the Chippewa Indians. Mr. Armstrong was present at the election held in the St. Joseph precinct October 8th, regarding which he wrote as follows: "Today I have witnessed one of the famous 'Red River elections.' I came in late last night from my line nine miles back in the woods to witness the show today. Here you will remember is the country where in the early days of Jo Rolette and Minnesota Territory, the balance of power was weighed and never found wanting. Two hundred and fifty votes were polled today at St. Joseph, mostly all in the morning before I reached the polls, and about thirty at Pembina." This would indicate something of the reckless manner in which elections had been conducted during the time of the Jayne and Todd election.

This action of the House gave the seat to General Todd and the incident was officially closed; but occurring as it did in the midst of the preliminary campaign of 1864, between Burleigh and Bliss, it had a very important bearing on that contest, as well as in the subsequent attitude of General Todd. Intelligence of the decision in favor of Todd was received at Yankton about the 21st of June. It was very cordially welcomed by the democrats and the insurgent republicans; while the regular republicans as they were called were obliged to accept it without protest or indignation because it had been the verdict of a House of Representatives in which their own party was very largely in the majority. The proceedings and testimony of the contest were published in pamphlets and newspapers and later distributed among the Dakota people as a campaign document.

Dr. William Jayne, the first governor of Dakota Territory, was born in Springfield, Illinois, in the year 1824, and was therefore thirty-seven years old when appointed governor. He had been a prominent physician in Springfield and Sangamon County for several years, and was the family physician of President Lincoln. Doctor Jayne had taken an active part in political affairs prior to the formation of the republican party and was allied with the free soil wing of the old whig party with which Mr. Lincoln was affiliated and one of its ablest and most prominent leaders. He doubtless owed his appointment to his personal acquaintance with the President, aided by good abilities, excellent character, and the agreement of his political views with those of the dominant party. It would appear that Mr. Jayne did not seem inclined to enter upon and pursue a pioneer career in Dakota; but during his brief administration, a large portion of which was covered by Dakota's most serious Indian troubles, he labored earnestly for the accomplishment of whatever would promote the welfare of the people and the territory. As the record shows, the election at which he was a candidate for delegate to Congress, was held amidst a general alarm and great excitement caused by a hostile uprising of the Indians, and the opportunity for fraudulent voting was seized upon by unscrupulous parties to promote local interests and pursue ends. However, he was the accredited delegate from Dakota, and held his seat until Congress decided that his opponent was entitled to it. He then returned to Springfield where he resumed his medical practice and his activity in political affairs. He has since been chosen mayor of that thriving state capital for three terms and has been a zealous friend and promoter of the humanitarian institutions of that state, and is now at the ripe age of eighty-one, a member of the State Board of Charities and Corrections.

The dominant party in the Legislature of 1862-63, having an earnest sympathy with Governor Jayne in the contest that had been instituted by General Todd for the position of delegate in Congress, which contest was then pending, made an examination of the election returns of 1862, the proceedings of the canvassing board, composed of Judge Bliss and Secretary Hutchinson, and also of the records of the secretary's office, and embodied the result of their examination in a report, which was duly adopted by both houses and authenticated, and sent forward to the speaker of the House of Representatives. The report, in addition to giving the result of the canvas as made by the board shortly after the election, which resulted favorably to Jayne and gave him the certificate, dealt with some official statements that had afterwards been given to Todd, criticizing and reflecting severely upon both canvassers, who were now (in 1863) in open opposition to the Jayne faction. The aggrieved gentlemen, in order to combat the influence of the legislative document, made a statement to Congress, which is here given:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned, chief justice and secretary of the Territory of Dakota, and canvassers of the vote of 1862 for delegate to Congress and territorial treasurer and auditor, respectfully represent: That the Legislative Assembly of the territory, just closed, has passed a joint resolution relative to our action as canvassers of said vote on the 21st of October, 1862, which resolution, we are informed, has been forwarded to your honorable body, attested by the principal officers of the said Assembly. We have thus far refrained from taking any formal notice of the unfriendly criticism passed upon our action, but this recent ex parte declaration of the lawmaking body, under the spur of disgraceful partisanship, compels us, in our own defense (and not for the purpose of influencing the action of your honorable body in the contest from this territory now pending before you), to make the following statement:

First, while we regard the supervision of our proceedings as impertinent intermeddling and entirely foreign to the duties of the Legislature, we might charitably respect their action as an honest desire to represent popular sentiment were we not aware that the reverse is the case most emphatically and justly, because in those counties where those members who voted for said resolution were elected the dominant issue was the repudiation of the ballot box stuffing which disgraced the election of 1862, and these representatives would not have been chosen had they made their campaign upon the joint resolution which is the subject of this statement.

Second, The proceedings of the canvassing board were carefully considered, with a desire to do justice, rebuke fraud, and protect Dakota from the evils which illegal voting give birth to, and preserve its reputation from the contamination that has besmirched the exercise of the elective franchise in other political divisions of the West. We also felt that the honor of the republican party, to some extent, depended upon our action, and its future influence in these new communities would be aided or hindered by the manner in which we discharged this duty, doubly important because it was the first election held under the laws of the new territory. We had voted for and desired the election of Governor Jayne as delegate, but we desired more than this to protect him from the dishonor of schemes principally concocted by or through the agency of Buchanan democrats, whom the governor had admitted to his confidence to the exclusion of his own party friends. The law provides that the board shall canvass, that is, look into, the count of votes as returned by the county officials. We had unofficial information of an authentic character that gross frauds had been committed, but we had no means of examining and taking the testimony of individual voters, and therefore determined to hear testimony in relation to the election in the several precincts; and if its general character and conduct was intentionally and scandalously fraudulent, we would consider the poll of that precinct so badly tainted as to justify us in rejecting the returns sent us. It was a matter of regret that we had not the authority and the means to separate the honest vote from that which was fraudulent; but in the absence of that power felt it our duty, when the aggregate vote largely outnumbered the number of votes in the precinct, to treat the whole poll as fraudulent. We were confirmed in this position by our own experience and that of our political friends during the first election in Kansas Territory. Both the canvassers, one in Kansas and the other in Washington, had been active participants in the exciting events that to some extent initiated the present rebellion, and had been made aware of the dangerous advantage a lawless body of men could gain by the perpetration of a successful fraud upon the ballot box, and felt no hesitation in applying the precedent established then to destroy the fruits of illegal voting and ballot box stuffing to this election, though greatly regretting the necessity which impelled us to the exercise of such authority. Our canvass was public and the rules we had adopted were publicly announced. Evidence was offered and received by us in the cases of Charles Mix and Bon Homme County precincts. In the case of Charles Mix it was shown that about one hundred Iowa soldiers, stationed at Fort Randall, were given permission to go across the Missouri River on election day, for the ostensible purpose of gathering plums. That they did so cross the river, and divided in small parties and went to the polls in Charles Mix County and voted. Some rowdyish conduct was also proven.

In the investigation we learned to our satisfaction that at least two-thirds of the entire vote of the precinct was cast by the Iowa soldiers, who were not citizens of the territory. The attention of Candidate Jayne was called to this testimony, he being present as well as his opponent, General Todd. Governor Jayne was informed that the board would give him time to offer evidence in rebuttal, when he replied that he thought Iowa soldiers had a right to vote. The law expressly provides "that no soldier, officer or private, other than those who resided in the territory prior to and at the time of their enlistment in the army, shall be entitled to vote at the elections in this territory." Being convinced of the grossly illegal character of this Charles Mix County vote, the board of canvassers rejected it.

In regard to the returns from the County of Bon Homme, which the joint resolution charges, though incorrectly, as having been counted by the board, testimony was given by the friends of Candidate Jayne to the effect that the vote returned to the board was not the vote that was cast during the hours appointed by the law for the polls to remain open; but after the close of the poll in the evening the ballot box was forcibly taken from the judges, the ballots destroyed, and a second election held, at which the votes returned to the board were polled. In rebuttal of this statement was the evidence offered on behalf of Candidate Todd that no force was used, but a new polling was demanded by the supporters of Todd on the ground that at the count of the ballots by the judges, after the regular poll was closed, but thirteen of the thirty-nine ballots found in the box were in favor of Todd for delegate, while twenty-six of the thirty-nine persons who voted declared that they had voted for him. That the ballot box had been in the possession of his enemies during the recess at noon, and they were charged with changing the ballots. The board held that, even admitting the claim that the ballots had been changed, the election held after the closing of the polls was of no effect and not the lawful remedy, and therefore rejected the entire vote of that precinct.

The return from the Brule Creek Precinct in Cole County, which was the only county, excepting Kitson on Red River, where there was more than one precinct, was not returned to the board with the returns made from the other precincts from that county. The claim was made by Candidate Todd that the Brule Creek return was grossly fraudulent, in that a majority of the ballots for his opponent were put into the ballot box the night before the election by minors and non-residents, and he requested time to obtain the evidence which would support the protest. We declined to extend him this privilege, as we considered that he already had had ample time to secure his evidence, and because we did not then believe the reports regarding that precinct which subsequent developments have brought to light. Candidate Todd also requested the board to adjourn its final action one month in order that the returns from the Red River precincts might be secured, averring that the delay in the reception of that return was probably due to the Minnesota Indian troubles. This request was refused, our interpretation of the law being that the requirement "to proceed to canvass" made it the duty of the board to continue in session until the work was completed. We did, however, adjourn from day to day, for several days, when, not receiving the Red River returns, nor any word concerning them, we closed the canvass and declared the result.

We believe your honorable body will decide the case between these Dakota contestants according to law and arithmetic. The Dakota people are industrious, loyal, and honest—saving the very few who have engaged in these schemes to vitiate the ballot box for personal ends. It is not a matter of vital importance to Dakota Territory which of the two gentlemen claiming the seat in Congress shall succeed, but it is of the first importance that the decision of Congress shall be founded in law and justice. This is what the loyal and law-abiding people of Dakota demand and all they ask for. The honor of the national administration is somewhat at stake. The integrity of our newly born republican party is on trial. Dakota has been overrun and almost depopulated by hostile Indians on one side, but more virulently assailed by unscrupulous politicians on the other. We have confidence that your action will vindicate the right and place the stamp of disapproval emphatically upon ballot box corruption.

CHAPTER XXVI

THE INDIAN CAMPAIGN OF 1863—SIBLEY

INDIAN CAMPAIGN OF 1863, PLANNED BY MAJOR-GENERAL POPE—GENERAL SIBLEY, WITH MINNESOTA TROOPS, CROSSES CENTRAL DAKOTA PLAINS—GENERAL SULLY MARCHES UP THE MISSOURI VALLEY—SIBLEY'S FORCES, EQUIPMENT AND DIFFICULTIES—A DRY SEASON—SIBLEY DEFEATS HOSTILES IN THREE BATTLES; INDIANS DRIVEN WEST OF THE MISSOURI RIVER—HIS RETURN MARCH—OFFICIAL REPORT—ERRONEOUS OPINION OF NORTHERN PART OF THE TERRITORY—INDIANS KILL AN INDIAN—TREATY BETWEEN YANKTONS AND PONCAS.

The military campaign of 1863 was planned by Major General Pope, with headquarters at Milwaukee. His department was called the Military Department of the Northwest. In brief his plan was:

1. General Sibley, of Minnesota, with a force of 4,000 troops to pursue a northwest course crossing from Minnesota into Dakota at Big Stone Lake, where it was expected he would find the hostiles and bring them to battle, and if not could drive them to the Missouri River, where

2. General Sully with a force nearly equal but chiefly cavalry, was ordered to keep along the left bank of the Missouri River and intercept any communication between the Little Crow forces and the Sioux west of the Missouri, known generally as Tetons. Sully's troops were to be mainly supplied by steamboats keeping along with his army and guarded by a force of infantry.

General Sibley got away from Fort Ridgely near the head of the Minnesota River, about the 1st of July. His force consisted of the Sixth, Seventh and Tenth Minnesota Infantry, one regiment of mounted riflemen enlisted for the Indian war only, and the Third Minnesota Battery. He was accompanied by a train of 250 teams carrying supplies. The march across the plains of North Dakota was attended with many difficulties, caused principally by the extreme drouth which had deprived the plains of their customary covering of nutritious grasses, while many of the smaller streams had dried up completely. The Indians had retired well toward the Missouri taking a southwest direction from Devil's Lake, evidently aiming to cross opposite the mouth of Heart River, a favorite valley with the savages, should they find themselves outmatched by the troops, and Sibley came up with them on the 24th of July about thirty miles from the river.

BATTLE OF BUFFALO LAKE

The enemy had planned to invite Sibley and his officers to a council under a promise to make peace, and while thus engaged to fall upon them and massacre the whole party. One of Sibley's half-breed scouts learned of this from a Sisseton relative and notified him. In confirmation of this plot, a number of the hostiles by gestures and fine words secured the attention of a number of the scouts, and conveyed to them their strong desire for peace and their willingness to become friendly with the "Great Father" and abandon the war. While this was transpiring, Surgeon Weiser, in full uniform, rode up to the council and joined the scouts. A few minutes later a shot was heard and great confusion was observed in the council. The Indians were retreating and the scouts were flying back to the main body. It seems that a young Indian, observing Surgeon Weiser's glittering uniform, supposed he was the commander, and in his eagerness to commence the slaughter, shot the surgeon through the heart. This was the signal for a battle.

A general engagement followed, the Indians commencing the attack behind the shelter of the surrounding ridges. They were dislodged by the Mounted Rangers and the battery and retreated for several miles, fighting and retreating alternately, until finally they broke and fled in apparent confusion. Alonzo G. Edgerton, afterward chief justice of Dakota, was a captain in the Tenth Minnesota, and his company was one of the first to be engaged at the opening of the fight. Hon. Abe Van Osdel, of Mission Hill, was a member of the Mounted Rangers and participated in this campaign, a full account of which from his observation, he has given to the public through the press. The battle now raged for hours, the Indians fighting from behind the ridges and gradually falling back, until late in the evening when they appeared to have broken up in disorder and hastily retreated, pursued by the troops until dark. An order to bivouac was then given, but was mistaken for an order to return, and the entire night was consumed by the advance in picking their way back to camp, which they reached just at daylight and just as Sibley was about to move forward to their support. The vanguard of the Indians had reached the Missouri River in the evening of the 24th and the squaws and papooses had been sent across to the west bank. Owing to the fatigue of a portion of the troops who had made the all night return march, Sibley did not move forward until the 26th, when he found the Indian camp of the 24th deserted; but there and for miles beyond the prairie was strewn with dried buffalo meat, tallow, cooking utensils and buffalo robes, which were collected and burned by the troops. After a march of twelve miles the army reached Dead Buffalo Lake and went into camp. Indians began to appear in large numbers soon after and the troops were thrown out to meet them. The enemy had been reinforced since the first fight, and every effort was made to divide Sibley's forces with the intention of falling upon them by piecemeal. Sibley was too wise to be caught in a trap of this kind. Another running and halting fight similar to that of the 24th was the result, the Indians keeping well out of the way, and darkness fell upon the troops still in pursuit, who bivouacked in the field, and in the early morning of the 28th the battle was resumed.

The Indians, about two thousand strong, came over the hills soon after day-break and advanced to attack. They came so near that they were overheard to say "we are too late; they are ready for us," showing that they had expected to surprise the camp. A scout overheard another Indian shouting, "remember our wives and families; we must not let them get them." The Tenth Minnesota was the first to receive the shock of battle, and the Indians spread out on the right and left outflanking the regiment at both extremes. The firing was very spirited and Sibley's train of supplies which just began moving from the corral was in danger. The Tenth was called back when the Indians made a dash for the rear of the troops but were met with such a galling fire from the battery that they were compelled to abandon their project and retire. This was a close call for the destruction of Sibley's army, and the utmost caution and good generalship became necessary to get in shape for further operations. Finally the Sixth Regiment with a battalion of cavalry held the center and deploying to the right successfully resisted the onslaught from that quarter, while the left wing of the Sixth stretched out toward Dead Buffalo Lake, completely baffling the tactics of the enemy. The troops then moved forward driving the savages before them, and soon turning their retreat into a rout. The Indians struck for the river, passing through a heavy skirt of timber. Sibley followed but before entering the woods, ordered the battery and the Tenth Regiment to clear the timber of the enemy. In the meantime the Indians had reached the river, and tumbling into their light canoes, had made their way to the opposite shore where they ranged up fifteen hundred to two thousand strong and greeted the soldiers when they appeared with a storm of bullets, but at too long a range to be at all dangerous. This ended Sibley's three days' fight without definite results. The Indians had lost a large number in killed and wounded, and an immense quantity of supplies and tepees. Sibley's losses were slight, four killed, two of whom were led astray by taking a wrong trail and were shot down and scalped. One of these was Lieutenant Beever, aid-de-camp to General Sibley, who had been sent forward with orders to General Crooks. Another was Private Nicholas Miller, Company K, Sixth Regiment. A stroke of lightning killed Private John Murphy of Company B, Eighth Cavalry. One wounded Indian tried to escape by seizing the horse's tail but the pony got a shot that disabled him. John Platt, private, of Company L, dashed out to finish the Indian with his revolver but his weapon missed fire and before he could check his horse he was upon the Indian, who had reserved a shot in his gun which he fired into the thigh and bowels of Platt, inflicting fatal wounds. Joe Campbell, one of the scouts, tried to save Platt, but too late. Campbell's shot was fired at the same instant that the Indian fired the fatal shot at Platt and went through the savage and killed him. The Indians in many instances fought desperately. One stalwart warrior with an American flag wrapped around him fired twice while the cavalry were within twenty rods charging upon him, his balls taking effect in the saddle and overcoat of two of the cavalymen. He got the powder in his gun, but not the ball, for a third shot, which he discharged at the heart of one of the soldiers, but did not injure him. The Indian then clubbed his gun and struck one of the troopers, nearly throwing him out of the saddle. A dozen shots from as many carbines struck him at this moment, but did not kill him, and the resolute brave had to be sabered in order to dispatch him.

General Sibley's part in the campaign terminated when he reached the river. He had no facilities for crossing the stream, and his supplies and ammunition were getting low; he therefore set out without delay on his return to Minnesota. He had not been able to gain a decisive victory, but he had weakened the enemy by destroying his camp equipments, a large store of provisions and buffalo robes, and no doubt had impressed upon them the utter futility of their strength and prowess when brought in contact with the pale face soldiers. The Indian loss in killed and wounded had been considerable, but their custom of carrying their slain and injured comrades from the field makes it impossible to tell how serious their losses were.

It is not clear that Sibley knew anything of the whereabouts of General Sully, who at the time Sibley was chasing the Sioux was holding his command near Fort Pierre awaiting the arrival of supplies which were toiling slowly up the river on steamboats.

Sibley in his report, speaking of the country traversed, says:

The region traversed by my column between the crossing of the Cheyenne River (a tributary of Red River) and the coteau of the Missouri, is for the most part uninhabitable. If the devil were permitted to select a residence upon the earth, he would probably choose this particular district for an abode with the redskin murdering and plundering bands as his ready ministers to verify by their ruthless deeds his diabolical hate to all who belong to a Christian race. Through the vast desert, lakes fair to the eye abound, but generally their waters are strongly alkaline, or intensely bitter or brackish. The valleys between them frequently reek with sulphurous and other disagreeable vapors. The heat was so intolerable that the earth was like a heated furnace, and the breezes that swept along its surface were as scorching and suffocating as the famed Sirocco.

This region which Sibley pronounced uninhabitable is now quite thickly settled by a happy and prosperous people.

Gen. H. H. Sibley, who was in command of the Minnesota pursuing forces in 1862, fought an intermittent skirmishing fight for weeks in the Yellow Medicine country, Minnesota, took a large number of prisoners, rescued hundreds of captives, women and children, and much of the time was seriously hindered by lack of troops, his command being largely composed of settlers who had suffered from the atrocities of the Indians, without cavalry, and short of rations and ammunition. The only conflicts in Dakota under Sibley during that year appear to have been on the Red River in the vicinity of the headwaters, in September, in which the general was able to hold his own. He succeeded, however, in restoring a measure of security to that borderland. The main body of the hostiles escaped, and entering Dakota in the country adjacent to Big Stone Lake and Lake Traverse, took their course northwest by way of the Cheyenne Valley and went on to Devil's Lake. Small war parties separated from the main body and came down the Big Sioux and James River valleys late in August and early in September, killing Amidon and son at Sioux Falls, and compelling the evacuation of the place. This outrage, with their depredations near Yankton, created general alarm in all the Dakota settlements, which for a time threatened the depopulation of the territory. The particulars of these frays are elsewhere narrated.

Report of Gen. H. H. Sibley, United States Army, commanding the Sioux Indian expedition through the northern part of Dakota Territory:

June 16 to September 13, 1863.

Headquarters District of Minnesota, Camp Carter, Bank of James River, Dakota Territory, August 7, 1863.

Major: My last dispatch was dated 21st ultimo., from Camp Olin, in which I had the honor to inform Major General Pope that I had left one-third of my force in an intrenched position at Camp Atchison, and was then one day's march in advance, with 1,400 infantry and 500 cavalry, in the direction where the main body of the Indians were supposed to be. During the three following days I pursued a course somewhat west of south, making fifty miles, having crossed the James River and the great coteau of the Missouri. On the 24th, about 1 P. M., being considerably in advance of the main column with some of the officers of my staff engaged in looking out for a suitable camping ground, the command having marched steadily from 5 A. M., some of my scouts came to me at full speed and reported that a large camp of Indians had just before passed and great numbers of warriors could be seen upon the prairie two or three miles distant. I immediately corralled my train upon the shore of a salt lake near by and established my camp, which was rapidly intrenched by Colonel Crooks, to whom was intrusted that duty, for the security of the transportation in case of attack, a precaution I had taken whenever we encamped for many days previously. While the earthworks were being pushed forward parties of Indians, more or less numerous, appeared upon the hills around us, and one of my half-breed scouts, a relative of Red Plume, a Sisseton chief, hitherto opposed to the war, approached sufficiently near to converse with him. Red Plume told him to warn me that the plan was formed to invite me to a council with some of my superior officers, to shoot us without ceremony, and then attack my command with a great force, trusting to destroy the whole of it. The Indians ventured to a spot where a portion of my scouts had taken position, three or four hundred yards from our camp, and conversed with them in an apparently friendly manner, some of them professing a desire for peace. Surgeon Josiah S. Weiser, of the First Regiment, Minnesota Mounted Rangers, incautiously joined the group of scouts, when a young savage, doubtless supposing from his uniform and horse equipments that he was an officer of rank, pretended great friendship and delight at seeing him, but when within a few feet treacherously shot him through the heart. The scouts discharged their pieces at the murderer, but he escaped, leaving his horse behind. The body of Doctor Weiser was immediately brought into camp, unmutated, save by the ball that killed him. He was universally esteemed, being skillful in his profession and a courteous gentleman. This outrage precipitated an immediate engagement. The savages, in great numbers, concealed by the ridges, had encircled those portions of the camp flanked by the lake referred to, and commenced an attack. Col. Samuel McPhaill, with two companies, subsequently reenforced by others, as they could be spared from other points, was directed to drive the enemy from the vicinity of the hill where Doctor Weiser was shot, while those companies of the Seventh Regiment, under Lieut. Col. W. R. Marshall and Maj. George Bradley, and one company of the Tenth Regiment, under Capt. Alonzo J. Edgerton, were dispatched to support them. Taking with me a six-pounder, under the command of Lieut. John C. Whipple, I ascended a hill toward the big mound, on the opposite side of the ravine, and opened fire with spherical case shot upon the Indians, who had obtained possession of the upper part of the large ravine and of smaller ones tributary to it, under the protection of which they could annoy the infantry and cavalry without exposure on their part. This flank and raking fire of artillery drove them from their hiding places into the open prairie, where they were successively dislodged from the ridges, being utterly unable to resist the steady advance of the Seventh Regiment and the Rangers, but fled before them in confusion. While these events were occurring on the right, the left of the camp was also threatened by a formidable body of warriors. Col. William Crooks, whose regiment, the Sixth, was posted on that side, was ordered to deploy part of his command as skirmishers and to dislodge the enemy. This was gallantly done, the colonel directing in person the movements of one part of his detached force and Lieut. Col. John T. Averill the other, Maj. Robert N. McLaren remaining in command of that portion of the regiment required as part of the camp guard.

The savages were steadily driven from one strong position after another under a severe fire, until feeling their utter inability to contend longer with our soldiers in the open field, they joined their brethren in one common flight. Upon moving forward with my staff to a commanding point which overlooked the field, I discovered the whole body of Indians, numbering from one thousand to one thousand five hundred, retiring in confusion from the combat, while a dark line of moving objects on the distant hills indicated the locality of their families. I immediately dispatched orders to Colonel McPhaill, who had now received an accession of force from the other companies of his mounted regiment, to press on with all expedition and fall upon the rear of the enemy, but not to continue the pursuit after night-fall, and Lieutenant Colonel Marshall was directed to follow and support him with the company of the Seventh and Captain Edgerton's company of the Tenth, accompanied by one six-pounder and one section of mountain howitzers under Captain Jones. At the same time all of the companies of the Sixth and Tenth regiments, except two from each, which were left as a camp guard, were ordered to rendezvous and to proceed in the same direction, but they had so far to march from their respective points before arriving at the spot occupied by myself and staff, that I felt convinced of the uselessness of their proceeding further, the other portions of the pursuing force being some miles in advance, and I accordingly ordered their return to camp. The cavalry gallantly followed the Indians and kept up a running fight until nearly dark, killing and wounding many of their warriors; the infantry under Lieutenant Colonel Marshall being kept at a double quick in their rear. The order to Colonel McPhaill was improperly delivered as requiring him to return to camp instead of bivouacking on the prairie. Consequently he retraced his way with his weary men and horses, followed by the still more wearied infantry, and arrived at camp early the next morning as I was about to move forward with the main column. Thus ended the battle of the "Big Mound." The severity of the labors of the entire command may be appreciated when it is considered that the engagement only commenced after the day's march was nearly completed, and that the Indians were chased at least twelve miles, making altogether at least forty miles performed without rest.

The march of the cavalry of the Seventh Regiment and of Company B of the Tenth Regiment, in returning to camp after the tremendous efforts of the day is almost unparalleled, and it told so fearfully upon men and animals that a forward movement could not take place until the 26th, when I marched at an early hour. Col. J. H. Baker had been left in command of the camp, named by the officers Camp Sibley, during the engagement of the previous day, and all the arrangements for its security were actively and judiciously made, aided as he was by that excellent officer, Lieut. Col. Samuel P. Jennison, of the same regiment. Upon arriving at the camp from which the Indians had been driven in such hot haste, vast quantities of dried meat, tallow and buffalo robes, cooking utensils, and other indispensable articles were found concealed in the long reeds around the lake, all of which were, by my direction, collected and burned. For miles along the route the prairie was covered with the evidences of a hasty flight. Colonel McPhaill had previously informed me that beyond Dead Buffalo Lake, so far as his pursuit of the Indians had continued, I would find neither wood nor water. I consequently established my camp on the border of that lake, and very soon afterward parties of Indians made their appearance threatening an attack. I directed Capt. John Jones to repair with his section of six-pounders, supported by Capt. Jonathan Chase, with his company of pioneers, to a commanding point about six hundred yards in advance, and I proceeded in person to the same point. I there found Colonel Crooks, who had taken position with two companies of his regiment, commanded by Captain Grant and Lieutenant Grant, to check the advance of the Indians in that quarter. An engagement ensued at long range, the Indians being too wary to attempt to close, although greatly superior in numbers. The spherical case from the six-pounders soon caused a hasty retreat from that locality, but perceiving it to be their intention to make a flank movement on the left of the camp in force, Capt. Oscar Taylor, with his company of mountain rangers, was dispatched to retard their movements in that quarter. He was attacked by the enemy in large numbers, but manfully held his ground until recalled and ordered to support Lieutenant Colonel Averill, who, with two companies of the Sixth Regiment, deployed as skirmishers, had been ordered to hold the savages in check. The whole affair was ably conducted by these officers, but the increasing numbers of the Indians, who were well mounted, enabled them by a circuitous route to dash toward the extreme left of the camp, evidently with a view to stampede the mules herded on the shores of the lake. This daring attempt was frustrated by the rapid motions of the companies of the mounted Rangers commanded by Capt. Eugene M. Wilson and Peter B. Davy, who met the enemy and repulsed them with loss, while Major McLaren, with equal promptitude, threw out, along an extended line, the six companies of the Sixth Regiment, under his immediate command, thus entirely securing that flank of the camp from further attacks. The savages, again foiled in their design, fled with precipitation, leaving a number of their dead upon the prairie, and the battle of the "Dead Buffalo Lake" was ended.

On the 27th I resumed the march, following the trail of the retreating Indians until I reached Stony Lake, where the exhaustion of the animals required me to camp, although grass was very scarce. The next day, the 28th, there took place the greatest conflict between our troops and the Indians, so far as the numbers were concerned, which I have named the "Battle of Stony Lake." Regularly alternating each day, the Tenth Regiment, under Colonel Baker, was in the advance and leading the column, as the train toiled up the long hill. As I passed Colonel Baker I directed him to deploy two companies of the Tenth as skirmishers. Part of the wagons were still in the camp, under the guard of the Seventh Regiment, when I perceived a large force of mounted Indians moving rapidly upon us. I immediately sent orders to the several commands promptly to assume their positions, in accordance with the program of the line of march; but this was done and the long train completely guarded at every point by the vigilant and able commanders of regiments and corps, before the orders reached them. The Tenth gallantly checked the advance of the enemy in front; the Sixth and cavalry on the right, and the Seventh and cavalry on the left, while the six-pounders and two sections of mountain howitzers, under the efficient direction of their respective chiefs, poured a rapid and destructive fire from as many different points. The vast number of the Indians enabled them to form two-thirds of a circle, five or six miles in extent, along the whole line of which they were seeking for some weak point upon which to precipitate themselves. The firing was incessant and rapid from each side, but as soon as I had completed the details of the designated order of march, and closed up the train, the column issued in line of battle upon the prairie, in the face of the immense force opposed to it, and I resumed my march without any delay. This proof of confidence in our own strength completely destroyed the hopes of the savages, and completed their discomfiture. With yells of disappointment and rage, they fired a few parting volleys, and then retreated with all expedition. It was not possible, with our jaded horses, to overtake their fleet and comparatively fresh ponies.

This engagement was the last desperate effort of the combined Dakota bands to prevent a farther advance upon our part toward their families. It would be difficult to estimate the number of warriors, but no cool and dispassionate observer would probably have placed it at a less figure than from two thousand two hundred to two thousand five hundred. No such concentration of force has, so far as my information extends, ever been made by the savages of the American continent. It is rendered certain, from information received from various sources, including that obtained from the savages themselves, in conversation with our half-breed scouts, that the remnant of the bands who escaped with Little Crow had successively joined the Sissetons, the Cutheads, and finally the Chank-ton-ais, the most powerful single band of the Dakotas, and together with all these, had formed an enormous camp of nearly, or quite ten thousand souls.

To assert that the courage and discipline displayed by officers and men in the successive engagements with this formidable and hitherto untried enemy were signally displayed, would but ill express the admiration I feel for their perfect steadiness, and the alacrity with which they courted an encounter with the savages. No one for a moment seemed to doubt the result, however great the preponderance against us in numerical force. These wild warriors of the plains had never been met in battle by American troops, and they have ever boasted that no hostile army, however numerous, would dare to set foot upon the soil of which they claimed to be the undisputed masters. Now that they have been thus met, and their utmost force defied, resisted, and utterly broken and routed, the lesson will be a valuable one, not only in its effect upon these particular bands, but upon all the tribes of the Northwest.

When we went into camp on the banks of Apple River, a few mounted Indians could alone be seen. Early the next morning I dispatched Colonel McPhaill, with the companies of the Mounted Rangers and the two six-pounders, to harass and retard the retreat of the Indians across the Missouri River, and followed with the main column as rapidly as possible. We reached the woods on the border of that stream shortly after noon on the 29th, but the Indians had crossed their families during the preceding night, and it took but a short time for the men to follow them on their ponies. The hills on the opposite side were covered with the men, and they had probably formed the determination to oppose our passage of the river, both sides of which were here covered by a dense growth of underbrush and timber for a space of more than a mile. I dispatched Colonel Crooks with his regiment, which was in the advance, to clear the woods to the river of Indians, which he successfully accomplished without loss, although fired upon fiercely from the opposite side. He reported to me that a large quantity of transportation, including carts, wagons and other vehicles, had been left behind in the woods. I transmitted, through Mr. Beaver, a volunteer aide on my staff, an order to Colonel Crooks to return to the main column with his regiment, the object I had in view in detaching him being fully attained. The order was received, and Mr. Beaver entrusted with a message in return, containing information desired by me, when, on his way to headquarters, he unfortunately took the wrong trail, and was the next day found where he had been set upon and killed by an outlying party of the enemy. His death occasioned much regret to the command, for he was esteemed by all for his devotedness to duty and for his modest and gentlemanly deportment. A private of the Sixth regiment, who had taken the same trail, was also shot to death with arrows, probably by the same party. There being no water to be found on the prairie, I proceeded down the Missouri to the nearest point on Apple River, opposite Burnt Boat Island, and made my camp. The following day Colonel Crooks, with a strong detachment of eleven companies of infantry, dismounted cavalry and three guns under the command of Captain Jones, was dispatched to destroy the property left in the woods, which was thoroughly performed, with the aid of Lieutenant Jones and a portion of the pioneer corps. From one hundred and twenty to one hundred and fifty wagons and carts were thus disposed of. During this time the savages lay concealed in the grass on the opposite side of the river, exchanging occasional volleys with our men. Some execution was done upon them by the long range arms of the infantry and cavalry, without injury to any one of my command.

I waited two days in camp hoping to open communication with General Sully, who, with his comparatively fresh mounted force, could easily have followed up and destroyed the enemy we had so persistently hunted. The long and rapid marches had very much debilitated the infantry, and as for the horses of the cavalry and the mules employed in transportation, they were utterly exhausted. Under all the circumstances I felt that this column had done everything possible within the limits of human and animal endurance, and that a farther pursuit would not only be useless, as the Indians could cross and recross the river in much less time than my command, and thus evade me, but would necessarily be attended with the loss of many valuable lives. For three successive evenings I caused the cannon to be fired and signal rockets sent up, but all these elicited no reply from General Sully, and I am apprehensive he has been detained by insurmountable obstacles. The point struck by me on the Missouri is about forty miles by land below Fort Clarke, in latitude 46 degrees, 42 minutes, longitude 100 degrees, 35 minutes.

The military results of the expedition have been entirely satisfactory. A march of nearly six hundred miles from St. Paul has been made, in a season of fierce heats and unprecedented drouth, when even the most experienced voyagers predicted the impossibility of such a movement. A vigilant and powerful, as well as confident, enemy was found, successively routed in three different engagements, with a loss of at least one hundred and fifty killed and wounded of the best and bravest warriors, and his beaten forces driven in confusion and dismay, losing vast quantities of subsistence, clothing, and means of transportation across the Missouri River, many, perhaps the most of them, to perish miserably in their utter destitution during the coming fall and winter.

These fierce warriors of the prairie have been taught by dear bought experience that the long arm of the Government can reach them in their most distant haunts, and punish them for their misdeeds; that they are utterly powerless to resist the attacks of a disciplined force, and that but for the interposition of a mighty stream between us and them, the utter destruction of a great camp, containing all their strength, was certain.

It would have been gratifying to us all if the murdering remnant of the Minday, Wakomton and Wakpaton bands could have been extirpated, root and branch, but as it is the bodies of many of the most guilty have been left unburied on the prairies, to be devoured by wolves and foxes.

I am gratified to be able to state that the loss sustained by my column in actual combat was very small. Three men of the cavalry were killed and four wounded, one, I fear, fatally. One private of the same regiment was killed by lightning during the first engagement, and Lieut. Ambrose Freeman, of Company D, also of the Mounted Rangers, a valuable officer, was pierced to death by arrows on the same day by a party of hostile Indians, while, without my knowledge, he was engaged in hunting at a distance from the main column. The bodies of the dead were interred with funeral honors, and the graves secured from desecration by making them in the semblance of ordinary rifle pits.

It would give me pleasure to designate by name all those of the splendid regiments and corps of my command who have signalized themselves by their gallant conduct, but as that would really embrace officers and men, I must content myself with bringing to the notice of the major general commanding such as came immediately under my own observation. I cannot speak too highly of Colonels Crooks and Baker and Lieutenant Colonel Marshall, commanding respectively the Sixth, Tenth and Seventh regiments of Minnesota Volunteers, and Lieutenant Colonels Averill and Jennison and Majors McLaren and Bradley, and of the line officers and men of these regiments. They have deserved well of their country and their state. They were ever on hand to assist me in my labors, and active, zealous, and brave in the performance of duty. Of Colonel McPhaill, commanding the Mounted Rangers, and of Majors John H. Parker and Orrin T. Hayes, and the company officers and men generally, I have the honor to state that, as the cavalry was necessarily more exposed and nearer the enemy than the other portions of the command, so they alike distinguished themselves by unwavering courage and splendid fighting qualities. The great destruction dealt out to the Indians is mostly attributable to this branch of the service, although many were killed and disabled by the artillery and infantry. Captain Jones and his officers and men of the battery were ever at their posts, and their pieces were served with much skill and effect. To Capt. Jonathan Chase, of the Pioneers, and his invaluable company, the expedition has been greatly indebted for service in the peculiar line for which they are detailed. Capt. William R. Baxter's Company H of the Ninth Regiment, having been attached to the Tenth Regiment as a part of its organization temporarily, upheld its high reputation for efficiency, being the equal in that regard of any other company. The surgical department of the expedition was placed by me in the charge of Surgeon Alfred Wharton, medical director, who has devoted himself zealously and efficiently. In his official report to these headquarters he accords due credit to the surgeons and assistants of the several regiments present with him.

Of the members of my own staff, I can affirm that they have been equal to the discharge of the arduous duties imposed upon them.

Capt. Rollin C. Olin, my assistant adjutant general, has afforded me great assistance, and for their equal gallantry and zeal may be mentioned Captains Pope and Atchison, Lieutenants Pratt and Hawthorne, and Captain Cox, temporarily attached to my staff, his company having been left at Camp Atchison. The quartermaster, Captain Corning, and Captain Kimball, assistant in charge of the pioneer train, discharged their duties satisfactorily, as did also Captain Forbes, commissary of subsistence. Chief guides, Maj. J. R. Brown and Pierre Bottineau, have been of the greatest service, and the interpreter, Reverend Mr. Riggs, has also rendered much assistance in the management of the Indian scouts. The scouts, including the chiefs, McLeod and Duley, have been very useful, and proved faithful and intrepid. I have the honor to transmit herewith the reports of Colonels Crooks, Baker, and Lieutenant Colonel Marshall, and also of Colonel McPhaill, commanding Mounted Rangers.

I am, major, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. H. SIBLEY, Brigadier General Commanding.

MAJ. J. F. MELINE, Assistant Adjutant General, Department of the Northwest.

In a subsequent report, General Sibley says that "the combination of Indians defeated by my column in the late engagements may be thus classified: Minnesota River bands, remnants, 250 warriors; Sisseton Sioux, 450 warriors; E. Yanktonais, 1,200 warriors; other straggling bands, including Teton Sioux, from the west side of the Missouri River, probably four hundred warriors, making an aggregate force of from two thousand three hundred to two thousand five hundred warriors. These constitute the full strength of the Dakota or Sioux Indians inhabiting the prairies on the east side of the Missouri River, with few and insignificant exceptions."

In another dispatch referring to the country, or a portion of it in Dakota on his line of march in pursuit of the enemy, he observes: "The region traversed by my column between the first crossing of the Cheyenne River and the coteau of the Missouri is, for the most part, uninhabitable. If the devil were permitted to select a residence upon the earth, he would probably choose this particular district for an abode, with the redskin murdering and plundering bands as his ready ministers, to verify by the ruthless deeds his diabolical hate to all who belong to a Christian race. Through this vast desert, lakes, fair to the eye abound, but generally their waters are strongly alkaline or intensely bitter and brackish. The valleys between them frequently reek with sulphurous and other disagreeable odors or vapors. The heat was so intolerable that the earth was like a heated furnace, and the breezes that swept along its surface were as scorching and suffocating as the famed Sirocco. Yet through all these difficulties men and animals toiled on until the objects of the expedition were accomplished."

Concerning the fate of the notorious chief, Little Crow, who is charged with instigating the Indian insurrection from which the several years of hostility on the frontiers ensued, General Sibley, in a dispatch from Camp Hackett, Fort Abercrombie, August 23d, while on the return from his Missouri expedition, tells of sending a detachment of the Seventh Minnesota under Captain Erb to that section, and says: "That efficient officer took up the line of march on the 24th of July, and during eight days absence from camp he examined thoroughly the region to the west of Devil's Lake, without discovering any Indians or fresh traces of them, excepting one young man, a son of Little Crow, who was found in a state of exhaustion on the prairie, and was taken prisoner without resistance and brought into Camp Atchison. He states positively that his father, Little Crow, was killed at some point in the Big Woods on the Minnesota frontier by shots from white men, while his father and himself were engaged in picking berries; that his father had taken with him his son and sixteen other men and one woman, and gone from the camp then at Devil's Lake, several weeks previously, to the settlements in Minnesota to steal horses, Little Crow stating to his son that the Indians were too weak to fight against the whites, and that it was his intention to secure horses, and then to return and take his family to a distant part of the country, where they would not be in danger from the whites. He has repeated the statement to me without any material variation, and as his account corroborates the reports of the mode in which two Indians, who were engaged in picking berries, were approached by a Mr. Lampson and his son, and one of them killed, and the body accurately described, there is no longer any doubt that the originator of the horrible massacre of 1862 has met his death."

In another dispatch, referring to the condition of the frontier, Sibley says: "Should General Sully take up the pursuit of the Indians at the point on the Missouri River where I was obliged to abandon it, as I trust he will, and inflict further chastisement upon them, it might be consistent with the security of the Minnesota frontier to diminish the force in this military district; otherwise I have the honor to submit that there may be and probably will be a further necessity for the use of the whole of it in further operations against these powerful bands should they attempt, in large numbers, to molest the settlements in retaliation for the losses they have sustained during the late engagements."

While the Indian war of 1862 led to no actual battles or open hostilities on the part of the Chippewas of Red River, the uneasiness of members of that tribe, and the hostility of half-breed subjects of the British Canadian government north of the boundary line, rendered it necessary to station a force of United States troops at Pembina, and an independent battalion of Minnesota volunteers under Maj. E. A. C. Hatch was kept at that point during the winter of 1862-63. This battalion remained at Pembina until May 1, 1863. It was ascertained during the winter that these British half-breeds were furnishing guns and ammunition to the hostile Sioux and were intriguing to induce the Chippewas to join hands with Little Crow's forces. In the language of General Sibley, in one of his reports to General Pope about this time, "If it can possibly be effected by the influence of the Red River half-breeds we may anticipate that the Chippewas will soon be added to the number of our enemies." During the winter while Major Hatch was at Pembina, about ninety Sioux Indians from British America who had found an asylum on that side of the boundary line, men, women and children, came across to Pembina and surrendered.

Just before Sibley's command started on this campaign, a young Englishman joined the expedition, whose name was Fred I. Holt Beever. He brought to Sibley letters from John Jacob Astor, Hamilton Fish and other prominent citizens of New York. These letters contained personal requests that Beever be allowed to join the command. The general, though reluctantly, acceded to these requests and attached Mr. Beever to his personal staff as an aide-de-camp. Beever acquitted himself creditably on the march to the Missouri. On the day of the fight near the present site of the Town of Bismarck, or in the Apple Creek Valley, Colonel Crooks was placed in the advance and marched with his soldiers into the woods along the river. Wishing to recall him Sibley sent an order to him. This order, at Beever's own request, he was allowed to carry. Before starting he was warned to keep within the skirmish line, to follow the main trail, and keep a lookout for Indians. Beever reached Colonel Crooks in safety, delivered his orders, and started back alone. But he lost the main trail, got outside of the skirmish line, and in passing a fallen tree was attacked by several Indians concealed behind it. To avoid attracting attention he was first shot with an arrow and mortally wounded. But cool and brave to the last, he turned on his horse, shot two of the Indians, and then horse and rider fell dead, finally killed by a gunshot. His body was not mutilated, but his pistols, field glass, saber and saddle, and all his clothing but his drawers and shirt were taken. The next day searching parties sent out by General Sibley found his body and he was buried on the camp grounds with Masonic honors. Later Sibley had his remains removed to St. Paul and interred in Oakland Cemetery.

The strange part of Beever's career remains to be told. He was an ordained clergyman of the Church of England. He came from a prominent family, but some disappointment in life sent him to the wilds of America to hunt. He spent two years with the Astors and others in New York and then learning of the intended expedition of General Sibley against the hostile Indians secured a place in it as has been related. The year he was killed was to have been his last in America, for he expected to return to England at the close of Sibley's campaign. General Sibley and Reverend Mr. Patterson, of the Episcopal Church, opened correspondence with his friends and relatives and informed them of his death. His mother was at Aix la Chapelle, France, and she wrote back sending a sum of money for placing over his grave a tablet, which General Sibley has since taken charge of. Another interesting fact came to light that after Beever's tragic death, an uncle had died and left him and his brother about three hundred and fifty thousand dollars. This is all that is known of the man. His grave is appropriately decorated each year by soldier friends of Sibley, as a mark of respect to an Englishman who died in a heroic defense of the Northwest.

The following graphic account and description of the killing of an Indian at Fort Thompson was received in a letter to the compiler of this book, dated July 21, 1863. The writer, who was a soldier, says:

I witnessed a singular spectacle last week. Some time ago a Santee Indian fatally wounded a squaw in a fracas, and was consigned to the custody of Captain Miner of Company A, Dakota Cavalry. When Sully's expedition arrived here, the accused Indian was, by order of the commanding general, turned over to the Indians to be punished according to their custom. The Indians held a council and sentenced the man to be shot. Captain Miner delivered the accused and now condemned man to the executioner in a secluded spot near the agency, when suddenly the condemned Indian drew a knife he had concealed and instantly fell upon the executioner, plunging the knife into his breast and inflicting what was supposed to be a mortal wound. All the Indians standing by, and there were a number, took alarm at this; they fled with all speed to a remote distance and could not be induced to return. As there was now no one to execute the sentence, it was decided that a fifteen-year-old son of the stabbed Indian should kill the offender with a minie rifle. But the boy's nerve failed him when the condemned man came toward him with bared breast and a defiant look, so as to offer a more certain mark for the bullet. A half-breed standing near and observing that the boy had weakened, seized his gun, and without taking aim, blazed away, the ball entering the Indian's abdomen, causing a large wound from which his intestines protruded. The stricken man reeled and fell writhing and groaning in his agony. Captain Miner then ordered the half-breed to take his (Miner's) pistol and dispatch him, but his aim was poor and he inflicted a wound in his shoulders. The poor fellow then began to chant his death song, when someone sent a ball that crashed through his head and ended the revolting and cruel scene. The poor fellow boasted that he was a brave and would die bravely, and he did exhibit the most determined fortitude to the last. It was a painful tragedy, and lingers unpleasantly in memory despite earnest resolves to forget it.

A treaty unique in the annals of statecraft as practiced by the Indian tribes was a written, subscribed and witnessed agreement of amity between the Yankton tribe of Indians and the Pawnee nation, made in 1863. It was the first treaty between Indians that was reduced to written terms that we have record of, and was in words and terms as follows:

A treaty for the establishment of peace and restoration of friendship, made and concluded in grand council at the peace village on the Ponca Reservation in the Territory of Dakota, on the 23d day of January, A. D. 1863, by and between the Pawnee Nation and Yankton Sioux Tribe of Indians represented by their chiefs, warriors, and head men, they being duly authorized by their said nation and tribe, namely:

Witnesseth: That whereas hostilities have existed between the said nation and tribe for more than a year past, to the great injury and loss of life and property to each; and that now we have been called together in grand council at the village of our mutual friends, the Poncas, by their white father, J. M. Moffman, United States Indian agent, to whose friendly words of rebuke, warning and advice we have listened, we the chief warriors and head men, representing for and on behalf of the Pawnee Nation and Yankton Sioux Tribe of Indians, do hereby agree and ordain as follows:

First. That the hostilities which have existed between the said Pawnee Nation and Yankton Sioux Tribe of Indians, shall from this day henceforth and forever cease; that all the injuries inflicted and all animosities which have been held by either toward the other shall be, and are, forgiven and forgotten, and the peace between the said nations and tribes, and relations of friendship between the members of each toward the other shall be and are hereby established.

Second. That the representative parties hereto do, on behalf of their nation and tribe, pledge themselves each to the other, and jointly to the great father, the President, and to the Government of the United States, faithfully to observe and obey the conditions of this instrument.

In testimony whereof, we, the said chiefs and warriors and head men of the Pawnee Nation and Yankton Sioux Tribe of Indians, duly authorized and empowered as aforesaid, hereunto set our hands and seals, at the place and on the day and year hereinbefore written. Done in triplicate

The Pawnees were at this time a remnant of an Indian nation that had been quite prominent among the original inhabitants of the West. The small nation had its local abode in Northeastern Nebraska. The treaty between this nation and the Yanktons was of value to the whites in this way. The warriors of either party would go forth on an expedition against their enemy, traversing the borders of the white settlements on their marches to and fro, and it frequently happened that after wreaking vengeance upon the foe, they would proceed to some mild but very annoying depredations upon the fields and herds of the white settlers, which they were pleased to regard as the spoils of victory, justifying their consciences in taking these trophies from the pale face on the ground that the enemy whom they had defeated had nothing of any value, and they were obliged to defray the expense of their campaign from the property of the whites.

CHAPTER XXVII

GENERAL SULLY'S CAMPAIGN—BATTLE OF WHITE STONE HILLS

GENERAL ALFRED SULLY—HIS MILITARY CAREER—GENERAL COOK HAD MADE PREPARATION FOR THE CAMPAIGN—SULLY'S FORCES—LOW WATER AND SLOW STEAMBOATS HINDER—PROTECTION FOR THE SETTLEMENTS—ADVANCE TOO LATE TO CO-OPERATE WITH SIBLEY; BUT HE FINDS HOSTILES—BATTLE OF WHITE STONE HILLS—HOSTILES ROUTED AND WINTER SUPPLIES CAPTURED—THE RETURN MARCH—ONE HUNDRED PRISONERS—FIRST FORT SULLY BUILT—TROOPS STATIONED FOR WINTER—HOSTILE TRIBES AND THEIR NUMBERS—SULLY'S OFFICIAL REPORT.

Before General Sully came into the field as commander of the military district of Dakota, which was about the 1st of June, 1863, the district had been for about half a year under the command of Brig. Gen. John Cook, of Springfield, Illinois, one of the most promising of the volunteer generals, who had won fame at Fort Donelson and had been rewarded by rapid and deserved promotion in the Union armies east and south by the exercise of military abilities of a high order. He was assigned to the command of this military division, embracing a portion of Northwestern Iowa in addition to Dakota, by Maj. Gen. John Pope, in command of the department, November 25, 1862. Sioux City was made headquarters of the division. Milwaukee was headquarters of the department. General Cook was an enterprising commander, high-minded and very popular with soldiers and civilians; but he was entirely without experience in frontier warfare, and by the War Department considered an unsafe commander to entrust the sole management and leadership of the Indian campaign to. The general visited Dakota in December following his assignment and held a consultation with Acting Governor Hutchinson at Yankton regarding protection to be afforded the settlements. He then went on to Fort Randall and thence as far up the river as Fort LaFromboise, near old Fort Pierre, then abandoned and removed, returning in January, 1863. His trip had been made for the purpose of becoming personally acquainted with the condition of affairs and the "lay of the land." He claimed to have no important information from the hostile Indians, whom he had located in the neighborhood of Devil's Lake, and who numbered about five thousand. Little Crow had been reported killed.

General Cook expected to lead an expedition against the hostile Indians early in the spring of 1863 in cooperation with General Sibley, of Minnesota, and intended to give his attention to preparation for that event during the remainder of the winter. He had never had experience in Indian warfare, and for that reason grave misgivings were felt that he would not be able to conduct a successful campaign. He had, however, assembled a portion of his army which was then in camp on the Big Sioux River, had chartered and was prepared to load his steamboats, and was just about ready to start his columns and fleet toward the Indian country, when an order came relieving him, and appointing Gen. Alfred H. Sully to succeed him.

General Sully was a graduate of West Point, class of 1841, and had seen twenty years of arduous service, nearly all on the frontier. He fought the Sem-niles in Florida, went through the Mexican war under Taylor, and was promoted to a captaincy; was in Oregon five years engaged in duties that familiarized him with the Indian mode of warfare. Was stationed at Fort Ridgely on the Minnesota River in 1856, was ordered from that fort to Fort Pierre in that year, marching across the country with two companies of infantry. He remained at Fort Pierre until 1858 when the fort was abandoned by the Government, Sully removing with his command to Fort Abercrombie. When the Civil war broke out he was tendered the colonelcy of the First Minnesota, which he accepted, and went to Virginia; was in the famous but disastrous Battle of Bull Run, and remained under McClellan and others until ordered to take command of this military district. His promotion to a brigadier generalship had been made in the volunteer service and was fairly earned. He was a rough and ready soldier, who talked little but acted rapidly. More than any other general officer available, he seemed to possess the peculiar qualifications for leading an expedition against the hostile Indians.

The change was unquestionably a wise one and prompted by the best of motives such as should govern in the public service. The lives of 2,000 men, to say nothing of the other interests involved, might be sacrificed in such a war by the inexperienced rashness of the commanding officer, and as this campaign developed it was made plain that General Sully's experience saved his army from being trapped and possibly destroyed.

Sully lost no time in preparations. At Camp Cook he found his army rendezvoused and in the best of spirits, ready to move. His force consisted of the Sixth Iowa Cavalry, Colonel Wilson; the Second Nebraska Cavalry, Colonel Furnas; Companies A and B, Dakota Cavalry. A battalion of the Sixth Iowa had moved up to Yankton about the last of May, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Pollock, a quarter-blood Indian, but a relentless foe of the hostiles. These would join Sully at Fort Randall.

About the 20th of June General Sully got away from Sioux City, which at that time was headquarters of this military district, and reached Yankton crossing on the evening of the 24th, remaining in camp below town until the morning of the 29th, in the meantime arranging with Governor Hutchinson the plan for the protection of the settlements during the absence of the expedition.

His army and equipments by land consisted of four companies of the Sixth Iowa Cavalry (the one battalion under Colonel Pollock having preceded the main body to Fort Randall); seven companies of the Second Nebraska Cavalry; one company of the Seventh Iowa Cavalry, Captain Millard of Sioux City; three companies of the Forty-fifth Iowa Infantry and one eight gun battery. Also 200 army wagons, 1,200 mules and 200 civil employes and a large herd of beef cattle. The expedition got away from Yankton on the morning of the 26th of June.

Four steamboats were a part of the expedition carrying quartermaster and commissary supplies. A battalion of four companies of the Thirtieth Missouri Infantry, one company to each steamer, accompanied the fleet.

Prior to leaving the general issued the following order, No. 25, which was based on reliable reports that a number of small war parties had been sent south to harass the settlements during the absence of the troops:

General Order No. 25

Headquarters First Military District, Department of Northwest,

Yankton, Dakota Territory, June 25, 1863.

Company B, Dakota Cavalry, during the absence of the expedition will be stationed at Yankton, Dakota Territory, and Company A, Dakota Cavalry, will be stationed at Vermillion during the same time. The companies are stationed here for the protection of the settlements of the territory, and they will recollect that they will consider themselves, during my absence, as much in the field and on active duty as the rest of the troops of the district are. It is therefore enjoined on the commanders of these companies to keep their troops actively engaged during the period in patrolling outside the settlements in order to give confidence to the settlers; to pursue and punish any hostile bands of Indians whom they may find lurking about in the vicinity. In order to carry this order into effect they will have their commands divided into three equal parts and they will patrol as follows:

SIoux JERKING VENISON

BUCKSKIN LODGE, SHOWING ENTRANCE

PONCA WARRIOR

UNCAPAPA SQUAW, SIOUX NATION

Company B, each morning early, will send a patrol, one-third of the command, from Yankton to Turkey Ridge, where they will encamp over night and return the next morning.

Company A, in the same way, will send a patrol, one-third of the command, to Brule Creek and the Big Sioux River, where they will encamp over night and return the next morning.

The commanders of these detachments, should they discover on their patrol duty, fresh signs of Indians, they will follow their trail as far as they may deem it prudent—not to separate themselves too far from the section they have to guard, and not to overtake a party too large for them to successfully oppose. Should they meet any Indians in their tours, they will take them prisoners and bring them in for future investigation. Should the Indians run from them they will be considered as hostile and treated accordingly.

The commanders of troops at these two points, Yankton and Vermillion, will use sound discretion in sending troops to different points where they may hear or have reason to believe there are Indians lurking about, and will immediately report all the facts to the temporary commanding officer of this district at Sioux City, Lieutenant Colonel Pattee.

The command stationed at Vermillion will be considered as only temporarily stationed there, as their duty of patrolling that section of country will be performed by a company of the Seventh Iowa Cavalry, to be stationed on the Upper Big Sioux River as soon as they may arrive in that section of the country. Company A, as soon as relieved by the Seventh Iowa, will be stationed in the upper country above Yankton, and at such points as the temporary commander of the district may judge best suited for the interest of the service.

A. H. SULLY, Brigadier General.

The year 1863 was one of the dryest seasons Dakota had ever experienced since white men settled here. There was an interval of fifty days without rain. Sully's steamboats were literally hanging on sand bars one-half of the time between Fort Randall and Fort LaFromboise near where the state capitol now stands. The Shreveport and Belle Peoria were in the advance and did not reach LaFromboise until the first of August. The other boats came later. At this time Sibley had completed his Indian campaign and returned to Minnesota. Some of the boats had been compelled to leave a part of the cargo at Crow Creek, and after unloading at LaFromboise were obliged to make a second trip. Two of the originally chartered boats proved utterly worthless in the upper river and were abandoned, Sully having recourse to the law of necessity, took forcible possession of a number of light draft steamers returning from the mountains and with them he finally got all his supplies up to Pierre about the 12th of August, and had started the steamer Shreveport and Alone with supplies for a depot at Swan Lake, 100 miles ahead, where it was expected the army would find them. The forward movement was made the next day. So much time had been consumed that but a short campaign could be expected. Couriers from up the river had brought some meager information regarding Sibley's fight and the further information that the Indians were expecting Sully and would give him a hot reception. Sully's fighting force numbered about fifteen hundred men and he had reduced his wagon transportation to seventy-five. In fifteen days he had reached Long Lake Creek. Here Sully learned from an old decrepit Indian, that was found on the prairie, that Sibley had met the Indians only a short distance from the camp, and a detachment of troops were at once dispatched to ascertain whether the old Indian's narrative was reliable. The detachment found Sibley's camp and the battlefield just as described and learned further that the Indians had been driven across the Missouri, but had recrossed three days after Sibley left, opened the caches where their goods were stored, and had gone east probably to overtake and harass Sibley's rear. Sully immediately started in pursuit. This was on the 1st of September, and on the 3d, late in the afternoon, his scouts discovered one encampment of eight hundred to one thousand hostiles. The troops were then hurried forward, leaving a suitable guard for the supply train, and after a sharp ride of eight miles came upon a recently deserted Indian camp, the occupants having fled upon the approach of the troops; another mile brought the fugitives in full view; the troops galloped forward, and the battle opened without any formalities, our soldiers pouring in a deadly fire upon the enemy, which was valiantly returned. The Indians appeared to the soldiers in the twilight of evening as a dark struggling mass of beings, yelling, shouting, shooting and groaning.

Indians were now mainly concentrated in a narrow ravine, quite shallow, each side of which was flanked by the troops, who kept up a galling and destructive fire as long as it was possible to distinguish an Indian from a soldier. Orders then came to cease firing fearing the troops might fire into their own ranks, so intense was their fighting ardor, and the men bivouacked on the field. At daylight the following morning Sully expected to resume the battle but the enemy had quietly faded away during the night, abandoning everything that would impede his flight. The battlefield presented a soul-sickening sight. All the slain soldiers, nineteen in number, were horribly mangled and scalped, some of them tomahawked, indicating that they had been helplessly wounded, and some killed with the merciless hatchet during the night. Intermingled with our dead were the bodies of the Indians and horses, all a ghastly field to look upon, while for miles were tepee poles, folded lodge skins and thousands of packs of dried buffalo meat. No attempt was made to follow the fugitives, as they had evidently scattered in every direction, but a scouting party was sent out as a measure of precaution, and during the day Big Head, the chief, was captured and a large number of squaws and children and quite a number of braves. This scouting party was surprised on one occasion by running into a numerous body of fugitives, who came very near surrounding them, and were able to kill four of the cavalymen before the captain was able to extricate his command from its perilous situation. Sully had lost twenty-three in killed and thirty wounded, one of the wounded of the Nebraska Second dying a little later. A force of 200 men was detailed to gather up and burn the abandoned supplies of the Indians, saving what was necessary to subsist and shelter the Indian prisoners. Two entire days were consumed in this work, which shows the large quantity of stores, lodges, etc., destroyed. Sully estimated that the Indian loss would reach one hundred and fifty as learned from his prisoners, and the wounded were much more numerous.

This fight was called the battle of White Stone Hills, and in its sanguinary aspect was one of the bloodiest ever fought between our troops and the Indians. The additional destruction of the lodges and robes and provisions was a calamity that meant great suffering and possibly starvation for many of the hostiles. It occurred at a point on the Coteau de Missouri, about one hundred and fifty miles from Fort Pierre and sixty-five miles east of the Missouri—measured in a direct line.

Sully's command began their homeward march on the 5th of September. Rations were nearly exhausted, and fuel was difficult to obtain. Indian lodge poles were packed along to supply this latter, and with what could be gotten in the prairies, furnished a scant supply until the command struck the river. On the 14th of September the expedition reached Farm Island, three miles below Pierre, where a fort was constructed on the mainland and completed before winter. This fort was situated on the east side of the Missouri about eighty rods from the river and just below Farm Island. The north and south walls, 270 feet long, were composed of cottonwood pickets fifteen feet long, twelve feet above ground, while the soldiers' barracks and other buildings occupied the east and west sides and furnished the walls for those extremities. These were also 270 feet long. The buildings were of unhewn logs, about eight feet high, log and brush roof, covered with earth, which served every purpose as it was known that the rainfall was light. There were bastions in the southeast and northwest corners, where cannons were placed. It was not intended as a permanent post, but to furnish quarters for the winter to a few companies of volunteers, and a depot where the Government stores could be safely deposited and protected. It was named Fort Sully and was garrisoned by three companies of infantry and one of cavalry.

The commanding general soon after his return issued a proclamation to the people of the territory which is here given:

I feel it my duty, in order that you may be prepared against any dangers, to warn those who have settled in localities far removed from any neighbors, against any depredations of hostile Indians, and therefore to advise you so located, to be on your guard, or else remove your families to points where two or more can be together for mutual protection. At the same time I do not wish to cause any unnecessary alarm. The late battle I had with the Indians near the headwaters of the James River, has scattered them in all directions. We destroyed all their camps, provisions, ponies, etc., and they must necessarily starve or steal this winter. Had not the low stage of water in the Missouri prevented me from having supplies, I would have been able to follow those murderers up and so end all troubles. As it is, no danger can be apprehended of any considerable number of Indians committing overt acts, and yet a few now and then, if they find you not on your guard, may rob and even do worse. I have already sent part of my command down the river. As soon as I can make arrangements for the establishment of a fort here I will be down with more of my troops, and will give you all the protection in my power.

ALFRED SULLY, Brigadier General.

This campaign appears to have satisfied the Indians that the Great Father could spare soldiers enough to chastise them severely, notwithstanding the great war for the Union then pending, and it destroyed the redmen's confidence in the strength of the southern emissaries who the winter previous had promised to expel the whites from the Missouri Valley. The beneficial effects of the campaign were not realized until the following and subsequent years, when it was discovered how completely the Indians had been disheartened and permanently weakened.

Had Sully been able to have reached Sibley before the termination of the latter's engagements, he would doubtless have inflicted serious damage upon the enemy while they were crossing the Missouri. His delay at Fort LaFromboise, near Fort Pierre, and other points, waiting for his boats, cost him thirty to forty days; but it is an open question whether the delay did not work more benefit than injury, for if Sibley's campaign was in any way a failure (which it was not), such failure was not attributed to lack of troops, but to the impossibility of engaging the Indians in anything more than a running fight, and they finally escaped across the river and out of harm's way. Here was Sully's only opportunity for inflicting damage. As the campaign resulted, and owing to Sully's delay, he was able a month later to find the hostiles who had escaped from Sibley, and inflict irreparable damage upon them at the battle of White Stone Hills, probably doing the enemy far greater injury by the destruction of his supplies than the severe chastisement he gave them. We know that east of the Missouri there were no further Indian troubles after Sully's campaign, and the campaign of 1864, which followed, was wholly directed against the Indians west of the river.

The number and tribes of the Dakotah or Sioux Indians that occupied a position of hostility to the United States at this time was ascertained shortly after the Little Crow uprising in Minnesota in 1862. They embraced the entire Dakotah nation, including the Yanktonnais of North Dakota, numbering about one thousand warriors; in Minnesota, or recently from that state, the Mdewakantons, the Wahpekutas, the Wahpetons and Sissetons. These Minnesota Sioux had been the chief actors in the Little Crow outbreak, and it is claimed numbered 1,200 warriors. These tribes occupied nearly all the Indian country east of the Missouri River except the Chippewa lands on Red River. West of the Missouri were about an equal number of the great Dakotah nation, made up of the Brules, Ogallalas, Sans Arcs, Uncpapas and some others. These were denominated the Teton Sioux and at this time were implacably hostile. They numbered about three thousand warriors. The Yanktons who remained friendly could muster about five hundred and seventy warriors.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF SULLY'S EXPEDITION, 1863

Report of Brig. Gen. Alfred Sully, United States Army, commanding expedition, September 3, 1863, battle of White Stone Hills, Dakota Territory:

Headquarters Northwestern Expedition.

Camp at Mouth of the Little Cheyenne River, September 11, 1863.

Major: The last report I had the honor to send you was from the mouth of this Little Cheyenne River, bearing date August 16, 1863, since which time my movements have been too rapid, and the danger of sending any communication such that it has been impossible for me to do so. I therefore have the honor to report my movements from last report up to date.

On the morning of the 19th of August, the steamer I was waiting for with supplies finally arrived. She was immediately unloaded, and all the baggage of the officers and men of the command was sent down by her to the depot at Fort Pierre, together with every man who was in the least sick or not well mounted. By this I reduced my force considerably, and was enabled to transport, with the wretched mules that had been furnished me, about twenty-three days rations and forage enough to keep these animals alive, depending on grass I might find to feed the cavalry and artillery horses. Luckily for me I found the grazing north in much better condition than I had dared to hope for. On the 20th we were visited by one of the most terrific rain and hail storms I have seen. This stampeded some of my animals, and a few were lost—they swam across the Missouri—and it also destroyed a quantity of my rations in the wagons, thereby causing me some delay in the march, but I succeeded in getting off on the afternoon of the 21st, and marched up the Little Cheyenne about eleven miles, the road being very heavy. The next day we marched only seven miles, camping at a slough on the prairie without wood. The next day we marched in a north-westerly direction to the outlet of Swan Lake. On the 24th we marched due north eighteen miles and encamped on a small creek called Bois Cache. Here we came into the buffalo country, and I formed a hunting party for the command, which I had soon to disband, as they disabled more horses than buffaloes. We continued our march north about twenty-two miles and reached a small stream called Bird Asche Creek. This day the hunters succeeded in killing many buffaloes, and reported that they saw Indians near the Missouri. Early on the morning of the 26th, I sent out a small scouting party, who captured two squaws and some children, and brought them in to me. These Indians reported that General Sibley had had a fight near the head of Long Lake and that they were on their way to the agency at Crow Creek, but were lost and were alone, but the scouts found tracks of lodges going up the Missouri. I therefore immediately detailed Companies F and K, of the Second Nebraska Cavalry, under command of Capt. D. LaBoo, ordering them to go to the Missouri and follow up the trail with orders to capture some Indians if possible and bring them in, so that I might get some information; if they could not do that to kill them and destroy their camps. I continued the march with the rest of the command that day, passing through large herds of buffalo and was obliged to make a march of thirty-five miles before I could reach water. The weather was very hot, and it was night before we reached camp on the Beaver River.

On the 27th I started late, having had some difficulty in crossing the river, making a march of five miles, still in a northerly direction, and encamped on another branch of the same river. Company K, of the Second Nebraska, joined me this day, having been separated from the other company. The next day we had to make some deviations to the west on account of hills and sloughs, and made the outlet of Long Lake, a march of some twenty miles. On the way we saw numerous signs of Indians in large numbers having been recently there, and found an old lame Indian concealed in the bushes, who was well known by many of the men of the command as having for some years resided near Sioux City. He had the reputation of being what is called a "good Indian." He stated that his horse had been taken away from him, and that he had been left there. He looked almost starved to death. He gave me the following details, which have since mostly turned out to be correct: He stated that General Sibley had fought the Indians at the head of Long Lake, fifty miles northeast from me, some weeks ago; that he followed them down to the mouth of Apple Creek; that the Indians attacked him on the way, and that there was some skirmishing. At Apple Creek Sibley had another fight, and that in all the fights about fifty-eight Indians were killed; that General Sibley fortified his camp at Apple Creek, and after awhile returned to James River; that a few days after General Sibley left, the Indians, who had their scouts out watching, recrossed the Missouri, and while doing so discovered a Mackinaw boat on the way down. They attacked the boat, fought the entire day, until sundown, sunk her, and killed all on board—twenty-one men, three women, and some children; that before she was sunk the fire from the boat killed ninety-one Indians and wounded many more; that a small war party followed Sibley some days; returned with the report that he had crossed the James River; then some of the Indians went north; the larger portion, however, went toward the head of Long Lake, and that he thought a portion of them were encamped on the Missouri River west of me.

This report was so much in keeping with the Indian mode of warfare that, though it came from an Indian, I was led to give it some consideration, particularly the part that stated the Indians, after watching Sibley's return, recrossed when all danger was over, and went back to their old hunting grounds. Besides, the guides who were acquainted with the country stated that "a large body of Indians could not live on the other side long without going a great distance west; that always at this season of the year the Indians camped on the Coteau, near the tributaries of the James, where the numerous lakes or springs kept the grass fresh; here the buffalo were plenty and the lakes and streams full of fish, and that here they prepared their meat for the winter, moving to the Missouri, where fuel was plenty, for the winter." I therefore determined to change my course toward the east, to move rapidly, and go as far as my rations would allow.

I felt serious alarm for the safety of Captain LaBoo, who had about fifty men with him, and who had already been out about two days without rations. I encamped here for the next day, and sent out four companies of the Second Nebraska and one of the Sixth Iowa, under command of Major J. W. Pearman, Second Nebraska, to hunt him up, and see if there were any Indians on the Missouri. The next day, however, Captain LaBoo's company returned, having made a march of 187 miles, living upon what buffalo and game they could kill, scouring the country to my left, overtaking the camp of the ten lodges he was sent after, destroying them, but seeing no Indians. This same day, 20th, I sent two companies of the Sixth Iowa, to the mouth of Apple Creek. They reported on their return that they found the fortified camp of General Sibley, his trail, and his return trail toward the east; that they could see no signs of there having been any fight there, nor could they see the Mackinaw boat reported by the old Indian. This detachment was under command of Capt. D. W. C. Cram, Sixth Iowa Cavalry. The battalion of Major Pearman joined me before starting, having seen nothing, and after a march of ninety miles through a country with no wood whatever, but with good grass and plenty of lakes of the most abominable water, on the 3d of September we reached a lake, where, on the plains near by, were the remains of a very large number of buffaloes recently killed. Here I encamped to wait the reports of the commands I had out during the march, who every day discovered fresh signs of Indians, their lodge trails spread over the country, but all moving toward a point known to be a favorite haunt of the Indians. I had this day detailed one battalion of the Sixth Iowa, Major A. E. House, commanding, and Mr. Frank LaFromboise as guide, to keep ahead of me five miles, and in case they saw a small band of Indians, to attack them or take them prisoners. If they should find a large band, too large to successfully cope with, to watch the camp at a distance and send word back to me, my intention being to leave my train under charge of a heavy guard, move up in the night time, so as to surround them, and attack them at daybreak. But for some reason satisfactory to the guide, he bore off much to my left, and came upon the Indians in an encampment of over four hundred lodges, some say 600, in ravines where they felt perfectly secure, being fully persuaded that I was still on my way up the Missouri. This is what the Indian prisoners say. They also say that a war party followed me on my way up, in hopes of stampeding me, but this they could not do. I marched with great care, with an advanced guard and flankers; the train in two lines, sixty paces apart, the troops on each side; in front and center myself with one company and the battery; all loose stock was kept between the lines of wagons. In this way I lost no animals on the campaign except some few, about a dozen, that got out of camp at night; nor did the Indians during all the trip, ever attack me or try to stampede me.

Major House, according to my instructions, endeavored to surround and keep in the Indians until word could be sent me; but this was an impossibility with his 300 men, as the encampment was very large, mustering at least twelve hundred warriors. This is what the Indians say they had, but I, as well as everybody in the command, say they had over fifteen hundred. These Indians were partly Santees from Minnesota; Cutheads from the Coteau; Yanktonnais, and some Blackfeet who belong on the other side of the Missouri, and, as I have since learned, Uncapapas, the same party who fought General Sibley and destroyed the Mackinaw boat. Of this I have unmistakable proof from letters and papers found in the camp and on the persons of some of the Indians, besides relics of the late Minnesota massacre; also from the fact that they told Mr. LaFromboise, the guide, when he was surrounded by about two hundred of them, that "they had fought General Sibley, and they could not see why the whites wanted to come to fight them, unless they were tired of living and wanted to die." Mr. LaFromboise succeeded in getting away from them after some difficulty, and ran his horse for more than ten miles to give me information, Major House with his command still remaining there. He reached me a little after 4 o'clock. I immediately turned out my command. The horses at the time were out grazing. At the sound of the bugle the men rushed with a cheer, and in a very few minutes saddled up and were in line. I left four companies and all the men who were poorly mounted, in the camp, with orders to strike the tents and corral all the wagons, and starting off with the Second Nebraska on the right, the Sixth Iowa on the left, one company of the Seventh Iowa and the battery in the center, at a full gallop, we made this distance of over ten miles in much less than an hour.

THE BATTLE

On reaching near the ground I found that the enemy were leaving and carrying off what plunder they could. Many lodges, however, were still standing. I ordered Col. W. R. Furnas, Second Nebraska, to push his horses to the utmost, so as to reach the camp and assist Major House in keeping the Indians corralled. This order was obeyed with alacrity, the regiment going over the plains at a full run. I was close upon the rear of the regiment with the Sixth Iowa. The Nebraska took to the right of the camp, and was soon lost in a cloud of dust over the hills. I ordered Col. D. S. Wilson, Sixth Iowa, to take to the left, while I, with the battery, one company of the Seventh Iowa, Captain A. J. Millard and two companies of the Sixth Iowa, Major TenBruck commanding, charged straight to the center of the encampment. I here found an Indian chief by the name of Little Sable, with some few of his people. This Indian has always had the reputation of being brave and Indian and friendly. I placed them under guard and moved on. Shortly after I met the notorious chief, Big-Head, and some of his men. They were dressed in a manner my men cut them off. These Indians, together with some of their warriors, were about thirty, together with squaws, Indian ponies, and dogs, gave themselves up, numbering over one hundred and twenty human beings. About the same time firing began about a half mile ahead of me, and was kept up, becoming more and more brisk until it was quite a respectable engagement. A report was brought to me, which proved to be false, that the Indians were driving back some of my command. I immediately took possession of the hillocks near by, forming line, and placing the battery in the center on a higher knoll. At this time night had about set in, but still the engagement was briskly kept up, and in the melee, it was hard to distinguish my line from that of the enemy. The Indians made a very desperate resistance, but finally broke and fled, pursued in every direction by bodies of my troops. I would here state that the troops, though mounted, were armed with rifles, and according to my orders, most of them dismounted and fought afoot until the enemy broke, when they remounted and went in pursuit. It is to be regretted that I could not have had an hour or two more of daylight, for I feel sure, if I had, I could have annihilated the enemy. As it was I believe I can safely say I gave them one of the most severe punishments the Indians have ever received. After night set in the engagement was of such a promiscuous nature that it was hard to tell what results would happen; I therefore ordered all the buglers to sound the "rally," and building large fires, remained under arms during the night, collecting together my troops. The next morning early I established my camp on the battlefield; this was the 4th, the wagon train under charge of Major Pearman, Second Nebraska, having in the night been ordered to join me, and sent out strong scouting parties in different directions to scour the country to overtake what Indians they could, but in this they were not very successful, though some of them had some little skirmishes. They found the dead and wounded in all directions, some miles from the battlefield; also immense quantities of provisions, baggage, etc., where they had apparently cut loose their ponies from "travois," and got off on them; also large numbers of ponies and dogs, harnessed to "travois," running loose on the prairie. One party that I sent out went near to the James River, and found there eleven dead Indians. The deserted camp of the Indians, together with the country all around, was covered with their plunder. I devoted this day together with the following, the 5th, to destroying all this property, still scouring the country. I do not think I exaggerate in the least when I say that I burned up over four hundred thousand to five hundred thousand pounds of dried buffalo meat as one item, besides 300 lodges, and a very large quantity of property of great value to the Indians. A very large number of ponies were found dead and wounded on the field; besides a large number was captured. The prisoners, some one hundred and thirty, I take with me below, and shall report to you more specially in regard to them.

The surgeon of the Second Nebraska Cavalry, Dr. Bowen, who has shown great energy and desire to attend to his duties during the campaign, started out during the night of the engagement with a party of fifteen men, to go back to the old camp to procure ambulances. But as they did not return on the morning of the second day, I knew that he was either lost or captured. (He returned about noon of the second day.) I therefore sent out small scouting parties in every direction to hunt them up. One of these fell into an ambuscade, by which four of the party were killed and the rest driven in. I immediately sent out five companies of the Nebraska Regiment, Colonel Furnas in command, who after a long march, found that the Indians had fled. They succeeded, however, in overtaking three concealed in some tall grass, whom they killed. The fight has been so scattered, the dead Indians have been found in so many different places, that it is impossible for me to give an accurate report of the number killed of the enemy. I, however, think I am safe in reporting it at 100. (I report those that were left on the field and that my scouting parties found.) During the engagement, for some time, the Second Nebraska, afoot and armed with rifles (and there are among them probably some of the best shots in the world), were engaged with the enemy at a distance not over sixty paces, pouring on them a murderous fire in the ravine where the enemy were posted. The slaughter, therefore, must have been immense. My officers and the guides I have with me think that 150 will not cover their loss. The Indian reports make it over two hundred. That the general may know the exact locality of the battlefield, I would state that it was as near as I could judge, about fifteen miles west of James River, and about half way between the latitudes of Bone Butte and headwaters of Elm River, as laid down on the government map. The fight took place near a hill called by the Indians White Stone Hill.

In conclusion I would state that the troops of my command conducted themselves well; and though it was the first fight that nearly all of them had ever been in, they showed that they are of the right material, and that in time with discipline they will make worthy soldiers. It is to be regretted that we lost so many valuable lives as we did, but this could not be helped; the Indians had formed a line of battle with good judgment, from which they could be dislodged only by a charge. I could not use my artillery without greatly endangering the lives of my own men; if I could, I could have slaughtered them. I send you accompanying the reports of Colonel Wilson, Sixth Iowa, and Colonel Furnas, Second Nebraska, also official reports of killed and wounded, and take this occasion to thank both those officers for the good conduct and cheerfulness with which they obeyed my orders on this occasion. Both of them had their horses shot in the action. I would also state that the several members of my staff rendered me every possible assistance.

On the morning of the 6th I took up my line of march to Fort Pierre. If I could have remained in that section of country some two or three weeks I might have accomplished more; but I was satisfied from the reports of my scouts that the Indians had scattered in all directions—some toward the James River; some, probably the Blackfeet, to recross the Missouri; and a part of them went north where the Indians say they have friends among the half-breeds of the North. My rations were barely sufficient with rapid marches to enable me to reach Fort Pierre. The animals, not only the teams I have reported to you as worthless, but also the cavalry horses, showed the effect of rapid marching and being entirely without grain. I brought with me all the prisoners I had, and tried to question them to gain some information. The men refused to say more than that they were "good Indians," and the other bad ones joined their camp without their will. The squaws, however, corroborate the report I have already given you in regard to the destruction of the people on board the Mackinaw boat and the fights with General Sibley, in which these Indians had a part. They also state that these Indians, after re-crossing to this side of the Missouri, sent a party to follow Sibley until he went to the James River, then returned to their camp near Long Lake to procure a large quantity of provisions and other articles they had cached there, and then came to the camp where I met them.

After marching about one hundred and thirty miles I reached the mouth of the Little Cheyenne on the 11th, where I found the steamboat I had ordered to be there on the 8th instant. It was lucky she was there, for without the grain she brought up I could not have brought my empty wagons back, for some miles north of the Cheyenne and to Pierre the grass now is about all gone. I placed my wounded on the boat, and as many empty wagons as she could carry. I am afraid the loss of horses and mules will be considered very great, but it could not be helped. When I found it impossible for the rear guard to get an animal along, I ordered it killed, to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy.

Very respectfully, Major, your obedient servant,

ALF SULLY,

Brigadier General, Commanding.

MAJOR J. F. MELINE,

Actg. Asst. Adjt. Gen., Department of the Northwest.

P. S.—By actual count the number of my prisoners is 156; men 32, women and children 124. I would also beg leave to say that in the action I had of my command between 600 and 700 men actually engaged. My killed number, as far as ascertained, 20; wounded, 38. Lieut. Thomas J. Leavitt, Sixth Iowa, was mortally wounded in the night engagement on the 3d. The Sixth Iowa lost 11 killed and 21 wounded; the Second Nebraska, 6 killed and 13 wounded.

Major House of the Sixth Iowa Cavalry, who was sent forward with a battalion of his regiment to locate the Indians who had been reported some ten miles away, performed that duty speedily, came upon a large encampment of Indians, whom he located, and immediately dispatched a messenger to General Sully with the information. In the meantime Major House made an excellent disposition of his troops ready for battle should the enemy attack him. While these preparations were being made, a delegation of the Indians came in under a flag of truce and attempted negotiations. They offered to surrender some of their chiefs; but as Major House did not know who was vested with authority, he demanded the unconditional surrender of all. This the Indians refused to do, and having sent away their squaws and papooses, together with their stock of provisions, they placed themselves in battle array. In the meantime the messengers sent to General Sully had safely reached their destination and delivered their message and the general, as he relates in his report, lost no time in preparing for the march. He was ten miles from the Indian camp but he covered the distance with his cavalry, he says, in less than one hour. The day was waning. The advance, led by the Second Nebraska Cavalry, under Colonel Furnas, joined House and the battle was on. Furnas, in his report, which contains most of the details of the battle, says:

On approaching the Indian encampment, I found House's Battalion drawn up in order of battle on the north side, and on reconnoitering the enemy's position perceived that the Indians were leaving as fast as possible. I immediately ordered Major House to pursue on the left flank of the enemy, while I, with the Second Nebraska, moved on their right flank. I immediately formed my men in line of battle. As the enemy was then situated and my men formed, I intended to have advanced the Second Battalion, Companies B, G, I and M, commanded by Captain LaBoo, Major Pearman having been left in command of the camp, with the First Battalion commanded by Maj. J. Taffe, and await further orders from the general commanding. As it was then nearly dark I felt that time was precious, and if anything was to be done that night it must be done speedily, and made up my mind to attack the enemy immediately. I therefore changed my plan of operations. I ordered Major Taffe with his battalion to proceed to the head of the ravine in which the enemy was posted, to cut off their retreat in that direction, which order was promptly executed, and his command formed in line awaiting further orders. I then ordered the Second Battalion to advance directly upon the enemy, which it did. Major Taffe then, by my order, came forward, the line of the two battalions forming an obtuse angle. When within 400 yards I ordered my men to dismount, and after advancing 100 yards nearer, ordered the Second Battalion to open the battle by a volley from the Enfields, which they did with precision and effect, creating quite a confusion in the enemy's ranks. At this time I perceived what I supposed to be House's Battalion, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles distant, advancing upon the enemy's rear. In the order in which my line was now formed, I advanced upon the enemy, pouring upon him as I advanced a fire from my whole line, which was immediately and vigorously returned by the Indians. When within thirty yards of the enemy's lines, I ordered a halt in rear of a slight elevation of ground, in front of which was a ravine in which the Indians were posted. The fight now became general and my whole line was hotly engaged. At this juncture, what I supposed to be House's Battalion (as it was now quite dark) advanced and commenced an attack on the enemy's left. As they were now formed, and fearing that the Indians would attempt to escape by way of a ravine a short distance beyond the left of my line, or get in my rear the same way, I ordered Major Taffe to extend the left wing of my line, in order to cover this supposed outlet for the Indians with my guns. The battle now raged with great fury for some time on both sides. The enemy successively, by a desperate charge, attempted to turn my right and left flanks, but they were repulsed with slaughter. They fell in every direction in front of my line by the unerring aim of my brave soldiers, who, both officers and men, fought with the courage and coolness of veterans, exposed as they were to a galling fire from the enemy during the whole time. At this juncture I became convinced that House's Battalion, mistaking my command for Indians in the darkness, were firing into them. I therefore ordered my men to fall back out of range of House's guns and mount their horses, as the Indians were now in a rout and were fleeing out of range of my guns up a ravine some distance to the front. The horses becoming alarmed, and to a considerable extent unmanageable for a short time, created a slight confusion as the men were in the act of mounting, but it was only momentary, as my squadrons were in a few moments again formed in line on the crest of a hill some two hundred yards in the rear of my last line of battle, mounted and ready to follow up the victory, as the enemy were fleeing, leaving everything behind them. But it being very dark, and in view of the position of the Sixth Iowa, I deemed it imprudent to attempt a pursuit before morning, as it was then 8.30 or 9.00 P. M. Having no means of communicating that night with the general commanding, I ordered my men to dismount and lay on their arms, holding their horses, until early dawn, when I marched from the battle ground of the previous evening and went into camp about one mile from it and at the upper end of the Indian encampment. On passing over the ground of the recent encampment of the Indians and of the battle, I found that the enemy had abandoned all their tents, clothing, cooking utensils, valuables, supplies, in fact, everything they possessed was strewn over the ground of their retreat for miles. Their flight had been so precipitate that they had abandoned everything but their dead, whom they carried away as fast as they fell. Their rout was so complete and their flight so sudden that many of their children were left behind on account, as I supposed, of their being an incumbrance to their flight. From the best information derived from guides, the enemy's strength was not less than one thousand warriors. Their loss in killed will not fall short of one hundred and fifty, as scouts sent out the next day after the battle report their dead as scattered over the country for miles on the line of their retreat, and their wounded is twice that number. The casualties in the Second Nebraska Cavalry are two killed, thirteen wounded and ten missing men. I found among the effects of the Indians Mimic rifles and rifle cartridges; also several boxes of army revolvers and rifle cartridges were found, and various other articles, some of which were undoubtedly taken from the whites in the late Minnesota massacre. The enemy was composed of Santees, Brule, Yanktonnais and Blackfeet Sioux and Cuthead Indians and were evidently the same Indians with whom General Sibley had a recent engagement on Apple Creek. The Indians are now destitute of supplies, clothing, and almost everything else, they having abandoned all except their clothing and arms. Many of the former were, however, killed or captured during the battle. I would have pursued the enemy the following morning after the battle had it not been for the exhausted condition of my men and horses.

The officers and men under my command are not only entitled to my thanks, but the confidence of their country for their bravery, efficiency and promptness on this occasion. Not a man in any capacity flinched a particle. My special thanks are due to Adj. Henry M. Atkinson, Regimental Quartermaster J. S. McCormick and Commissary Lieut. J. Q. Goss for valuable services rendered me immediately preceding and during the engagement. All of which is respectfully submitted.

CAPTAIN FRANK M. ZIEBACH
Founder of the Weekly Telegram, during the Indian War of 1862.

The report of Col. David S. Wilson, of the Sixth Iowa, adds very little to the details of the battle not mentioned in the report of Major House, also of the Sixth, already given. Colonel Wilson was engaged in the battle with the First Battalion of his regiment, the Second remaining at Brigade headquarters, and House having the Third. Arriving at the battlefield, Wilson says in his report:

I then proceeded to carry out your orders to surround the Indians and drive them in. On every side of the battlefield were straggling Indians endeavoring to escape. Immediately joining the flank of the First on the Second Battalion, and marching both in line, we succeeded in driving a large portion of the Indians toward your headquarters down into a ravine. By the shifting and dressing of the line as it marched I became detached from the First and was thrown into the Third Battalion. The Indians, after having been quietly driven quite a distance into a common center, availed themselves of the darkness that was coming by suddenly firing upon us, which fire, though entirely unexpected, was immediately returned by us with terrible effect. We then commenced making preparations to fight on foot, when the darkness became so impenetrable that it was impossible to proceed further. It was at this fire of the enemy, when riding some little distance in advance of the battalion that my horse was shot with a slug, fatally wounding him. He lived long enough to carry me about thirty rods. After the darkness set in we went into camp immediately on the battlefield, corralled our horses and threw out pickets, while the command slept upon its arms. The night was excessively dark and cold, but the picket guard killed two Indians that were found straggling near our camp. At length the day appeared, when we found that the enemy, availing themselves of the darkness, had suddenly decamped, but leaving the country strewed for miles around with their dried meats, provisions, packs, robes, tepees, goods and ponies.

We lost in this engagement one commissioned officer, Lieut. T. J. Leavitt, of Company B, ten privates and had eleven wounded, one of them since dying.

Colonel Wilson then mentions Acting Maj. J. Gallagher, Capt. A. B. Moreland, Lieut. W. A. Heath and Serg. R. Aubrey also Capt. J. Logan and Lieut. S. M. Parker and Capt. T. W. Burdick as entitled to the highest praise. Wilson also pays a deserved tribute to the Third Battalion and to their "brave Major House." Also to Lieut. George E. Dayton, of Company C, and Serg. Maj. Charles W. Fogg for bravery during the night of the battle, and also going out in charge of a detail searching for wounded men upon the battle field. Wilson also speaks highly of the commanding general and his successful management of the campaign in the face of many discouragements and difficulties consequent upon the drouth and many unavoidable but serious impediments. In concluding his report Wilson says:

I herewith enclose a couple of letters that were found upon an Indian by some of my regiment. Inclosed in one were two gold dollars and some gold dust. They seem to corroborate the story that the Indians in July last surrounded a Mackinaw boat descending the Missouri River from the gold mines, and after fighting with the crew all day succeeded in killing the entire number.

Skirmish at White Stone Hill—Report of Lieutenant Hall, in command of scouting expedition sent out by General Sully, after Battle of White Stone Hills. September 5th.—Skirmish with Indians near White Stone Hills.

Headquarters, Company F, Second Nebraska Cavalry, Camp No. 41, Dakota Territory, September, 1863.

Captain:—In compliance with orders from Brigadier General Sully, commanding Indian expedition, I proceeded, on the morning of September 5, 1863, with twelve men of the Second Nebraska Cavalry and fifteen men from the Sixth Iowa Cavalry under my command, on a scout in search of Surgeon Bowen, Sergeant Newcombe and eight others missing from the Second Nebraska Cavalry after the battle of White Stone Hill on the 3d instant. I proceeded in a northeasterly direction from the battlefield, and when fifteen miles distant therefrom I was attacked by a party of some three hundred Indians, and seeing that I could not successfully resist their attacks, I retreated slowly, returning the enemy's fire until my command was so closely pressed by the enemy that the men increased the rapidity of their retreat, without orders. I attempted to halt them several times, but unsuccessfully. The enemy all the time pressed closely on my rear, and also endeavored to cut off my retreat in camp, from which I had started in the morning, and at which I had arrived with the remainder of my command about 12.00 M. that day, the enemy pursuing to within four miles of the camp. The casualties on this scout were six men and four horses killed. Sergeant Blair, Company K. Second Nebraska Cavalry, Sergeant Rogers, Sgt. S. N. Smith and Sgt. Isaac L. Winget, of the Sixth Iowa Cavalry, assisted me in my efforts to control the men and check their hasty retreat.

The following is a list of the killed under my command. (In a footnote is stated, names omitted, list shows six killed.)

I discovered no trace of the missing of whom I was in search, who, however, returned to camp a short time after my return and on the same day. The men under my command succeeded while retreating in killing six Indians and four ponies and wounding many others, the number not known.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

The Indian massacres in Minnesota during August, 1862, had left such a deep-seated sentiment of animosity in the minds of the white people of that state as to demand the wholesale removal of all Indians beyond the borders of Minnesota. The sentiment was so intensely bitter that it awakened the anxiety of the authorities for the safety of the friendly Indians who had not been engaged in any act of hostility for a generation. The settlers had organized in the vicinity of the reservations with the avowed purpose of killing any Indian that should get within range of their guns. It was therefore determined to remove the Indians to Dakota, and the order for their removal and the execution were practically simultaneous, for while an agent was ascending the Missouri River to select a location for them, about one thousand five hundred of the exiled race of both sexes and all ages belonging to the Santee tribes were loaded on the steamboat Florence and started for their new homes not yet selected. The people removed were that portion of the tribe of Santee Sioux who had not been openly engaged in the Little Crow hostilities, and the Winnebagoes, who were known only as friendly Indians, not having been even suspected of a hostile act. The Winnebagoes, however, were sent overland.

Col. Clark W. Thompson, superintendent of Indian affairs for the Northern Superintendency of Minnesota, reached Yankton on the 15th of May, 1863. His mission was to select a reservation in Dakota for the Santees and Winnebagoes who had been banished from Minnesota. The Winnebagoes had quite recently sold their Minnesota reservation to the government and had been promised that another should be given to them in that state. But the recent massacres had engendered such bitterness of feeling on the part of the whites, that to settle them again within the state was deemed equivalent to a death sentence, and to secure their own safety their removal beyond the state's boundary was urgently demanded. It was also believed that their settlement in Minnesota would prove a constant and serious barrier to immigration.

The exiled Santees were those who were found to have taken no part in the late Little Crow outbreak, including largely the aged squaws and the children, but they were under the ban of a deadly hatred and for their own security they were removed. Colonel Thompson proceeded up the Missouri expecting to find a suitable location within a short distance of the Yankton reservation, and not far above Fort Randall, on this side of the river. This he was unable to do, and discovered no country he was willing to accept until he reached the vicinity of Crow Creek. Although this Crow Creek country had been ceded, it was within the authority of the President of the United States to withdraw any portion of it from settlement and set it apart for reservation purposes. The superintendent made his selection at this point, marking out a reservation with a frontage on the Missouri River of thirty miles and extending back from the river over a fine body of tillable land to the highlands, embracing about one half million acres. Work was commenced without delay in making the improvements demanded for the care of the Indians. A detachment of sixty soldiers from Fort Randall had been detailed to erect the various buildings, and these were under the special direction of Colonel Thompson.

The agency stockade was laid out in a square 300 feet on each side, and around this area a ditch was dug three feet wide and three feet deep. In this ditch were set cedar posts or pickets fifteen feet long, which gave a wall twelve feet above the surface of the ground. Within the stockade there were two stores and a warehouse on the west side and close to the pickets. On the north was the schoolhouse for the Winnebagoes; the interpreter's quarters, the agent's quarters and the doctor's rooms, and on the northeast corner, the soldiers' barracks. On the east side were the boarding house, blacksmith shop, wagon maker's and carpenter's shop. On the south were the Sioux Indian buildings—one surgeon's quarters, two agent's quarters, interpreter's quarters for three, and four schoolhouses, with barracks for soldiers in the southwest corner. On the northwest and southwest corners of the stockade, bastions were constructed, outside the pickets, on which cannon were stationed. Openings were made in the pickets of the stockade, eight feet from the ground, large enough to admit the barrel of a rifle, to be used in case of attack. Gates were provided in the north and south sides of the same material as the pickets. The stockade was located about one-half mile from the river, the intervening bottom being well timbered. The site of the fort was on an elevation, a very attractive spot, and near it outside the pickets was the sawmill in the edge of the forest. In addition to these structures, a large area of land was broken up in the vicinity of the agency where the Indians could carry on such farming operations as they were capable of conducting. Many of them had gained considerable knowledge of farming in Minnesota.

Two weeks later, on the 26th of May following Thompson's arrival, the steamer Florence halted at Yankton a few hours, having on board 1,400 Santee Sioux, largely families, and men, women and children, on their way to their new home. They had been hurried away from Minnesota to save their lives. Their appearance indicated suffering and it was the opinion of some Yankton visitors to the shore where the boat lay that there was not an Indian on board that could be said to be free from some malady.

[The reader will need to refer to this chapter after reading of the Crow Creek difficulties under President Cleveland's administration, 1885.]

They were dejected, despondent, broken-hearted and their appearance indicated all this with the added discomforts and deprivations to which they were necessarily subjected on the crowded boat, suggesting animals rather than human beings.

The Winnebagoes had not been subjected to this indignity but were permitted to move across the plains with their ponies and tepees and accomplished the journey leisurely and without mishap.

The military authorities captured a large number of the Santees who were suspected of taking part in the outbreak under Little Crow. These were tried by court martial for murder and ninety of them convicted and sentenced to be hanged. President Lincoln commuted the sentence of fifty-two of them, and the remaining thirty-eight were hanged all at the same time at Mankato, on Friday the 26th day of December, 1862, while a much larger number had been sentenced to imprisonment for various periods.

A description of the final tragedy in the lives of these condemned savages was given in a letter from Mankato, under date of December 29, 1862, only a portion of which is given here: "At half past seven Friday morning preparations were begun for execution. The irons were knocked off from the condemned men and their elbows were pinioned behind and their wrists in front, but about six inches apart. After this was done they stood up in a row around the room and sang a death song, after which they smoked. A priest then came in and religious services were held, which sensibly affected the Indians; some of them were weeping. White caps were then put on their heads, made of muslin taken from the Indians when captured, who had previously taken it from the stores of the traders they had killed. They were all now seated, and some of them gazed into the small looking glasses each one carried, evidently to take a last look and discover whether their faces betrayed any fear. At 10 o'clock they were marshaled in procession and marched through a file of soldiers to the gallows, which had been so constructed that all could be hanged at one time. They marched eagerly and even cheerfully to the fatal spot. As they ascended the scaffold they chanted a death song that was truly hideous, although it seemed to inspire them with new courage. One young fellow who had been given a cigar just before marching from their quarters, was smoking it on the gallows, puffing away very coolly during the intervals of the 'lu-gi-ye-hi-yi-yi,' and even after the cap was drawn over his face he managed to get the cap up over his mouth and smoke. Another one smoked a pipe. The noose having been promptly adjusted over the neck of each, all was ready for the fatal signal. The scene at this time was one of awful interest. A painful, breathless suspense held the vast crowd which had collected from all quarters to witness the execution. Three slow, measured and distinct beats of the drum, and the rope was cut and the scaffold fell, and 38 bodies were dangling at the end of as many ropes. One of the ropes gave away and the body of Rattling Runner fell to the ground. He showed little signs of life and his neck had probably been broken, but he was hanged again. For so many there was evidently but little suffering. The necks of all were probably dislocated, and there was little struggling. When the drum beat, numbers of them reached out and clasped the hands of their neighbors and continued to hold them vise-like until the bodies were cut down, which was done in twenty minutes after the scaffold fell, the surgeon pronouncing life extinct. The bodies were then cut down, placed in four army wagons and taken to the grave prepared for them among the willows on the sandbar in the Minnesota River, nearly in front of the town. They were all placed in one grave, thirty feet long by twelve feet wide and four feet deep, being laid on the bottom in two rows, their feet together, their heads on the outside. They were then covered with their blankets and the earth thrown over them. Some few squaws witnessed the execution, but no male Indian."

Major F. J. Dewitt was appointed by Acting Governor Hutchinson to the position of trader at the new agency, which was named Fort Thompson, as a compliment to its founder. By virtue of his office, the governor was superintendent of Indian affairs for Dakota and had the appointment of the agency traders. Hutchinson was now acting governor, William Jayne, former governor, having resigned March 4th, to take his seat as delegate in Congress from Dakota.

The immediate cause of the serious Indian trouble and Indian wars, beginning in August, 1862, with the "Little Crow Massacre" in Minnesota, was attributed to the alleged dishonesty and peculations that characterized the official conduct of Indian affairs in our neighboring state. At the time of the outbreak in the summer of 1862, and for some time after, circumstantial statements were published showing that gross frauds had been perpetrated in connection with the annuities furnished the Indians by the general Government, and it was claimed that these nefarious practices became so gross and heartless that the agency Indians were reduced to a condition of actual starvation, and that the outbreak was "the turning of the worm" who had been trodden upon until its life was nearly crushed out. The Indians engaged in the bloody work under Little Crow were regarded as a semi-civilized tribe, and as friendly to the white people as any of the Sioux nation. They were not professing Christians, but well advanced in the way to become a civilized people. They had largely abandoned the nomad life and were in many cases settled in their own homes, raised horses and cattle, and cultivated the soil. They had, in great part, forsaken the blanket and put on apparel similar to the palefaces, and for many years had been accustomed to associate familiarly with the whites. Suddenly all this was changed. In a few brief weeks these apparently civilized Indians were transformed from a harmless and inoffensive people to hostile demons thirsting for the blood and the lives of their old neighbors, slaying without discrimination the old and young, men and women, with all the ferocity of savage beasts. It is difficult to realize that these monsters of cruelty could have ever been sincerely friendly to the whites. Had their deadly animosity been directed only toward the individuals whom they charged with robbing and wronging them, and when these were dispatched the outrages had ceased, it might well be claimed that their hatred did not extend to all white people, but such was not the case. Every person who wore the skin of the paleface was marked for slaughter, and above five hundred perished—put to death by the most cruel tortures the savage could devise. It must be remembered, too, that this Little Crow outbreak was apparently the signal for hostilities over all the Northwest, from the Mississippi to the Rocky Mountains and as far south as Southern Kansas, and within a very brief period of time the Sioux, almost without exception, had changed their attitude from one of apparent friendship to that of implacable hostility. It would seem that the widespread revolution of sentiment was due to a cause that appealed alike to the Indian nature, regardless of location or local conditions.

For a great many years prior to the Minnesota, or Little Crow, outbreak, the Dakotah nation of Indians had manifested no unusual signs of hostility, with the exception of the Spirit Lake massacre in 1857, which was the act of a roving band of outlaws bent on rapine and not in retaliation for any particular grievance, nor was it openly counseled or approved by the tribe to which the outlaws belonged. Regarding this atrocity a brief historical sketch of the massacre, compiled under the auspices of the State Historical Society of Minnesota, relates:

Among the Indians (Sioux) there was a single band under the leadership of Ink-pa-du-ta, or the Scarlet Point, of about fifteen lodges which had been for many years an independent band, and of a thieving, vagabondish character (really outlaws from the Sioux nation and not represented in the treaties of 1851) who had taken possession of a strip of land running on both sides of the boundary line of Iowa and Minnesota, and extending to the Missouri River. In March, 1857, a few of these Indians were hunting in the neighborhood of Rock River, and one of them was bitten by a dog belonging to a white man. The dog was killed by the Indian, and in return the owner of the dog made an assault upon the Indian, and afterward gathered his neighbors and they went to the Indian camp and disarmed them. The arms were afterwards returned to them, and the party moved northeast, arriving at the Spirit Lake Settlement about the 6th of March, where they massacred the men and took four women into captivity. Other settlements were attacked and altogether forty-two settlers were killed. Two of the women were afterwards rescued through the efforts of Hon. Charles E. Flandreau, then the Indian agent. An effort was made to punish this band of savages, but all escaped except the oldest son of Ink-pa-du-ta, who had ventured into the camp of other Sioux near the agency and was killed in an attempt to capture him.

This statement is sufficient to show that the Sioux generally were not inclined to hostilities.

The Dakotahs were on a peace footing with the "Great Father," though at war with other nations, such as the Mandans, Gros Ventres and Rees. This hostility, however, was hereditary, and did not seriously interfere with the whites. So far as the Government was concerned, the attitude of the Dakotahs was one of peace and an apparent desire for a continuance of peaceful relations such as then existed. It is safe to believe, however, that this attitude was not one of unswerving loyalty or sincere friendship for the paleface people. It may be assumed that the Indians as a body had never entertained a sentiment of sincere and substantial friendship for the white people.

The important matters of intercourse between the races had not been of a character that would cultivate such a feeling on the part of the great majority of Indians, but there had been several centuries of acquaintance and a sort of relationship which would seem to indicate that the Indians looked upon the whites as their enemies, implacable in their animosity. Viewed from the Indian standpoint this belief was justified by all the important transactions between the races from the earliest white settlement on this continent to the present time. The white race had been the aggressor, unavoidably and providentially so as we justify it, and had taken from the Indians their country, deprived them of their homes and compelled them from time to time to relinquish their domain, give up their abodes, their life-long cherished valleys and streams and hunting grounds, abandon the graves of their ancestors and all that a people, whether savage or civilized, held most dear and sacred, and cherished with a tenacity that is as enduring as life itself; and find solace for their great and unwilling sacrifice in a few paltry dollars, beads and blankets, that were a sorry exchange for the mines of wealth in furs and peltries, in plains and rivers and forests, yielded up by the native race. The history of the intercourse between the white and red races in America has been distinctly marked by might and wrong on the part of the whites as the Indians look upon it, and being so it could not be expected that the status of the Indian toward the pale face could be other than antagonistic.

That this has been the unavoidable result of a destiny which human forces could not have controlled, does not change the conditions from the view point of the Indian, who with feelings of bitter resentment sadly realizes that the white man's hand has clutched the red man's throat for centuries, and has gradually forced him back and narrowed the circle of his domain.

But these centuries of unprofitable intercourse and sad experience had taught the Indian the futility of resisting his aggressive and powerful enemy. He had tried armed resistance over and over again, and never with success except it might be a temporary triumph over a feeble settlement for which he had to make redress by being outlawed and hunted as a mad wolf, driven to the verge of starvation and not infrequently to actual starvation and complete destitution. Guided by this sad experience the Indians as tribes were peacefully inclined, and the councils of their chiefs and leading men were directed to the maintenance of amicable relations with the whites. So much so was this the case in Dakota that until a few years prior to the great Indian war beginning in 1862, this Government made no effort to erect or maintain a military post or keep a company of soldiers, in all this northwest region, although exploring parties and scientific expeditions were annually traversing the Indian country in many directions unmolested.

In addition the hereditary and racial animosity of the Indians toward the whites, which was ineradicable, there was another and a lesser cause that gave ground for and provoked serious difficulties and was the source of constant irritation, constant complaint and an incitement to many bloody revenges. This was the dishonesty of those whites who had dealings with the Indians under the permission and protection of the Great Father, and the occasional dishonesty also of those appointed to and intrusted with the discharge of the duties and responsibilities which the Government in good faith had undertaken in behalf of the Indian. As showing the grievous and flagrant character of this turpitude a brief paragraph is taken from the annual report of Hon. Samuel Latta, who was the United States agent for the Upper Missouri Indians in the early '60s, and who spent the spring and summer seasons looking after their condition and studying their disposition. His official trip took him to the headwaters of the Missouri; he was provided with steamboat transportation and a cargo of supplies that he distributed among the Indians as testimonial of the Great Father's watchful care.

and paternal interest in the welfare of his Indian children. After his visit in 1862, the same summer that witnessed the Little Crow's outbreak, Latta in his report says:

The old American Fur Company is the most corrupt institution ever tolerated in our country. They have involved the Government in their speculative schemes; they have enslaved the Indians, kept them in ignorance, taken from them year after year, in robes and furs, their pitiful earnings, without giving them an equivalent; discouraged them in agriculture by telling them that should the whites find out what the country would produce they would come in and take their land from them. They break up and destroy every opposition to their trade that comes into the country and then make up their losses by extorting them from the Indians.

The Indians moreover claimed that they had been promised by the representatives of the Great Father that in consideration of their permitting the peaceful navigation of the Upper Missouri River, no travel by land should be undertaken through their country, because such travel frightened away their game; they were also promised that the boats should not carry passengers. Whether these promises were embodied in any formal treaty is questionable, but the Indians believed that they had been so incorporated in their written agreements. The embargo on the steamboat passenger traffic could hardly have been a part of any treaty, though prominent Government officials were personally interested in directing all emigration to the West and Northwest, through the Platte region, and looked with disfavor upon the much better and more direct commercial avenue connecting the states and the Northwest by way of the Missouri River; evidence was not wanting that these interested parties had counseled the Indians to demand the practical closing of navigation of the Upper Missouri, as a part of the price of their loyalty to the Government and the maintenance of peaceful relations.

As there was no sincere friendship as a basis of peace between the races, it was not a difficult matter to fan the smouldering embers of the natural animosity of the Indian into a blazing conflagration, when the Great Rebellion, taxing almost to the limit every resource of the nation, furnished the red men an inviting opportunity to retaliate and on the surface seemed to promise him a successful issue of an appeal to arms.

The United States was at this time convulsed with civil war, and hundreds of thousands of citizens had enlisted in the armies north and south. The Indians were well acquainted with the fraternal contest and they undoubtedly reasoned that the "Great Father" had so many enemies to look after among his own children that he could spare no soldiers to fight the Indians, and they could safely strike a blow, if they acted concertedly, that would expel the whites from the Northwest and restore to the Indians their old hunting grounds west of the Mississippi. This is not a theory. It is well known that this matter was discussed along this line in a number of Indian councils at that time, and that it, with other arguments, succeeded in moving every tribe of Sioux, save the Yanktons, into the hostile camp, and the Yanktons were once on the point of joining them.

About this time an organization was secretly effected by white men, in the northern states, to establish a northwestern confederacy in which that element of northern citizenship that opposed the war policy of the United States Government took a leading part. Evidence existed at that time that emissaries from an association inimical to the Union were at work enticing the Indians to revolt. There was a camp of hostile Santees about forty miles above Fort Pierre during the winter of 1862-63 called White Lodge's Camp, where a number of white prisoners, taken during Little Crow's outbreak, were held awaiting a ransom. The prisoners were women and young girls who had lived neighbor to their captors for years in Minnesota and understood and spoke the language fluently. A party of Santee warriors reached White Lodge's camp in November, 1862, who had just come down from the Red River of the North country, where they had been to get a supply of ammunition for the spring campaign, and they remained there at White Lodge's awaiting the opening of the spring and renewing of the war. They told White Lodge that a grand council was held on Red River with a white man who told the Indians that his people were at war with the United States and would defeat them, and his government had sent him up to assist the Indians in their war, and he was ready to furnish them with anything they needed to go on with their war, and would see that the Indians got back all the country the whites had taken from them west of the Mississippi. He told them that the Indians were all willing to join and he would be ready to start his raid as soon as the grass was as high as his hand. He intended to sweep down the Missouri River to Sioux City, driving the whites out from all the settlements, seize the forts, and from Sioux City strike north through Iowa and Minnesota to the British line, burning everything and driving the people away. He said there would not be many soldiers to oppose him because they were all down south fighting to free the negroes, who would probably be given a large tract of Indian land in the Northwest if they succeeded in getting free. He said the only Indians who had not joined him were the Yanktons, who were afraid to join on account of being so close to the forts and settlements, but many of them would join anyway and he had sent word to old Strike-the-Ree that if he didn't join he would be cleaned out with the whites.

There is no doubt that this story is authentic. The subject was frequently talked over within the hearing of the prisoners, with apparently no thought of concealing it from them then, as there was no way in which they could make use of the information to the injury of the Indians.

Here seems to be a reasonable explanation of the abrupt change of the Indian heart from one of professed friendship to open and deadly hostility. They saw an opportunity for recovering their lands and returning to their people their old hunting grounds. Little Crow's intention was to invade the Minnesota settlements and make a war of extermination. Not much is heard of Little Crow himself after the spring season was slightly advanced. It is known that in a spirit of bravado he had led a small force back to the scene of his exploits the fall before, and was finally shot down and killed near the Village of Hutchinson, on the 3d of July, 1863. His loss was a serious one to the Indians; and as he did not return to his people the leadership fell upon "Big Head," a Yanktonnais chief who had great renown as a warrior.

What is known as the Weisman massacre was the most shocking and atrocious tragedy that marked the troublous period from 1862 to 1866. On the 25th day of July, 1863, a courier reached Yankton bringing the alarming tidings of the massacre by Indians of the Weisman children, the little helpless family of a German farmer, who had taken a claim in a body of timber bordering the Missouri, on the Nebraska side, about three miles this side of the old Town of St. James. The children consisted of a daughter fifteen years old and four sons, all younger, the youngest a little lad of six years. Both parents were absent from home when the massacre occurred, the father being a member of the Second Nebraska Regiment, then in the upper country with Sully's Indian expedition, and the mother had come over to Yankton on Wednesday the 23d to make some necessary purchases. Returning, she had stopped one night with a friend on the other side of the river. The next day she started out for home and on arriving within sight of it was surprised and greatly alarmed by the appearance of Indians in the house. She was so overcome with fear that she durst not venture to the house, but fled with all haste to St. James, where she aroused the settlers, but it then being dark she could get no assistance that night, and was compelled to wait until next morning, when she secured six volunteers, who went with her to her home, where they found the eldest daughter lying on the floor, helpless but not unconscious. She was so far gone that she could not speak, and could barely move. Her appearance when discovered plainly indicated that she had been the victim of a most fiendish outrage. The three older boys were lying upon the floor, all dead, slain apparently by heavy blows on the head and body. The youngest lad was still alive and able to mutter "Indians! Indians!" The Indians rifled the house and took a horse belonging to the family, and then struck out for the Dakota side, crossing the Missouri below the mouth of the James. Company B, Dakota Cavalry, was stationed at Yankton at the time, and a detachment was immediately dispatched to get further particulars and also information as to the direction the Indians had taken in their flight. The little boy who was living when the outrage was discovered died within a few hours, and the girl lingered later, but died before regaining consciousness. It was ascertained by the soldiers from Yankton that not less than four Indians were engaged in the dastardly crime, and that they had fled into Dakota and probably struck off up the Vermillion River. Captain Tripp with a detachment of forty men and twelve days' rations set off in pursuit without delay—marching up James River about fifty miles and finding no trail, struck across to the Vermillion, where they came upon the trail of a party numbering four or five Indians, one of whom wore shoes, and one horse. At this point he sent one-fourth of his men back to camp and continued his pursuit up the Vermillion and across to the Big Sioux, searching the country closely but without result. Having consumed all the rations, their detachment returned. Tripp believed that with proper equipment he could have found the Indians, but stated that Indians when so pursued will travel farther in one day than troops will in three, and he could not expect to overtake them; but with ample subsistence he would finally have come up with them at their rendezvous. These Indians were supposed to be one of Little Crow's marauding bands that had been sent down to harass the settlements and thus detain the troops that were marching up the river under General Sully to co-operate with General Sibley.

Sergeant Eugene F. Trask, of Company B, Forty-first Iowa, then stationed at Fort Randall, was murdered by hostile Indians while a passenger on the stage, September 3, 1863. The tragedy occurred at the crossing of Choteau Creek during the forenoon, while the stage driver was watering the horses. The Indians fired into the stage from an ambush, killing the sergeant instantly. The driver jumped from the box and fled, the Indians declining to pursue except with a volley of arrows that served to accelerate the driver's flight. A little halfbreed son of Thophile Brughier, of Cole County, was a passenger on the stage going home, but he was not molested. The Indians took the horses, rifled the stage of everything except the mail sacks, took a portion of the dead sergeant's clothing and all his personal effects, and decamped in the direction of James River. There were four Indians in the party. Intelligence of this murder reached Yankton the same evening, and on the morning of the 4th Captain Tripp, of Company B, who was then stationed at Yankton, started in pursuit with twelve days' rations. He struck the hostile trail about ninety miles above Yankton in the James River Valley, and found Trask's military hat and some valuable legal papers on the prairie. He went ahead to the Dirt Lodges, miles above, where he expected to find the Indians, but was disappointed. The lodges were deserted but bore evidence of recent occupation. A large field of corn had been planted but had suffered by neglect. Tripp gave up the pursuit at the Dirt Lodges and returned, having exhausted his rations and also violated his orders in going so far away from the settlements. The perpetrators of this dastardly deed were never discovered.

"Dirt Lodges" were notorious in pioneer days as the refuge of hostile Indians, who would flee to them after committing a depredation. They were situated on a plateau on the east side of the James River, about one mile by land and three by river north of the outlet of Turtle River. These lodges overlooked a very large area of country, their site being at least one hundred feet above the river. They were built by White Lodge and his band many years prior to the opening of Dakota to settlement, and they were the abiding place of Santee Indians during winter. The Indians had the river near the Lodges dammed by a fish trap in 1863.

The location of Dirt Lodges was on one of the most eligible spots for a townsite in the Northwest, not excepting Yankton, which in that respect has become known as a model. There were fifteen of these lodges. They were located in a large circle, 165 feet in diameter, with playgrounds attached, and a medicine pole and lookout station in the center. The lookout station is said to have afforded a view of great magnificence and remarkable distances. An enemy approaching the village could be observed through field glasses when within twenty-five miles of the place. The lodges were constructed by placing sticks of wood five feet long upright in the ground, binding their tops together with long poles, then placing other poles on this structure and leaning their tops to the center, forming the roof. The entire structure was then covered with sod from the base to the summit, leaving a small smoke-hole at the apex of the roof. The lodges were not all of the same dimensions; some would accommodate seventy-five Indians, others about twenty-five. Forty acres of land had been broken up nearby in Indian fashion, and the squaws cultivated at least one-half of it to corn; they also raised beans, peas and turnips, potatoes, and possibly other vegetables. There was an abundance of timber within two miles of the lodges, while the prairie surrounding, viewed in spring, presented a landscape of surpassing beauty. These lodges were distant from Yankton by land about one hundred and seventy miles and were located in the northern range of Spink County townships, near Doxbury, on the Milwaukee road.

YANKTON INDIANS CAPTURE HOSTILES

During the early summer of 1864, Doctor Burleigh, the agent of the Yankton Indians, procured United States military uniforms for about forty of his Yankton warriors and sent them out into the James and Vermillion valleys on a scouting expedition. It will be remembered that the Yanktons had now become absolutely friendly to the whites and were deadly enemies of the hostile Indians who were lurking on the borders of the white settlements of the territory, watching an opportunity to commit depredations. The result of the scout was reported to the governor of Dakota in the following letter:

Yankton Agency, August 3, 1864.

Hon. N. Edmunds,
Governor and Superintendent of Indian Affairs,
Yankton, D. T.

Dear Sir, A few days since a small party of Indians under the charge of the interpreter, A. C. Gregory, returning from the Red Pipe Stone Quarry, when near the Vermillion River, came upon the trail of a war party traveling down the river toward the Missouri. They followed the trail and soon came upon a band of hostile Santee Indians, who fled but were pursued and captured and taken to the camp of the Yanktons.

On being closely questioned they confessed that they were a war party of fifteen, and had left Devil's Lake twenty days before, where were 800 lodges of hostiles. Their destination was the white settlements, where they designed to rob and murder the whites. The Yanktons told them that they were friendly to the whites and the Great Father, and since they were going to kill the whites they, the Yanktons, would kill them.

One of the captured Indians, about thirty-five years old, stated that he belonged to White Lodge's Band, that he killed ten white persons in the Minnesota massacre and was one of the party of three that murdered three children not far from the mouth of the James River in Nebraska last year. (This was undoubtedly the Weisman massacre.)

Having made their confessions they were executed by the Yanktons, and "receipts" taken for the delivery of each one at his final destination, which "receipts" were duly forwarded to my office, where they now are.

Another one of the Yanktons who had separated from the main party came upon two others of this hostile party who met him with their guns cocked and told him they were going down to kill whites and steal horses. One of them said he was the leader of the party that killed five children near the James River in Nebraska last year. (This may have been the French massacre at Choteau Creek.) The Yankton being alone with a single barrel shot gun, concluded that "discretion was the better part of valor," and returned to camp, where a small party was detached to follow the trail of the hostiles but did not overtake them. The hostiles were well supplied with lariats and whips, showing that they were experienced.

I make this statement, governor, not to cause alarm, but to put our settlers on their guard and that you may take such steps as you deem necessary to preserve the lives and property of our settlers, who should be very cautious not to unduly expose themselves or their property.

W. A. BURLEIGH,
United States Yankton Agent.

THE HEART RIVER MASSACRE

A party of gold miners from Montana reached Yankton on the 1st of November, 1863. They arrived in three small skiffs, or canoes. Mr. Delay was the name of one of the party, and none of the other names were preserved. Mr. Delay was the spokesman and a very intelligent gentleman. From him it was learned that his party, numbering seventeen, left Fort Benton, Montana, in a good mackinaw boat in July preceding. They were amply provisioned and well armed, and expected to overtake a returning steamboat and get passage to the states. They knew that the hostile Indians infested the river and did not hesitate to attack any kind of a boat carrying white people. Near Fort Union a large band of hostiles rushed into the river and surrounded the boat at a point where a temporary halt was made near a bar, but after a short parley and observing that the miners were well prepared for a fight, they accepted a few pounds of provisions and withdrew. Numerous bodies of Indians were afterwards seen, and shots were exchanged quite frequently, but the miners reached Fort Berthold without mishap. Here they remained for some time, and at length, being informed that they ran a great risk in returning further with their light boat, eleven of the number resolved to remain at Berthold all winter if necessary rather than jeopardize their lives in the mackinaw. Six of the party, however, determined to come through, and obtained three small boats capable of carrying two each, with provisions, and set out in the dusk of evening about the 15th of September. They traveled only at night, and met with much delay from shallow water and suffered with the cold and their narrow quarters, but they escaped the vigil of the redskins. They brought the particulars of the killing of the party at the mouth of Heart River in July last, which they obtained from Mr. Frederic Gerrarde at Fort Berthold. This party left Benton early in July and had an excellent equipment. There were seventeen white men in the party, armed to the teeth, all of them good miners, one woman and two children, and two half-breed Sioux. Knowing the danger from hostile Indians, the boat had been provided with a two-inch plank fortification, built above the deck as a precaution. The craft was also provided with a small cannon, which proved a serious misfortune.

At the mouth of Heart River a party of Sioux came along the bank and beckoned them to come inshore. They responded by firing the cannon three times, the Indians returning the fire vigorously. The continuous fire of the cannon caused the boat to spring a leak, and but for that unfortunate circumstance they might have escaped. The Indians were driven back from the shore, but renewed the attack, and during the second fight the boat leaked so badly that it sank in shallow water. The battle was begun in earnest between the miners and nearly two hundred Indians, many of them armed with guns. A portion of the whites made their way to the shore and succeeded in driving the redskins back to shelter, but it was apparent that without reinforcement the white men were doomed to extermination. It was in vain that the half breed Sioux plead with the savages and offered them a variety of valuable presents. Ten of the miners fell, killed outright or badly wounded. Finally their ammunition gave out, when the savages rushed upon the remainder with a terrific yell. The whites clubbed their guns and beat off their assailants, until overpowered by numbers, when all were slain. Frenzied with excitement over their victory, the savages then slew the half breeds, the women and children. The Indians then rifled the boat and the bodies of the slain. Mr. Delay stated that the miners had over one hundred thousand dollars in gold, and that two of the men had a false bottom constructed in the vessel wherein was stored a very large quantity of gold dust and nuggets. Delay did not believe the savages discovered this, but that it was still in the boat which had been partly buried in the sand.

General Sully was fully informed of this sanguinary battle and the treasure said to be hidden in the false bottom of the boat, and on his return from the battle of White Stone Hills he sent two companies of Iowa troops, under Captain Crane and Shattuck to investigate the affair. This detachment was informed that the distance from the Sully camp to Heart River was twenty miles, and their orders were to return by daylight the next morning. They marched forty miles without reaching the place designated, and camped late at night; and after a brief rest were obliged under orders to return to camp, obtaining no information. The Indians afterwards acknowledged that the miners fought desperately, admitting their own loss to have been thirty-six killed and thirty-five wounded. The Indians said they got from eighteen thousand to twenty thousand dollars in gold and some greenbacks, which they used in purchasing ammunition from Red River traders. An account of the tragedy was given to the whites at Fort Berthold in February, 1864, by Indians and half-breeds who had received it from the survivors of the attacking party, confirming the statement as given.

A letter from R. M. Hagaman, dated at the Stinking Water mines, December 2, 1863, addressed to G. W. Kingsbury, makes mention of this party. Hagaman says:

A party from the Boise mines consisting of twenty-seven in all, one woman and three children among them, left our camp at Milk River a few days before we started for Benton, in a Mackinaw boat. We sent letters by them to Yankton and the states. The party was supposed to have in their possession over one hundred thousand dollars in gold dust. We learned from some half breeds from Fort Garry on the Red River that the whole party was killed and that they, the Sioux, lost forty-two warriors in the operation, and it was also reported that Little Crow was at Garry with some of the gold dust to trade.

Mr. Hagaman, the reader will remember, left Yankton in company with Judge Tufts, in August, 1863, for Idaho, taking passage on the steamboat. The boat failed to get through to Benton and the passengers were obliged to outfit at the Milk River post, Fort Peck probably, and proceed overland, which explains their meeting with the Heart River party.

A party of miners, named John H. Carter, John S. Backus and R. Schouler and brother, all formerly of Mapello County, Iowa, of Bannock City, left that place a week later than the massacred party and were detained a month after reaching the Missouri River for want of a mackinaw boat, after procuring which they set out and reached Fort Berthold in safety. Here they found one of the men who was with the unfortunate party as far as Berthold, who had remained in the fort, having a presentment of danger. From him a list of the names of the slain was obtained, numbering eighteen men, two women and three children, and the further particulars of the tragic affair, corroborating the account here given.

AN INDIAN ACCOUNT OF THE HEART RIVER MASSACRE

Joseph Henry Taylor, a frontiersman of good repute, who has published a number of sketches of frontier and Indian life, happened to meet with an Indian woman named "Red Blanket," a Santee, during his adventures in the Upper Missouri country, who had been a witness of this tragic affair, and who gave him an account of it in her own language, which Mr. Taylor translated and published among his frontier sketches. Mr. Taylor was formerly a printer and employed in early days in the Union and Dakotan office at Yankton, quitting that employment to pursue a life on the border, and so congenial did he find it, that he has not to this day abandoned it entirely, though he is now comfortably settled at Washburn, North Dakota, where he is engaged in publishing a newspaper. Red Blanket's story, as given to Mr. Taylor, corroborates the main points of the massacre or battle as previously reported, and is here reproduced:

When Sibley's soldiers started back up Apple Creek our chiefs and head men commenced to look about them. We had many camps scattered along Heart River and some on Square Butte Creek. We found no buffalo and but few elk and deer. The Uncpapas who had been living there scared or killed everything. Three days after the soldiers disappeared we commenced recrossing the big river at the foot of the high bluffs. Buffalo were plenty on the east side and that was why we returned. We made a large camp in a deep coulee facing the river with some timber and a large sandbar in front of some low willows. Besides our own (See) band were many lodges of Yanktonnais and Sissetons. I think it was six days after our return that, in the company of several women, we went to the river to bathe and wash some clothes. There was a narrow, swift running chute near shore and beyond this a hidden bar, then deep water again. On this morning, at the entrance of the chute from the main river, sat an old man, a Sisseton, fishing. The morning was calm. Up the river we could hear voices and the sound of paddles. After some time a large boat full of people came to view and were drifting near shore. We saw that they were white people and started to run away.

At this time they were near rifle shot of the old man. He arose and made the blanket signal to keep out in the main stream. Next came a puff of smoke and a rifle report from the boat and then the old man fell over. Then we all screamed and ran until we met our husbands and brothers with their guns, bows and arrows. Then us women hid in the edge of the bushes. The long boat stopped in shallow water at the entrance of the narrow channel. More of our people came swarming out from the timber and the shooting became almost continuous, when the loud report of cannon from the boat scared us all. We were afraid soldiers from Sibley's Army might be coming again upon us, the one loud report sounding over and over so many times. Then came what we feared, wounded and dying men. We women picked them up and carried many from the bar to the lodges up the coulee. One woman was killed in trying to save her husband. I had a brother killed. It sent my heart to the ground. Several of our fighters procured logs and rolled them across the bar toward the boat, firing from behind. Others screened along the cut bank of the chute. It was in the middle of the afternoon when some one shouted that the old white man dressed in black had fallen. It was he who had killed so many of our people. He hid in one corner of the boat. He would rise at times and look about him. Our warriors believed he was a priest or medicine man. When the shout went up that the medicine man was killed everyone rushed upon the boat. All were not yet dead, but we soon killed them. One woman was found under the big box, dragged forth and cut to pieces with knives. She looked terrified but did not cry. A crying baby was taken from her arms and killed. I did not see the little girl, though she might have been there for all I would know. I helped kill the woman. They had killed my brother. The boat was half filled with water; the one shot from the cannon had caused it to leak and sink in shallow water, and that is where they stayed until all were dead. But the strangest of all is yet to come. The dead body of the man in black was nowhere to be found. In the same corner of the boat lay the body of a man with some such face, white whiskers and long white locks of hair. But he lay dressed in blood spattered yellow buckskin shirt and pants. We stripped many bodies of their clothes and in so doing found belts of what we thought was wet or bad powder. It was thrown away. We lost near thirty men altogether. Some did not die right away, but those who did were placed in the trees beyond the village. The old Sisseton fisherman went to his death trying to save trouble and lives by warning the boatmen to put out in the main stream that they might quietly pass by unnoticed. The white men mistook the motive perhaps, so killed him and paid forfeit by losing their own lives. Those who knew the Sisseton best say this was the motive that impelled the signal.

Several years later, in the fall of 1876, Mr. Taylor met an Arickaree Indian chief named Whistling Bear in the Upper Missouri country, who related to him another incident in this Heart River horror, as follows:

About two weeks after the white men belonging to the boating party were killed on Burnt Creek Bar some Uncpapa friends of the Mandans came into our village at Fort Berthold and told us about it. Girard, the trader, being my brother-in-law, and with whom I talked about the story, advised my getting together a small band of trusty men and go hunt up the place where the fight took place. He explained further that unless some of the Sioux knew gold dust by the color there must be abundant gold dust, either laying about among the effects in the boat or in belts upon the bodies of the slain, and then I was shown a sample so that no mistake would be made. In the early morning of the closing days of the "cherry moon" we left our village at Fort Berthold for the perilous trip. There were ten of us in all. We followed the river close, and on the third day we noticed the soaring buzzard on the river near the mouth of Burnt Creek. A misty line of fog that followed the curved line of the channel-water at sunrise rose high in air as we reached the sand bar at Burnt Creek. The big black appearing boat was seen at last. It was partly sunken. We saw no cannon. The bodies of the dead, partly dismembered, were being fed upon by buzzards. Upon some of them we found belts filled with gold dust. On other bodies near by the sacks or belts of buckskin had been cut open and contents spilled upon the sand. At the boat we found a coffee pot which we filled with gold dust. There were no Sioux seen. We visited their deserted camps in the coulee back from the timber grove. In the trees were many blanketed dead. We then made our way back to our village at Fort Berthold. To Girard we gave the gold. He in turn presented me with a large horse, and a few presents, and a feast to my companions on the trip.

JACOBSON KILLED AT JAMES RIVER FERRY

On the night of Tuesday, May 5, 1863, J. A. Jacobson and Thomas W. Thompson, who lived near Vermillion, were in camp at Greenway's Ferry, on the east bank of the James River, about five miles from Yankton. The men were asleep in their wagon and were on their return from Fort Randall, where they had delivered a load of Government freight. Just at daylight of the 6th a band of hostiles attacked the camp with rifles and arrows, sending a volley into the wagon, and instantly killing Jacobson, and seriously wounding Thompson, who sprang out and made for the ferry house, having been hailed by Greenway, who had been aroused and had opened fire on the Indians from the window of his cabin. Thompson was followed by a volley of arrows, one of which struck him in the back of the neck, after passing through a heavy coat collar, and lodged in contact with the bone. The coat collar probably saved his life. The Indians secured the team and made off, but the horses subsequently escaped and were found in the neighborhood of the ferry. Lieutenant Fowler, with a detachment of Company A, Dakota Cavalry, started out in pursuit, but they were unable to discover the trail. Colonel Pollock, at Fort Randall, also sent out a detachment, but nothing was discovered that would lead to the capture of the marauding party. The affair created intense excitement, and caused the loss of a number of farmers who removed from the territory. This tragedy led to immediate action on the part of General Cook, to protect the settlements, which had been left to the militia, and to Company A, Dakota Cavalry, during the six months prior, the cavalry company being required to patrol the entire frontier from the Big Sioux to Choteau Creek on the western borders of Bon Homme County while a good deal of harsh criticism was heard of the apparent indifference of the military authorities to the safety of Dakota's settlers.

Newton Edmunds, a citizen of Yankton and one of the pioneers of Dakota, was appointed governor of the territory, October 5, 1863, to succeed William Jayne, who had been chosen delegate to Congress and who resigned the governorship in February, 1863. During the interval following Jayne's resignation, John Hutchinson, secretary and acting governor, had performed the duties of the executive office.

There had been no emigration to the territory during 1863. A few settlers doubtless came in, but owing to the prolonged drouth, very little grain or other produce was grown during the year.

Secretary Hutchinson, who had been the responsible governor after the 4th of March, 1863, issued the following "official notice" to the people during the summer of 1863, while General Sully was absent with his expedition, which explains itself:

Executive Office, Yankton, D. T., August 15, 1863

To the People of Dakota Territory:—

The hostile demonstrations of Indians in this territory, and the frequent reports of the appearance of Indians, suggests the propriety of speedy information being given to the commanders of troops, in order that any Indians who may be seen may be pursued and captured and protection given to the settlements.

You are therefore requested to report promptly to the commanders of troops nearest to the point where Indians are seen, who will immediately take such steps for their pursuit as may be necessary.

The safety of every inhabitant demands that this request should be strictly complied with.

JOHN HUTCHINSON,
Acting Governor.

After the return of Sully's Indian expedition, it was discovered that the Yankton Indians had been a wall of defense for the settlements of the territory against the hostile hordes of Little Crow during the absence of the troops on the expedition. Every art known to the hostiles was used to seduce the Yanktons from their allegiance and friendliness, but it availed nothing. "Old Strike" was not to be deceived by the boasts which their emissaries made to him of the certainty of the success of the Indian arms during the summer, bolstered by the statement that they had white generals to lead them and plenty of everything, which confirmed the reports of white men being with the Red River Indians early in the season, inciting them to war. The Yanktons furnished a few recruits to the hostiles, who were young, reckless dare-devils who acted on their own notion and in defiance of the commands of the chiefs. As a tribe, they opposed the hostiles and furnished the most faithful scouts to Sully; and in a number of instances attacked and destroyed or captured small bands of the enemy and marched them as prisoners into Fort Randall. Major Burleigh was to be greatly credited for this condition. He had taken pains to explain to the chiefs the power of the Government and the certainty of punishment being meted out to the hostile Sioux, not only by the soldiers but in the loss of their annuities which they had been receiving from the hands of the Great Father. And so the Yanktons remained our most faithful allies and friends and afforded a surer protection to the settlers than would have been furnished by the same or even a greater number of soldiers, for the reason that the hostiles knew they would be unable to reach the settlements and commit any depredations without being detected and punished by some one of the warrior Yankton bands who were constantly on the lookout for their encroachments, and knowing every trail and path that hostile parties would pursue, they were sure to head them off, which they did in every instance. Soldiers would not have been able, under the strictest patrol system, to have afforded such protection, though well enough to follow up and punish transgressors after the damage is inflicted. It may therefore be concluded that it was a most fortunate circumstance, our having this Yankton reservation on the border of the settlements, peopled by a tribe who had intelligence enough to perceive where their best interests were.

APPOINTMENTS

Hon. George P. Waldron was appointed provost marshal of Dakota Territory in June, 1863. Judge Joseph R. Hanson was appointed by Captain Waldron to the chief clerkship in his office in July following.

Hon. Enos Stutsman was appointed private secretary in the executive office by Acting Governor Hutchinson, in June, 1863.

The Rev. Melancthon Hoyt was appointed United States commissioner for the Second Judicial District by Chief Justice Bliss. This was the first appointment to this office made in the territory.

In September, 1863, Hon. John W. Boyles, of Vermillion, was appointed receiver of the United States land office at that place, Mr. Wilkinson, the former incumbent, having resigned to take the agency of the Indians at Fort Buford.

St. A. D. Balcombe, of Minnesota, and chairman of the Minnesota constitutional convention of 1858, was appointed United States agent of the Winnebago Indians in 1863. His agency was at Crow Creek, or Fort Thompson, where the Santees were located.

General Todd, having commenced proceedings to contest the seat in Congress claimed by Governor Jayne, as delegate from Dakota, Congress ordered a preliminary investigation of the grounds of contest before admitting Governor Jayne, and on the report of the committee having charge of the matter, Mr. Jayne was given the seat on prima facie evidence, without prejudice to Todd, who went on with the contest.

On the 14th of July, 1863, the Sioux City Journal, a weekly newspaper, with Mr. Ed B. Stillman as publisher and editor, began its career at Sioux City, which at that time was regarded as a formidable rival of Yankton.

The Fort Randall News was the title of a weekly newspaper published during the summer of 1863 by the soldiers stationed at that post.

The office of United States assessor of internal revenue for the District of Dakota Territory was created by act of Congress in the winter of 1862, and Joseph Labarge, of Cole County, was the first incumbent. The duties were not onerous, while the salary was ample, which furnished abundant reason for accepting the position.

CHAPTER XXIX

POLITICS AND PROCLAMATIONS

1863

POLITICIANS DISTURBED—REPUBLICAN PARTY DIVIDED—JUDGE BLISS AND DR. W. A. BURLEIGH, LEADERS OF THE RESPECTIVE FACTIONS—VERY SLIGHT ATTENTION GIVEN TO THE LEGISLATIVE ELECTION OF 1863—REPUBLICAN AND UNION CONVENTION TO ELECT DELEGATES TO THE NATIONAL CONVENTION OF 1864—FIRST TERMS OF COURT IN SECOND DISTRICT—THANKSGIVING—PROCLAMATIONS OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN AND GOVERNOR EDMUNDS.

There was a growing disaffection in the camp of the republican and union party during the year 1863, the outgrowth of the Jayne and Todd campaigns of the year previous and the irregularities and frauds of that election, which had been given wide publicity through the legislative investigation of 1862-63, and due also to personal ambitions. Another prolific cause of party soreheadedness was attributed to Surveyor General Hill, who had been bringing into the territory from his Michigan home public land surveyors and their assistants, who had received the surveying contracts, to the exclusion of a number of surveyors who were bona fide residents of the territory. Judge Bliss retained a rank supporter of the democratic candidates as clerk of his court; Captain Waldron, the provost marshal, was in the insurgent business up to his ears and was looked upon as one badly tainted with party treason; while Attorney General Gleason was an avowed supporter of the General Todd element, their legal advisor and general counsellor. Scores of other republicans, not so conspicuous in public life, trailed along the same path, presaging a well defined split in the party before the contest came on in 1864.

Chief Justice Bliss and Secretary Hutchinson were also looked upon as inimical to the "regular" organization, owing to their attitude toward the Todd versus Jayne contest, which was not yet decided by Congress. Though as a board of canvassers they had given the certificate to Jayne, they were now looked upon as favoring Todd, because of the frauds that had been disclosed since the certificate was issued.

The agent of the Yankton Indians, Maj. Walter A. Burleigh, was a frequent visitor to the settlements of Dakota, and seemed to be a gentleman quite democratic in manners, though strongly republican in politics. He had been a physician in Pennsylvania and enjoyed a lucrative practice. While he had abandoned the practice in Dakota, he never refused to lend his professional services in case of emergency, and those who had occasion to be treated by him were loud in their praise of his skill. He would take no fee for such services. He was popular with the farmers all through the Missouri Valley, and it was said of him that he had, in many instances, aided in starting a bare-handed pioneer to get his cabin up, a few acres broke, and a cow or two. It was not, however, divined at this time that this active social gentleman, whose ordinary stride, as he walked about the town, would keep the average pedestrian trotting along beside him if he desired to "keep up," was destined to take a most important and prominent part in the political, agricultural, commercial and transportation interests of the territory and become a great leader in its largest enterprises. But the events of the coming winter and spring served to bring him into the foreground, where he remained for a long term of years, bearing the most conspicuous part of any of our public men.

The first term of the United States District Court for the Second District convened at Yankton the second Monday in May, 1862, Judge Bliss presiding; United States attorney, Gleason; marshal, Shaeffer, and clerk, James M. Allen. The grand jury was composed of Obed Foote, foreman; C. S. White, J. M. Stone, Henry Arend, Otis Wheeler, Culban Oleson, Ole Oleson, Canute Nelson, David Fisher, William Thompson, D. W. Reynolds, Nelson Collamer, C. F. Putnam, Benjamin F. Barge, Nels Nelson. At this term, which remained in session but one day, no business was transacted.

The fall term of court for 1862 convened October 5th. The same officers were present as at the May term, with the exception of Marshal Shaeffer, who had resigned, and George M. Pinney had succeeded to that place. The grand jury was made up of J. M. Stone, foreman; John Keltz, John Rouse, John Lawrence, J. R. Hanson, H. T. Bailey, Obed Foote, B. F. Barge, C. S. White, M. Hoyt, Peter Johnson, J. S. Presko, Enos Stutsman, Henry Bradley, John Stanage. This grand jury remained in session four days but there was no business before the court. The session was held at the first council chamber on the southeast corner of Broadway and Fourth street. During the session and while waiting for the grand jury to complete its labors, the chief justice and others held an immigration meeting and partially organized a territorial agricultural society, urging that through such an association they could give material aid to the work of immigration by stimulating an interest in agricultural pursuits and disseminating information throughout the country regarding the resources of Dakota as an agricultural field. The chief justice had taken a claim adjoining Picotte's townsite on the north, and was preparing to open up a farm. The family of the chief justice joined him late in the summer of 1863, and spent some time at their cozy home in Blissville, which was the name given to the judge's country seat north of Picotte's and adjoining the well-known Stone farm on the west, where the judge had taken a homestead. He was preparing at this time to make substantial improvements on his place. He was now in the public eye, and had many ardent supporters as a candidate on the republican ticket for the nomination for delegate to Congress, which would be chosen in 1864; and he was known to look favorably upon these efforts of his friends, cherishing, as he did, a strong preference for a legislative career, for which he was amply endowed. There was, therefore, more than ordinary meaning to his work as a claim holder and a plow holder.

The severity of the drouth, Indian hostilities, and General Sully's Indian campaign must have monopolized the attention of the politicians of the territory, for up to August 31st no move had been made to nominate the legislative ticket, and the election was appointed for the 7th day of September following. Party lines throughout the northern states had been almost entirely ignored owing to the Civil war, which brought into the same political fold republicans and union democrats on the single issue of the preservation of the Union, and in order that the harmony of this relation might be undisturbed, the republican, as well as the democratic committees, as a rule, refrained from calling conventions under the party title. On the 1st of September the following call was issued by the unconditional union voters of Yankton County, and about the same rule was followed in the other counties:

All legal voters of Yankton County, who have an abiding faith in the great principles of the declaration of independence; who are unalterably opposed to secession and disunion; who consider the preservation of the American Union as paramount to all earthly concerns; and who desire to lend their hearty and unreserved support to the present national administration in its effort to suppress the existing rebellion and uphold by word and deed every measure of that administration which is calculated in good faith to restore our national union peace, prosperity and tranquility, are cordially invited to be present at the of Hon. Kund Larson, near the Lake Settlement in Yankton County, on Thursday, September 3, 1863, at 2 o'clock P. M., there to put in nomination eight loyal candidates for the coming Legislature.

Free conveyance from Yankton will be furnished to all thoroughly loyal men who wish to attend.

This convention nominated a full legislative ticket, which was duly elected at the election seven days later.

COMPANY B MUSTERED IN

Company B, Dakota Cavalry, which had been formed by recruiting and by the consolidation of two or three small detachments that had been raised under the proclamation of the governor of October 12, 1862, was mustered into the service of the United States March 31, 1863, at Sioux City. PRESIDENTIAL DELEGATES

A call was issued in December, 1863, for a territorial delegate convention of the "republican and union" party to meet at Yankton on the 7th of the approaching January (1864), for the purpose of electing two delegates to the national convention in 1864 for the purpose of nominating candidates for President and vice president. This national convention had not yet been called, but nearly all the leaders of the republican and union party in the territory would be in Yankton attending the sessions of the Legislature, and it was decided that it would be best to hold this convention during the session, when the people could, if they desired, elect their legislative members as delegates and thus save time and expense of holding the convention at a later day. It was generally believed and desired that Abraham Lincoln would be renominated for President without a dissenting voice. The call for this convention was signed by W. W. Brookings, chairman; John W. Boyle, Clay County; William Frisbie, Union County; and George M. Pinney, Yankton, with George N. Propper, secretary.

In accordance with this call, conventions were held in the various counties and delegates were elected, as a rule the counties selecting their legislative members as such delegates, they being already on the ground.

The territorial convention met at the capitol building, Yankton, on the 7th of January, 1864. Hon. J. M. Allen, register of the United States land office at Vermillion, was elected chairman, and B. A. Hill and G. W. Kingsbury, secretaries. A Committee on Credentials was appointed, consisting of I. T. Gore, Cole County; E. M. Wilby, Charles Mix; A. W. Puett, Clay; J. R. Hanson, Yankton; and D. M. Bradford, Bon Homme, which committee, after a brief recess of the convention, reported the following delegates entitled to seats:

Cole County—Albert Gore, J. O. Taylor, M. M. Rich, J. Mathews, B. A. Hill, D. Ross, N. G. Curtis, and Asa Mattison; Clay County, Ole Bottolfson, A. W. Puett, B. W. Collar, William Shriner, H. Gunderson, L. Bothun, Aaron Carpenter, J. M. Allen, and H. Burgess, and that J. M. Allen and William Shriner be instructed to cast the vote of absentees from that county; Yankton County, J. R. Hanson, Bligh E. Wood, George M. Pinney, George W. Kingsbury, John Lawrence, Knud Larson, W. W. Brookings and J. M. Stone; Bon Homme County, Laban H. Litchfield, Henry Brooks and D. P. Bradford; Charles Mix County, E. M. Wall, and J. J. Thompson, who is authorized to cast two votes.

The report was adopted, and on motion the convention proceeded to an informal ballot for delegates to the national convention, with the following result: W. A. Burleigh, 2; George M. Pinney, 3; John J. Thompson, 9; J. R. Hanson, 9; Newton Edmunds, 7; John Hutchinson, 7; J. W. Boyle, 11; J. O. Taylor, 8; John Lawrence, 2; L. H. Litchfield, 2; J. M. Stone, 1; J. M. Allen, 1.

A second informal ballot was then taken, as follows, the names of Messrs. Hutchinson, Hanson, Thompson, Taylor, Stone and Allen having been withdrawn: A. W. Puett, 2; W. A. Burleigh, 17; George M. Pinney, 14; Newton Edmunds, 3; J. W. Boyle, 8; John Lawrence, 15; L. H. Litchfield, 1.

On motion, the convention next proceeded to a formal ballot, the names of Messrs. Puett, Burleigh, Lawrence and Litchfield having been withdrawn. The ballot resulted: George M. Pinney, 30; Newton Edmunds, 23; J. W. Boyle, 8; W. A. Burleigh, 1. Messrs. Pinney and Edmunds were declared elected.

After this result was announced, a letter was received from Gov. Newton Edmunds, declining the delegateship as incompatible with the best interests of the party, both delegates being taken from Yankton County.

On motion the declination of Governor Edmunds was accepted.

On motion of Mr. Pinney, Messrs. Kingsbury, Hanson and Puett were appointed a Committee on Resolutions, after which a recess was taken until 7 o'clock.

After reconvening the convention proceeded to a formal ballot for the election of a delegate to the national convention in place of Governor Edmunds, resulting in the choice of J. W. Boyle, of Clay County.

On motion a committee was appointed to select and present to the convention five names for a territorial central committee.

The committee recommended W. W. Brookings, Yankton County; Mahlon Gore, Cole County; L. B. Bothun, Clay County; L. H. Litchfield, Bon Homme County, and John J. Thompson, Charles Mix County. The recommendation was adopted.

On motion the Hon. J. Thompson was elected as alternate delegate for George M. Pinney, and Hon. J. O. Taylor, alternate for J. W. Boyle.

The Committee on Resolutions then made its report, as follows:

Resolved, That the acts and measures of the national administration in its efforts to suppress the present existing rebellion, have our united and hearty approval and sympathy, and we sincerely hope it will pursue, with every means in its power, the vigorous prosecution of the war.

The resolutions further commended President Lincoln for the wise and patriotic course he was pursuing to restore the Union; also commended Salmon P.

Chase, secretary of the treasury, for the able and successful manner with which he managed the finances of the country, declaring that his greater fame would rest upon his title, "the Father of the Greenback;" also demanded the construction of the north branch of the Pacific railroad by way of the Missouri and Niobrara valleys to a junction with the main line at or near Fort Laramie; and recommended to the public the overland route to the gold mines of Montana through Southern Dakota.

The resolutions, as reported, were adopted, whereupon the convention adjourned.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S THANKSGIVING EDICT

There was an earnestness and sincerity in the Thanksgiving proclamation issued by President Lincoln during the Civil war, and these were supplemented by proclamations at various times calling the people to observe a day devoted to humiliation and prayer. Mr. Lincoln was strong in the faith of God's overruling Providence, and no doubt endeavored at all times to be guided by the light which came to him through his unfaltering faith and implicit trust in the Almighty, whose approval and blessing would surely give victory to the Union cause. Showing the President's attitude in seeking the guidance of the Almighty Ruler of Nations, Mr. Lincoln's proclamation of 1863, in the midst of the fraternal conflict, is here reproduced:

By the President of the United States of America; A Proclamation:

The year that is drawing toward its close has been filled with the blessings of fruitful fields and healthful skies. To these bounties, which are so constantly enjoyed that we are prone to forget the source from which they come, others have been added which are of so extraordinary a nature that they cannot fail to penetrate and soften even the heart which is habitually insensible to the ever watchful providence of the Almighty God.

In the midst of a civil war of unparalleled magnitude and severity, which has sometimes seemed to foreign states to invite and to provoke their aggression, peace has been preserved with all nations, order has been maintained, the laws have been respected and obeyed, and harmony has prevailed everywhere except in the theater of military conflict, while that theater has been greatly contracted by the advancing armies and navies of the Union.

Needful diversion of wealth and of strength from the fields of peaceful industry to the national defense has not arrested the plow, the shuttle or the ship; the ax has enlarged the borders of our settlements, and the mines, as well of iron and coal as of the precious metals, have yielded even more abundantly than heretofore. Population has steadily increased, notwithstanding the waste that has been made in the camp, the siege, and the battlefield, and the country, rejoicing in the consciousness of augmented strength and vigor, is permitted to expect continuance of years with large increase of freedom.

No human counsel hath devised nor hath any mortal hand worked out these great things. They are the gracious gifts of the most high God, who, while dealing with us in anger for our sins, hath nevertheless remembered mercy.

It has seemed to me fit and proper that they should be solemnly, reverently and gratefully acknowledged, as with one heart and one voice, by the whole American people. I do therefore invite my fellow citizens in every part of the United States, and also those who are at sea and those who are sojourning in foreign lands, to set apart and observe the last Thursday of November next as a day of thanksgiving and praise to our beneficent Father who dwelleth in the heavens. And I recommend to them that while offering up the ascriptions justly due to Him for such singular deliverances and blessings, they do also, with humble penitence for our national perverseness and disobedience, commend to his tender care all those who have become widows, orphans, mourners or sufferers in the lamentable civil strife in which we are unavoidably engaged, and fervently implore the interposition of the Almighty hand to heal the wounds of the nation and to restore it, as soon as may be consistent with the divine purposes, to the full enjoyment of peace and harmony, with the union of our states completely restored.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed. Done at the City of Washington, this 3d day of October, A. D. 1863, and of the independence of the United States, the eighty-eighth.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By the President: —

WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

CONGRESS SOLICITS DIVINE FAVOR

A very gratifying and encouraging feature that marked the proceedings of Congress during the Civil war, as well as the Executive Department, was the frequent occasions set apart for invoking Divine assistance in guiding the Government through the perils which beset it. There need be no doubt that our rulers had abundant faith in God and felt that with His favor and blessing the Union cause would be invincible. And it seemed that all were striving in the utmost sincerity to win God's approval of their work. Our nation was likened unto the Jewish nation, in its early career, when God led it through all perils, and by frequent reprimands and severe punishments, to signal victories. The several proclamations which have been reproduced in these pages exhibit the sincere and trusting faith our rulers had in God's approval of the Union cause, and the work was planned to secure a continuance of His blessings. There could be but one outcome to a struggle where God's overruling Providence was so implicitly recognized. We here print the full text of a concurrent resolution passed by Congress in June, 1864, showing the fervent piety and devout trust held by the members of that body:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to appoint a day for humiliation and prayer by the people of the United States; that he request his constitutional advisers at the head of the executive department to unite with him as chief magistrate of the nation at the City of Washington, and the members of Congress, and all magistrates, all civil, military and naval officers, all soldiers, sailors and marines, with all loyal and law abiding people, to convene at their usual places of worship, or wherever they may be, to confess and to repent of their manifold sins; to implore the compassion and forgiveness of the Almighty, that if consistent with His will, the existing rebellion may be speedily suppressed and the supremacy of the Constitution and laws of the United States may be established throughout all the states; to implore Him, as the Supreme Ruler of the world, not to destroy us as a people, nor to suffer us to be destroyed by the hostility or connivance of other nations, or by obstinate adhesions to our own counsels, which may be in conflict with His eternal purposes, and to implore Him to enlighten the mind of the nation to know and do His will, humbly believing that it is in accordance with His will that our place should be maintained as a united people among the family of nations; to implore Him to grant to our armed defenders and the masses of the people that courage, power of resistance, and endurance necessary to secure that result; to implore Him in his infinite goodness to soften the hearts, enlighten the minds, and quicken the consciences of those in rebellion, that they may lay down their arms and speedily return to their allegiance to the United States, that they may not be utterly destroyed; that the effusion of blood may be stayed, and that amity and fraternity may be restored and peace established throughout all our borders.

In accordance with the resolution, the President designated the first Thursday of August, 1864, to be observed by the people of the United States as a day of national humiliation and prayer.

It will be seen by these state papers that the rulers of our national Government during the Civil war were deeply imbued with the conviction that the outcome of the war was in the hands of the Almighty; the people were no less impressed with this conviction than were the rulers, and these occasions of prayer and praise and humiliation were observed with devout hearts and earnest, sincere prayer for the favor of the Most High. It is noticeable that the enemies of the Union were commended to the favor and goodness of the Supreme Ruler, that he would not suffer them to be destroyed, indicating that there was no vindictive or revengeful spirit felt toward those in arms against the Government, but plainly a solemn invitation to abandon their efforts to destroy the Government and divide the Union, lay down their arms, return to their allegiance, and they would find their reception cordial and sincere and worthy of a great nation in treating with its rebellious but repentant sons.

This day of humiliation and prayer, which fell on Thursday, August 4th, was appropriately observed in Dakota by religious services, and in Yankton by services conducted by Rev. L. P. Judson, a Baptist clergyman, who resided at Bon Homme, and had come out with the New York colony under the auspices of the American Baptist Home Missions. The services were held in the capitol building.

Governor Edmunds issued his first Thanksgiving proclamation on the 26th day of October, 1863. It is here given in full. It was his first official act and is a very creditable and appropriate state paper:

In accordance with the proclamation of the President of the United States and a time honored usage of this country, I, Newton Edmunds, governor of Dakota Territory, do hereby appoint the last Thursday of November next as a day of thanksgiving to Almighty God for His great mercies and many blessings of the past year; in that He has preserved our lives, blessed us with health, and given us an abundant harvest; in that He has protected us from the hands of the cruel and relentless savage, and kept us from all harm.

Let us thank God for the immortal triumph of our armies in this great struggle for our national preservation; and let us thank Him also for the bravery, indomitable energy and perseverance of our citizen soldiers. Let us thank God for the preservation of our free institutions, won by the fortitude, bravery and blood of our fathers and handed down to us with their blessing. Let us acknowledge before God our manifold and grievous sins as a nation, and with firm reliance on the Great Ruler of the Universe, commit our cause to Him in whose hands are the destinies of nations.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the territory to be affixed. Done at Yankton, D. T., this 26th day of October, A. D. 1863.

NEWTON EDMUNDS,

Governor.

CHAPTER XXX

THE THIRD SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE

1863-64

THE THIRD SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE, 1863-64—CONTESTED SEATS GROWING OUT OF THE FRAUDS OF 1862—FIRST MESSAGE OF GOVERNOR EDMUNDS—THE CIVIL WAR—THE INDIAN CAMPAIGN CRITICIZED—THE ROUTE TO IDAHO—PROMOTING IMMIGRATION—NORTH BRANCH OF THE PACIFIC RAILROAD—THE PUBLIC DOMAIN—MILITARY PROTECTION FOR THE SETTLEMENTS—RED RIVER LEGISLATIVE APPORTIONMENT REPEALED—AUDITOR'S REPORT ON MILITIA EXPENSES OF 1862.

The third session of the Legislature convened at Yankton on Monday, the 7th of December, 1863. The membership of each house had been increased by the apportionment bill passed a year ago, and the council now consisted of thirteen members, and the House of twenty-four.

There was a contest from Cole County, and also from Bon Homme County, which prevented the members from those districts from any participation in the organization. The council membership, uncontested, consisted of the following:

Cole County, contested (three members); Clay County, L. Bothun, H. Compton, Franklin Taylor; Yankton County, J. M. Stone, Enos Stutsman, George W. Kingsbury; Bon Homme County, contested; Todd County, J. Shaw Gregory; Charles Mix County, John J. Thompson.

Governor Edmunds administered the oath of office to the members, and the following officers were elected:

Enos Stutsman, president; J. R. Hanson, secretary; Charles F. Rossteuscher, assistant secretary; B. C. Fowler, sergeant-at-arms; T. W. Thompson, fireman; Samuel Grant, messenger; and Rev. M. Hoyt, chaplain. The standing Committee on Elections was appointed to consider the contest cases, and the council adjourned.

The membership of the House consisted of the following named gentlemen:

Cole County, contested; Clay County, E. M. Bond, Ole Bottolfson, O. Burgess, G. W. Pratt, A. W. Puett, William Shriner; Yankton County, W. W. Brookings, John Lawrence, Knut Larson, Washington Reed, Philip Risling; Bon Homme County, contested; Todd County, Jesse Wherry, Peter Kegan; Charles Mix County, E. W. Wall.

Chief Justice Bliss, owing to the illness of Secretary Hutchinson, called the roll and administered the oath of office, after which the following officers were elected:

A. W. Puett, Clay County, speaker; Mahlon Gore, Cole County, chief clerk; A. K. Curtis, Cole County, assistant clerk; Ole Sampson, Yankton County, sergeant-at-arms; L. Larson, Clay County, fireman; L. R. Severson, Clay County, messenger; Rev. Albert Gore, Union County, chaplain.

The standing Committee on Elections, consisting of Messrs. Brookings, Shriner and Keegan, was appointed in order that the contested seat cases might have an immediate hearing, and the House then adjourned.

On the third day, Mr. Kingsbury, of the council, chairman of the Committee on Elections, to whom was referred the certificate of election of Messrs. M. M.

Rich, John Mathews, J. O. Taylor and George Stickney, A. Christy and Charles Labreche, contestants for seats in the council from the First Council District, Cole County, submitted the following report:

Mr. President:—Your Committee on Elections to whom was referred the respective credentials of the gentlemen from Cole County, claiming seats in this body, have given to the matter a candid and impartial investigation, allowing full and satisfactory time to the claimants of each opposing party, to present all the evidence deemed by them necessary to establish their respective rights to membership in this council, and after listening patiently and with due attention to the evidence produced by each party, have candidly and without undue prejudice, arrived at the following conclusions:

That on the 7th day of September, 1863, an election was held in Cole County, Dakota Territory, for members of the legislative assembly now in session. That such election was held at different places in the county, and conducted pursuant to orders, notices and proceedings of two different boards of county officers, both claiming a legal existence.

That no evidence has been produced before your committee showing that the board of county officers, composed in part of Thomas C. Watson, Archibald Christie, and Sherman Clyde, as county commissioners, Henry S. Carpenter, as register of deeds, and William Searls, judge of probate, were ever properly qualified to act as such, and that all elections that had been held in compliance with the proceedings of the above named gentlemen, claiming to represent the respective offices before mentioned, are and of right should be null and void and consequently of no effect.

That the board of county officers, consisting in part of William Frisbie, William Mathers and John R. Wood as county commissioners, N. J. Wallace, register of deeds, and A. R. Phillips, judge of probate, were duly appointed pursuant to law, to these respective positions by the governor, and under the law which created the power and named the manner of their appointment, they are made to hold their respective offices until their successors are elected and qualified. In the opinion of your committee, the last named officers (with the exception of N. J. Wallace, whose commission as register of deeds was revoked, and a commission issued to M. M. Rich, by the governor, which last named gentleman your committee believe to have been the rightful register of deeds of Cole County since his appointment as such), were the only legally constituted officers of Cole County, in their respective positions, who could act as such during the time comprised in the proceedings out of which this contest has grown, and that the election held on the 7th day of September, 1863, pursuant to the proceedings of Wm. Frisbie and Wm. Mathers, as county commissioners, and M. M. Rich, as register of deeds, was the only one in the opinion of your committee, possessing the sanction of legality.

Your committee would wish to remove any impression in the minds of this honorable body and the citizens of Dakota, that the board of county officers first mentioned in this report, and the gentlemen assuming to be elected members of this council under their proceedings, have shown any desire in their several acts, other than that apparently prompted by a sincere wish for justice, and the evidence produced and the conduct of the gentlemen before your committee has been of that courteous, candid and straightforward character, which deserves and receives our unqualified esteem.

The evidence upon which your committee base their conclusions is herewith presented in part, though not in such concise form as will be readily accessible, owing to a lack of time on our part since our investigation was concluded.

Finally, in consideration of the facts and conclusions set forth in the foregoing report, based upon full, complete and satisfactory evidence, your committee believe that they have discharged their whole duty to the parties opposed in this contest, to the citizens of the first council district, and to this honorable body, and feel assured that from this statement you will be enabled to arrive at an equitable conclusion respecting the conflicting claims herein presented.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

GEO. W. KINGSBURY, Chairman,
HUGH COMPTON,
JOHN J. THOMPSON,
Committee on Elections.

This report, signed by the full committee, was adopted and Messrs. Frisbie, Rich and Mathers, were admitted to seats.

A report of the same general tenor made to the House by the Committee on Elections was signed by a majority of the committee, viz., W. W. Brookings, chairman, and William Shriner, of Clay; but no minority report was submitted. The House adopted the report admitting N. J. Curtis, Asa Mattison, B. A. Hill, Dinneen Ross and Rev. Albert Gore, a Baptist clergyman. The contestants were Michael Ryan, Thos. C. Watson, D. Gross, M. LaSaves and John McBride.

There was also a contest in both Houses from Bon Homme County, Daniel F. Bradford and John H. Shober claimed the seat in the council; and L. H. Litchfield and Henry Brooks and R. M. Johnson were claimants for the House seats. The county was entitled to two.

In the Bon Homme contests a majority of the House committee made the following report:

Mr. Speaker:—Your Committee on Elections find that in the case of Bon Homme County, Mr. Warford, who claims to be the register of deeds of said county and gave a certificate of election to R. M. Johnson, was appointed a deputy register of deeds of said county in the summer of 1862 by one H. W. Granger, who ceased to be a resident of said county before the fall election of 1862, if he ever was a resident of said county. That said Warford has no other claim to the office of register of deeds of said county, except by an election held in the night, after his party had broken up the legal and regular election, and destroyed the ballots.

Further, your committee find that L. H. Litchfield was appointed by William Jayne, governor of the territory, register of deeds of said Bon Homme County, on the 1st day of August, 1862, and that from all the evidence before your committee, he is the only legal and proper register of deeds in said county; and that the persons having the certificates of election from said Litchfield are the only legal representatives of said county, to wit: L. H. Litchfield and Henry Brooks.

Further, your committee would notice the fact that there is but one claimant under the Warford certificate. Therefore your committee recommend that Messrs. Brooks and Litchfield be permitted to take their seats in this house as the legal representatives of Bon Homme County.

W. W. BROOKINGS, Chairman,
WM. SHRINER,
Committee on Elections.

Yankton, December 1, 1862.

This report was adopted by the House and Brooks and Litchfield seated.

A similar report, signed by the full Committee on Elections was submitted to the council, recommending the admission of Daniel P. Bradford, which was adopted and Mr. Bradford was sworn in. There were no further contests. The members admitted in both Houses were candidates on the unconditional Union ticket. It may be safely stated, however, that all members in both Houses were Union men; the only dividing line being the supporters of Governor Jayne and those who adhered to General Todd. On this issue the council stood nine for Jayne and three for Todd; and the House eighteen for Jayne and three for Todd. The Red River region was not represented in either House.

The annual message of Governor Edmunds was delivered to a joint convention on the third day of the session. It is here given except the portion treating of national affairs:

Gentlemen of the Council and the House of Representatives:

A year has elapsed since last you assembled in this hall to deliberate and enact laws for the government and welfare of our people. A year of great trial to our country; a year of intestine war and bloody feuds; a year in which our loyal and patriotic citizen soldiers have, by their bravery, indomitable energy and perseverance, obtained great and important victories over our enemies; a year in which whole states have been conquered and reclaimed from the possession and control of the traitors, who have for more than two years and a half, been engaged in murdering and plundering our fellow citizens, and devastating our once happy, united and peaceful country; a year of border war with the relentless, implacable and heartless savages of our own territory, and still we have a country and government left us, of which we may all be proud, and which should be the pride and boast of every true, patriotic and loyal American citizen, whether such by birth or naturalization. While all this has been transpiring in our country the past year, we have every reason to feel thankful for the blessings that have been bestowed upon us by an all wise, overruling Providence, and should fervently thank Him for his continued mercies vouchsafed to us.

Two expeditions have been fitted out the present season by the Government, at great expense and at a time of great peril to our whole country, when the aid of every able bodied man was needed by the Government for its protection against traitors—one from the State of Minnesota, the other from the State of Iowa—both of which have, by long and tedious marches westward, traversed nearly the entire breadth of our country, having for their object the punishment of the Indians engaged in the massacre of the whites, our neighbors in the State of Minnesota, and for the depredations committed by them on the state, and in our own territory, within the past eighteen months; and though ample force was provided by the Government in both cases, and both succeeded in coming up with the Indians and inflicting some punishment upon them, I am sorry to say that in neither case has the punishment been of that severe and decided character as will be likely to end this bloody, expensive and harassing war; and there will doubtless be a necessity for another expedition next season. This circumstance is greatly to be regretted, from the effect that a border war of this character has upon the settlement and development of our territory and the increased expense to the general Government caused thereby. While I would censure no one for these failures, who have been connected with either of these expeditions, I feel that I would not be discharging my whole duty without expressing the opinion that the plan of these campaigns was on a much larger and more expensive scale than was necessary to accomplish the object, and was not organized on a basis to insure dispatch and thereby success. In connection with this subject I believe it to be due to Brigadier General Sully, who had command of the expedition up the Missouri River, to mention some of the obstacles which surrounded him in the execution of his part of the campaign. It is well known that in consequence of the unprecedented low stage of water in the Missouri River, the boats chartered to accompany the expedition, were delayed much beyond the expectation of the officers in command, and when they arrived at headquarters (Sioux City), were found to be almost useless for the purpose for which they were chartered. The failures to furnish animals for land transportation also caused much delay, and when they were finally furnished, many were in such a condition as to be entirely useless. The unprecedented drought, which destroyed the prairie grass, made it necessary for a much larger amount of land transportation than would have been necessary had the season been an average one. These obstacles, doubtless, prevented General Sully from moving his command in time to meet General Sibley, as was contemplated in the original design of the campaign.

After garrisoning the several military posts in the Indian country, and distributing at proper points along the frontier a sufficient force to protect the settlements, I am of the opinion that one full regiment of cavalry, well armed and provided with pack mules sufficient for their necessity, under the command of active, energetic and determined officers, who have no feeling but a desire to punish and thoroughly subdue these Indians, would accomplish all these ends in one campaign, and that a short one.

With all the vigilance exercised by our officers along the frontier (and I most cheerfully accord to them the exercise of this cardinal military virtue), the Indians have made frequent raids upon isolated settlers, have committed several most atrocious and cold-blooded massacres, stolen many horses and much other valuable property; and none engaged in these raids have, to my knowledge, been in the slightest degree punished. Why this is so, I am unable to say, but am irresistibly led to the conclusion that the system adopted is radically wrong. If so, and experience and results would seem to establish the position, then why not exchange it and try some other? Long and rapid marches must be performed; quick and heavy blows must be given; severe and ample punishment must be inflicted upon these Indians, to effect the object desired; and it is to be hoped that such a policy will in future be adopted by the Government as will speedily insure a lasting and permanent peace, and bring quiet and tranquility to our harassed citizens.

Two years and eight months have now elapsed since Congress saw fit to construct the machinery for putting into operation our territorial government; and on a change of administration which occurred only two days thereafter, and as soon as our own present excellent chief magistrate had fairly got the reins of Government in hand, our first governor, his excellency, William Jayne, was appointed, and very soon thereafter repaired to the post of official duty and proceeded to put the wheels of our territorial government in motion. The task was a most delicate, arduous and difficult one, and most faithfully was it accomplished. As an evidence of the favor with which our people have looked upon and appreciated this selection of the President, and as a just reward for constant courtesy, fairness and uniform kindness, and the impartial manner with which he discharged the trusts imposed upon him, our people, within a little more than fifteen months after his arrival in our territory, with great unanimity selected him to represent them at the national capital. He, by the choice of our citizens, thus becomes our second delegate in Congress. Important results have been anticipated by our citizens in connection with the selection, not only from the fact of his intimate personal relations with the President, his earnest, hearty and cordial sympathy and identity with the administration; his fidelity, patriotism and love of country, but also for his condemnation of rebels and rebel sympathizers wherever they are found.

I would call your attention to the importance and necessity of inaugurating a thorough and complete system of common schools in this territory, for the benefit of rising generations. Congress has, by its enactments, understanding well the importance to American citizens, set apart two sections of the public domain in our territory to every six miles square, as a basis on which to found a permanent and enduring school system, which if properly cared for, will in time enable us to establish a system of free schools, with such an endowment as will cause the burthens of such a system to fall lightly upon our citizens. The importance of having a common head in our school system, it appears to me must be patent to all. The plan adopted at your last session, of county superintendents, may be well so far as it goes; but it appears you have in this inaugurated just so many independent school systems as there are organized counties in the territory. Such a system must, in a short time, lead to almost inextricable confusion, the result of which will be to bring the whole plan into disrepute. Wise and judicious modes of education, patronized and supported, by communities, will draw together the children of all grades of society, among whom it makes no distinction. It will cultivate the natural genius, elevate the soul, excite laudable emulation to excel in knowledge and benevolence, and it will reward its benefactors by shedding its benign influence on the public mind and morals. Education inures men to thinking and reflecting, to reasoning and demonstrating, and enables them to discover the moral and religious duties they owe to God and their country. It leads our youth to the study of human nature, society, and universal history, and causes the mind to be interested in discovering truth, and will at least, induce a large majority to array themselves on the side of and in the defense of truth.

I would recommend such an amendment of our school law as will make these county superintendents amenable and subordinate to a territorial superintendent, who shall be elected by the people, who shall have the general supervision of our school system. It appears to me that our common school system will be very imperfect and ineffective until this is done. I deem it of the utmost importance in inaugurating a system of the magnitude that this will ultimately become in this territory to future generations, that we start on a firm, sure and perfect basis.

Our election law needs amending in many particulars. Its workings have demonstrated the necessity of more stringent provisions to prevent illegal voting; for the protection of the voters and ballot box at the polls, and for the protection and safety of the persons of the judges and clerks of election. It is desired by all that every actual bona fide resident of Dakota of lawful age, who is a citizen of the United States, and has resided the requisite time in this territory, shall have the privilege of voting unawed by any person or faction. While this is the feeling, it is at the same time important that every possible safeguard should be thrown around the ballot box to preserve its purity, in order that the actual wishes of our citizens may be arrived at, as expressed through that medium, and at the same time the law should be so guarded that no one, not actually entitled to exercise the right of suffrage, whether in the military service or not, shall be permitted to vote at any election in this territory without incurring such fines and penalties as shall deter all such persons from offering to vote. I would recommend a change in the time of holding our annual elections from the first Monday in September to the first Tuesday after the first Monday in October, in each year, and the enactment of a law making it a high crime for any person or persons, except the judges of election, or those whose duty it is made by law, to interfere in any manner with the ballot box or the ballots, and attach such fines and penalties in such case as will be likely to deter in future all efforts at interference by outsiders in such cases.

The subject of fostering and promoting immigration into our new territory is a matter of vital importance to our whole people, and cannot well be overestimated. The individual efforts of some of our citizens in this respect very justly deserve your attention and commendation, and should receive that encouragement at your hands that the importance of the subject would seem to indicate. The efforts made by Surveyor General Hill in this direction, though as yet attended with no very decided results, would seem to have laid the foundation for a large and flourishing settlement from the Empire State; and when made as in this instance, from an earnest desire to promote our growth and increase our material wealth and importance as a people, full credit and co-operation should be given him, as far as possible, on your part. I would recommend that you memorialize Congress for an allowance of $1,000, to be placed at the disposal of three commissioners of emigration, to be by them used in such manner as will be deemed most likely to secure the desired object. I have no doubt that this sum, judiciously expended, would accomplish results that would be entirely satisfactory to our citizens; even though it should be necessary to have this sum annually deducted from the appropriation by Congress for legislative purposes in our territory, and if necessary to secure it, I would recommend that you ask that this amount be deducted from year to year, to be so applied. With the view of securing the services of able and competent men, who will carefully guard this expenditure, and make it accomplish as much as possible, who can afford to serve gratuitously, would recommend that our chief justice, secretary and surveyor general constitute said commissioners.

The recent discoveries of rich deposits of gold in our neighboring territory, Idaho, have very justly attracted a large share of attention, not only in our own territory, but in all the northwestern states and territories, and the question of most importance among the numerous persons who have had their attention directed to this new Eldorado, and who are now desirous of making a pilgrimage thither, seems to be "how to get there" and "which way to go." But two routes have thus far been available to the numerous persons who have left our territory for this auriferous region. The shortest, most practicable and expeditious route at present is via the Missouri River, upon the stage of water as such, to about 100 to Fort Benton, by steamer, thence overland by teams or pack mules, to the gold fields. The other is by a long and tedious route, overland by way of Oregon, to Fort Kearney and Laraine, to Salt Lake City; thus traveling, in taking the longer route, over six hundred miles further than necessary to reach the desired point, provided an improved route was opened through our own territory, and protection afforded those who pursued visit the gold mines of Idaho. The importance of opening a direct route to those mines through our own territory, and turning the tide of emigration this way, cannot well be overestimated, either to the emigrant or to the interests of our people. To the emigrant as a means of shortening his long and tedious marches, by reducing the distance over six hundred miles, and by saving from three to four weeks' time; to our own citizens by affording to our farmers a ready market for all their surplus produce at their own doors, thus saving the necessity of cartage and necessary absence from the fields of their labor; and to our merchants and business men, from the increased demands made upon their stocks and business by the emigration flowing constantly past their doors, making it necessary for them to establish large and extensive depots of supplies in the way of mining implements, provisions, and other articles necessary to supply the wants of a people about to engage in such a business. The shortest, best and most practicable route to the gold fields of Idaho, from any of the northwestern states, is undoubtedly through the settled portion of our territory, to the mouth of the Niobrara River, or Fort Randall, from thence along the divide between the Niobrara and White rivers; thence under the base of the Black Hills, passing the sources of the Yellowstone to the Forks of the Missouri. I trust our delegate in Congress will, at an early day, urge the matter upon the attention of Congress in such a manner and with such force, as will secure an appropriation sufficient to open the route and secure protection to all who may desire to avail themselves of the shortest route to these mines. This matter is also of vast and vital importance in another point of view, from the fact that this route would pass through the very heart of the Indian country, and its effect, in my opinion, would be, in a very short time, to satisfy the Indians of the folly of their efforts to exterminate the whites, and would soon cause them to come forward, make treaties of peace, and at no very distant day, lead them to locate upon the reservations, and by judicious management cause them to abandon their present mode of life and turn their attention to agriculture and the arts, ultimately civilize them, and finally become, as they are undoubtedly capable of becoming, in the course of time, respected and esteemed citizens—no longer a terror to defenseless women and children, and a barrier to the advancement of settlement and civilization.

The subject of the location of the northern branch of the Union Pacific Railroad is justly attracting a large share of the attention of our citizens, and its importance to our people cannot well be overestimated when we take into consideration the very important fact, which is susceptible of positive demonstration, that the shortest and indeed only practicable route for this road, from Sioux City westward, is through our own territory along the Valley of the Missouri River, to the mouth of the Niobrara; thence up the valley of that stream to or near Fort Laramie; thence to the South Pass. The saving of distance in adopting this route cannot be less than one hundred and fifty miles, to say nothing of the difference in the cost of construction, which may be estimated at many millions of dollars, as in following the valleys of these streams a grade is already virtually established, timber and water in abundance is at hand to construct the road and supply it for years; while in the other case, in adopting the route contemplated in the bill as passed by Congress, the road would run for a long distance over the most hilly and broken country several hundred miles, entirely destitute of timber, and, I suppose, for a long distance of water also; with the additional expense to the company of maintaining and operating an extra one hundred and fifty miles of railroad of the importance of the one under consideration. It appears to me that it is only necessary to call the attention of members of Congress to this subject, to cause them at once to take such action as will secure to our people a fair participation in the benefits to be derived from the construction and operation of this road. I would recommend that you memorialize Congress on this subject, setting forth the advantages of adopting the line of route indicated, and praying Congress to authorize the Missouri and Niobrara Valley Railroad Company to construct a railroad and telegraph line from the Big Sioux River, near Sioux City, Iowa, by the most direct and feasible route to such point as will connect said railroad with the Union Pacific Railroad, in the direction of the South Pass of the Rocky Mountains, on the same terms as is provided for the construction of the Union Pacific Railroad, by act of Congress approved July 1st, 1862.

None of the public domain in our territory having as yet been brought into market by the general Government—a fact which happily accords with the present desire of our citizens, who all feel that in this matter the Government has consulted the best interests of our actual settlers—we have inaugurated no system of taxation, and as a consequence, have no means at hand of showing, by actual and reliable returns, the favorable condition of our citizens engaged in agriculture, manufacture, or the arts, or the large and important interests of our stock growers. While this will be a matter of pride and boast to our citizens, when compared with other sections of the country, taking into consideration our population, and the recent purchase and redemption of our territory from the Indians, we all feel that it would not be compensated for by placing the public lands in a position to be entered by speculators or non-residents, to be held for years at a largely enhanced price, to the great detriment of our territory and our actual bona fide settlers. We cannot but feel thankful to the Government for its liberality to us in this respect, particularly when we consider the enormous amount of money required, and the great relief that would be afforded by large sales of public domain. Here, free homes are offered by our beneficent Government to actual settlers, in a country unsurpassed in salubrity and purity of climate, and where whole townships and even counties, of vacant lands are found, as productive as the savannahs of the South. There are today thousands of men in the eastern and middle states that have constantly toiled from year to year for a subsistence for themselves and families, on a few acres of well worn rented land, and paying in many cases a price per acre for the use of such lands per annum, as would secure in our territory a homestead of 160 acres of as fine lands as the sun ever shone upon, every foot of which is susceptible of the highest state of cultivation, at less cost in labor than in any country to be found in the eastern or middle states. The small farmers in these states have only to see these lands and all the surrounding advantages to appreciate the liberality of the Government, and the great advantage of seeking a home in our territory, where but a few years of the same industry and economy practised by them in their eastern homes, from childhood, would be requisite to make all comparatively independent in a pecuniary point of view.

I transmit herewith the full and very able report of our territorial auditor, to whom much credit is due for the fidelity with which he has discharged his laborious and arduous duties. Incorporated in the report of the auditor is that of Hon. James Tufts, special commissioner by act of our last legislative assembly, approved January 9th, 1863, to pass upon claims of our citizens for military services under the proclamation of my predecessor, issued on the 30th day of August, 1862, calling out the "entire militia of the territory," for the protection of the lives and property of our citizens. With great promptness and unanimity our citizens responded to the call of the governor, remained in service and afforded ample and perfect protection until the immediate danger was over, and until relieved by a force of volunteers regularly mustered into the service of the United States. The best commentary on the faithfulness and fidelity of Commissioner Tufts in the discharge of his delicate duties is shown in the aggregate of these claims, which only amounts to $28,137.17, for two months' service of our militia, including rations, forage, transportation, etc. These figures can but compare favorably with claims of like character which have accrued in other territories under similar circumstances. I would renew the recommendation of my predecessor in his last annual message, that you memorialize Congress for an appropriation sufficient to refund to the territory all the expenses incurred by her in providing for the maintenance of the militia on the occasion referred to.

I transmit herewith the report of Adjt.-Gen. C. P. Booge, which shows the present status of military affairs in the territory so far as returns have been made to his office; but which, owing to the negligence of some of the company officers, and the imperfection of the law creating our militia system, are necessarily very imperfect and unsatisfactory in their details. In case injustice is done to individuals, it is caused by the negligence of the officers in not making proper returns to the adjutant general. The reforms recommended by General Booge are such as experience has shown to be necessary; and I hope you will provide an efficient law, and a suitable place to store the arms and property of the territory.

The subject of military protection is one in which all our citizens take a deep interest, and it is one of vital importance to us, as unless ample protection is afforded by the Government, we cannot expect our isolated settlements will flourish and expand. I am fully convinced that a line of military posts, extending from the Minnesota state line, across the southeastern portion of this territory, intersecting the Missouri River near the mouth of Crow Creek, under command of officers who will make themselves active in the discharge of their duties, will afford our settlers, and those of northwestern Iowa and southwestern Minnesota, better protection, at less cost to the Government, than can be afforded in any other way. Should the Government see fit to establish military posts at Lake Shetek, in Minnesota; at or near Sioux Falls; and at the crossing of Dakota River near the mouth of Flint Creek, in this territory; with proper energy and activity on the part of the troops at these several stations, I believe full, ample and perfect protection could be afforded to all the frontier settlers of Minnesota, Iowa and Dakota.

An unfortunate controversy has existed in two of our organized counties, from the time of their organization under the laws passed at the first session of the Legislature, to the present, and to all appearances is no nearer a satisfactory solution than when first inaugurated. This controversy has been a source of much anxiety and regret to our citizens generally and has had a most damaging and deleterious effect upon the prosperity and development of the counties wherein it exists; and what is more to be regretted, has been the cause of fostering and keeping alive an ill feeling among neighbors and those who would otherwise be warm personal friends. I hope in your wisdom, you will devise some means of settling and disposing of these unfortunate controversies, which shall have the merit of being strictly just to all the citizens of Bon Homme and Cole counties, and rely on time and strict justice to heal the unfortunate differences and ill feeling which now exists in those counties.

Hoping that your deliberations may be characterized by such courtesy, forbearance and justice as to give no ground of complaint on the part of any one, I solicit from you your counsel and hearty co-operation in all matters calculated to promote the well-being of Dakota. I deem it my duty, and it will be a pleasure to me to furnish you all the information within my reach, calculated to aid you in your deliberations, in arriving at just and equitable conclusions on all subjects, and I shall most cheerfully and heartily with you in all measures calculated to promote our growth and increase our material wealth and prosperity.

In conclusion allow me to express the hope that ere the return of the next annual meeting of the Legislature, we may, through the aid of Divine Providence, look upon a re-united, peaceful, happy and free country.

NEWTON EDMUNDS.

Neither Minnehaha County nor the Red River country were represented directly in the Legislature. Mr. Brookings, who represented Minnehaha during the first two sessions was now a citizen of Yankton and a representative from that county. Minnehaha County had been entirely abandoned owing to the Indian troubles and it had been attached to Clay County for legislative and judicial purposes.

Early in the session a bill was presented repealing the law creating the counties of Kittson, Chippewa, Cheyenne and Stevens in the Red River of the North and also repealing the law creating the seventh council and representative district, which gave these counties one councilman and two representatives. The repealing statutes were passed and became laws. The grounds upon which the Legislature acted are set forth in the report of the council committee appointed specially to consider and report on these measures. That committee reported as follows:

Your committee conclude that at the time the section of country comprised in the counties of Kitson, Chippewa, Cheyenne and Stevens, was erected into a council and representative district, the knowledge possessed by a majority of that Legislature regarding that section of the territory was largely speculative, and that but an imperfect and doubtful opinion existed respecting the rights belonging to persons residing in that country. An accommodating disposition prevailed among members of the Legislature and as all public matters regarding the territory were at that time taking preliminary degrees, each representative of a local interest was indulged, as near as could be, without that strict regard for justice and legality which time and mature reflection would suggest.

The fact that the counties above named were created on a domain to which the Indian title had not been extinguished, and consequently not under the executive or judicial jurisdiction of our local territorial courts and laws, is of sufficient importance to demand the repeal of the acts creating them. The fact that the representatives from that country, when residing there, are not amenable to the laws they themselves aid in enacting, is sufficient cause to justly deny them any participation in the enactment of such laws. They enjoy a total immunity from taxation, and are practically without the jurisdiction of the territory except so far as our federal courts may have jurisdiction.

Your committee furthermore believe that a very erroneous impression is entertained by the people of the territory residing on the ceded lands regarding the persons who make up the population of the counties above named. From information of an authentic character your committee are led to believe, that with the exception of a few licensed traders, and itinerant missionaries, and a custom house officer and his assistants at Pembina, the residents of that country are composed of Indians, half breeds, a few Canadian and Scotch farmers that had strayed across the boundary from the Selkirk Settlement in the British possessions, but were not naturalized citizens of the United States and who have removed back into their old homes in British America since the Indian war began in 1862.

Aside from these considerations your committee firmly believe that the general interests of that section will be best subserved by the passage of the bill under consideration; as it will serve to direct attention to the obstacles which prevent the occupation and settlement of that country by the white race and by the people of the United States, and will hasten action on the part of the general Government to secure the extinguishment of the Indian title to the soil, and the opening of the country, which is said to be rich in natural resources, to settlement and civilization. Your committee, therefore, recommend the early passage of the bill.

The bill was duly passed.

This session of the Legislative Assembly terminated on Friday, January 15, 1864. Its labors had been more in perfecting existing laws than in making new ones. Owing to the great preponderance of the "unconditional Union" members there was entire agreement on all political matters. Among the measures enacted was an entire new election law; a general common school law; changing the name of Cole County to Union; providing for the appointment, by the governor, of territorial auditor and treasurer as provided by the organic act; repealing the act creating the counties of Kittson, Stevens, Chippewa and Cheyenne, on the Red River, and also repealing the provision of law granting to that district representation in the Legislature; incorporating the Dakota historical association; incorporating the Minnesota and Dakota Railway Company; defining the boundaries of Buffalo County and attaching it to Charles Mix for judicial and election purposes; constituting Yankton and Jayne counties the Second Judicial District, and attaching to the district all the ceded lands in the territory not embraced in the other districts; a divorce law, creating Gregory County; making the librarian of the historical society custodian of the territorial library. (This library was a splendid collection valued at $5,000. The books were passed out during the sessions of the Legislature and in time the number of volumes had notably decreased and were never recovered.) A large number of memorials to Congress for appropriations to build bridges; establish mail routes; erect military posts; grant donations of land for building a State University at Vermillion; for a geological survey, and whatever could be suggested to aid the delegate in Congress in securing legislation and in obtaining departmental favors. A memorial for an appropriation to construct a capitol building was one that met with unanimous support, but it would seem that there were a number of Yankton citizens who would regret the success of such a measure as it would deprive them of a valuable asset which they were receiving for buildings rented by the Government, which included legislative halls, executive office, secretary's office, United States marshal's office, court rooms and surveyor general's office. A joint resolution was passed giving the returns of the election of 1862 for delegate to Congress, and strongly supporting the claims of ex-Governor Jayne to the delegateship.

At this session of the Legislature a law was enacted, approved January 9, 1863, appointing and authorizing a commissioner to audit the military accounts of the Territory of Dakota arising from the Indian troubles of 1862, and Hon. James Tufts was appointed by the law as such commissioner, and was directed to have such accounts audited and presented to the territorial auditor by the 18th day of March following. Hon. Justice Townsend was then territorial auditor, but having received an appointment as army surgeon he deputized Robert M. Hagaman as deputy who attended to the issuing of territorial warrants for all accounts audited by the commissioner. These accounts were for services rendered as members of the Dakota militia under the proclamation of the governor dated August 30, 1862, and for material and supplies furnished in constructing stockades and in forage for animals and rations for the troops. This report of the commissioner formed the principal feature of the first report of the territorial auditor, and is presumed to contain the names of every able bodied male person in the territory at that time capable of firing a gun, except those persons who had enlisted in Companies A and B, Dakota Cavalry, whose names are given at the time of their mustering into the service of the Federal Government.

FIRST ANNUAL REPORT OF TERRITORIAL AUDITOR

Auditor's Office, Yankton,
November 30th, 1863.

To the Honorable Council and House of Representatives

By the 53d chapter of the laws of 1862 and 1863 it is provided that all accounts and claims against the territory, which shall be by law directed to be paid out of the treasury of the territory, shall be presented to the auditor, who shall examine and adjust the same and shall issue bills or warrants, payable at the territorial treasury for the sums which shall be found due from the territory, specifying in its bill the date of its issue, and the name of the person to whom payable.

And also, that "the auditor shall annually make out an accurate statement of the receipts and disbursements of the treasury for the preceding year, ending on the last day of the month previous to the one during which the legislative assembly shall commence its annual sessions; also of the unexpended balance on any thereof, and shall report the same to each branch of the Legislative Assembly on the third day of its session, together with his remarks on the finances of the territory as he shall deem proper, for the consideration of the same."

the Legislative Assembly." In compliance with the foregoing provisions I have the honor to submit the following report, embracing, as far as practicable, the details required:

The total number of warrants issued up to the 30th day of November, 1863 (exclusive of military warrants), amount to $480.00, to wit:

No. 1, May 8, 1863, James Tufts	$120.00
No. 2, May 8, 1863, J. R. Hanson.....	120.00
No. 3, May 8, 1863, Wm. R. Goodfellow.....	44.00
No. 4, May 8, 1863, Wm. R. Goodfellow.....	196.00
Total	$480.00

All of which warrants are outstanding, and for the payment of the same there is no money in the treasury. The several acts creating and regulating the offices of territorial treasurer and territorial auditor, provide that the treasurer and auditor shall furnish for their respective offices suitable books, blanks, etc., neither of which requirements have been complied with for want of the necessary funds in the treasury, and for the same reason the auditor has not been able to furnish his office with a seal as required by law. The following estimate will indicate the probable amount of liabilities on the last day of December, 1864:

Present outstanding warrants	$480.00
Books and stationery for treasurer's office.....	20.00
Book blanks and stationery for auditor.....	25.00
Seal for auditor's office	10.00
Salary for treasurer from October 1, 1862.....	112.50
Salary for auditor from May 20, 1862.....	129.16
Total	$776.66

To meet these liabilities, I would recommend that an appropriation be made by the Legislature, and that a territorial tax be levied upon the real and personal property within the territory, and a tax of one dollar upon each male citizen of the territory. With a capitation tax as above suggested, a tax of five mills on the dollar on real and personal property, though light, would, in my judgment, raise sufficient revenue to meet the ordinary expenses of the territory. I hope you will take these suggestions under consideration, and act upon them as in your wisdom you may deem necessary and advisable.

JUSTUS TOWNSEND,
Territorial Auditor.

CHAPTER XXXI

IMMIGRATION FROM NEW YORK

1864

1864, IMMIGRATION—HARD TASK OF THE PIONEER FARMER—GENERAL HILL, A FRIEND OF DAKOTA—THE NEW YORK COLONY VISITED AND ADDRESSED BY GENERAL HILL AND DOCTOR BURLEIGH—ITS ORGANIZATION—SETTLES IN DAKOTA—ITS MEMBERSHIP AND WHERE THEY LOCATED—DAKOTA'S RIVALS IN THE IMMIGRATION FIELD—BEGINNING OF EMIGRATION TO THE SALMON RIVER GOLD FIELDS—THE MISSOURI RIVER ROUTE—A ST. LOUIS COMPANY OF CAPITALISTS.

During the winter of 1863-64, Governor Edmunds was in correspondence with the officers of the "Free Homestead Association" of Central New York, whose headquarters were at Syracuse, and the letters he received were of an encouraging nature. Another association was forming near Ypsilanti, Mich., for the purpose of bringing into the territory a numerous body of good citizens. These movements added greatly in disseminating a cheerful and hopeful disposition among the pioneers of Dakota, who were thoroughly united upon any proposition that looked to increasing the population of the territory, however they might differ regarding some other matters. It was conceded on every hand that the first great need of the territory was population. Without it all enterprise was little better than wasted. More producers and more consumers meant more of everything and prosperity for all. The new comer was always greeted with a welcome that was hearty and genuine, and made to feel that he was "one of us." Farmers enjoyed the "right of way" when it came to any preference in extending the hand of fellowship, and if they came with shallow purses and empty handed, as many did, and exhibited the qualities of industry and honesty, they obtained without much difficulty such reasonable assistance as served to place them on their feet and give them a fair start. Dakotians were generous in this feature of their policy, and all stood ready to extend the helping hand in worthy cases. Notwithstanding this friendly and helpful disposition, the farmer pioneer had serious obstacles to contend with. It is not a small task to make a home and construct a farm on the untamed pathless prairies, remote from neighbors, without roads or schools, or any of the advantages and comforts which the inhabitants of a compact settlement enjoy. It is a hero's and a martyr's life work, if it is well done. No one can properly estimate the trials and discomforts of such an experience except those who have passed through them, and can view it in after life from the standpoint of success; from a comfortable home, ample well filled barns, fruitful fields and orchards and beautiful groves, and pastures rich with their cattle, swine and horses, and merry children making the home life real. This is the reward that has come to thousands who began almost penniless, with the clouds of adversity hanging low and threatening in almost every direction, and it is from the lips of such men and women we can hear a story of home building, through danger, toil, privation, and suffering that in printed words would appear more like dream of fiction than a story of real life. This pioneer work of building a home would seem to be the most arduous and the most important and noblest that can engage the time and energies of man; and all these disagreeable features are intensified beyond estimate in the case of the pioneer of slender means.

In the early days of Dakota's settlement, and this it may truthfully be claimed, covered a period of eight or ten years, the question of the adaptability of the soil and climate to the successful production of grain and vegetables, was a theme frequently and seriously discussed. A great many good men sincerely believed that it was not so adapted. Drouth and grasshoppers were yearly visitors. The writer of these pages has heard the opinion expressed by men of fairly good judgment, who had engaged more or less in farming in the eastern states, that Dakota was not suitable for civilized people. That it was not designed for a farming country. That the Great Architect and Creator did not intend it for civilized people, but had made it for the Indians, and the buffalo, and that the whites were only flying in the face of the Almighty's great purpose, in wresting the country from them. As late in 1868-70 opinions of this kind were expressed by men who had then some experience here as well as elsewhere, and whose utterances were not made in the heat of excitement or discussion, but given as the verdict of careful study and painstaking investigation, that the climate of Dakota stood as a formidable and incurable barrier to the successful cultivation of the soil, and that all attempts to make a success of raising crops would prove disastrous failures. And we believe the truth will justify the statement that this view was not confined to a few eccentric people but was held by many of the level-headed element and possibly by a majority of all the people residents of the territory at that time.

Still there were those who would not admit this gloomy view of the situation and very prominent among them was Gen. George D. Hill, the surveyor general. General Hill was not an influential man among the people of the territory, because of peculiarities of disposition that served to dwarf, in the estimation of the people, abilities of a high order. Some unfortunate characteristics socially, affected his standing. He could not have mustered a corporal's guard of friends outside of his own employees and their loyalty was sometimes open to suspicion. Nevertheless he was a man of brains. He had an excellent mental equipment, and fortunately in his life's experience he had to do largely with agricultural affairs and very naturally was a close and ardent student of everything pertaining to soil and climate and crops. He thought deeper and sounder and safer of such matters than most men, and when he came to give his conclusions they were backed by such an array of substantial reasons, that they were not easily refutable. The general stood manfully for Dakota's natural advantages as a farming country, and advocated it on the platform and through leading newspapers, east, to which his position gave him access. Prior to his coming to Dakota he had been president of the State Agricultural Society of Michigan and had made some addresses before that body that had attracted wide attention because of their value to practical farmers. This gentleman became the foremost champion of the natural resources of the territory at that time when such championship was so much needed, and fortunately for the territory he was among the first men of the West to get information regarding the formation, in Central New York, of a society called the "Free Homestead Association," and he was prompt in getting into communication with its officers, and directing their attention to Dakota. Subsequently he visited the association and made an address to its members and did not hesitate to recommend Dakota as the most inviting section of the West to a people in pursuit of the benefits which the Free Homestead Association had organized for the purpose of securing. The fertility of the soil of Dakota was not questioned, it was the lack of rainfall that was the most serious impediment, and the frequent occurrence of late frosts in the spring and early ones in the fall. General Hill's position was that the cultivation of the soil would bring an increase of moisture, the climate would become modified, and the late spring and late summer frosts would disappear under the more favorable climatic influence. His views have been abundantly vindicated in the school of practical experience. He urged the early planting of groves as an additional means of attracting moisture, and this has also proved a wonderful aid in the modification of the climate, favorable to agricultural pursuits.

The enactment of the homestead law by Congress in the year of 1862 awakened a sentiment throughout the United States favorable to the occupation of the public lands. The terms of the law appealed to the poor man and the comparatively poor throughout the country, because its provisions were so liberal as to make the obtaining of a large tract of fertile soil within the reach of all who were otherwise eligible to partake of its benefits. Uncle Sam was rich enough to give all of his children a farm.

As the wise provisions of this beneficent measure became known to the people of the country, movements were set on foot at different places to organize colonies and emigrate in large bodies to the new sections of the West, wherever soil, climate and natural advantages generally, offered the most favorable inducements. Such a colony was formed at Syracuse, New York, during the year 1863, called the "Free Homestead Association," with a numerous membership of parties who had accumulated each one, a small store of wealth, so the colony was in shape to remove with comfort and to begin their work of home building wherever they might locate in the New West, under comparatively favorable circumstances. The membership, counting only heads of families and single persons not members of any of the families was over one hundred. Counting the women and children there were nearly five hundred.

The secretary of this organization, and one of the principal working forces was Prof. James S. Foster, a Syracuse gentleman, who had for years been engaged in educational work in Central New York. The association, through correspondence, became acquainted with representative immigration agents and state officials in all the free land states of the West, and being so numerous a body and such a desirable class of people, these representatives of the New West were all anxious to secure them as citizens of their respective states and territories, and a result of this correspondence was that each of these western committees sent an agent to Syracuse during the fall and winter of 1863-4 for the purpose of laying before the association the advantages of their respective localities, and to impart such other information as would assist the association in determining where to settle. Dakota had no emigration bureau or official whose duties were connected with works of this character but the surveyor general of the territory, General Hill, had learned of the purpose of the association and had put himself in communication with its secretary, and was given a place on the list of states and territories which the colonists would consider before determining upon their destination or location. The general was notified during the early winter of 1863-4 that the "Free Homestead Association" would hold a meeting on the 16th of January, 1864, for the purpose of hearing what he had to present regarding the advantages offered by Dakota to home seekers. The general was punctual in keeping the appointment and was regarded by a full attendance of the enrolled members and a large number who were then on the anxious seat. His address was one of the best the association had heard and created a sentiment very favorable to Dakota.

Maj. W. A. Burleigh, the agent of the Yankton Indians at this time, had also learned of this "Free Homestead Association" and took occasion to stop off at Syracuse while on one of his visits to Washington, in December, 1863, at which time the association held a meeting and listened to what they pronounced one of the best speeches they had ever listened to from the lips of the versatile and eloquent agent. Doctor Burleigh had become thoroughly imbued with the opinion that Dakota was one of the most promising agricultural sections on the face of the earth and there was magnetism in his voice when he made an address on that theme. Having obtained all the information it was practical to obtain by this method, the association, in furtherance of the same object, sent a delegation of its members to visit and inspect certain localities in Kansas, Iowa, Nebraska, Dakota and Minnesota, it having been definitely decided that the colony would make its selection from one of these states or from Dakota. Wisconsin and Illinois had been on the list but were now crossed off as not offering the special inducement of a large and compact body of lands sufficient to afford a homestead claim to every member, this being a matter of prime importance as the association had, as a leading feature of its plan, the founding of a village of its own in connection with its farming community surrounding it, where it could profit by the trade of its members through mercantile establishments and various industries set up by its members, who in addition to being farmers embraced nearly every ordinary business trade and profession. The usefulness of the church was also recognized and an able clergyman of the orthodox faith was among the colony's members. It will be readily admitted, now that we are acquainted with the full scope of the plan of this association, not only that it was a very desirable acquisition to any state or territory, but that no other section of the West could excel Dakota in furnishing the compact body of fertile lands surrounding points that promised, as the country developed, to become the centers of trade and industry. The embassy of experience and wise heads sent West on its errand of investigation performed its duty as thoroughly as circumstances would permit and returning home gave its report in favor of Dakota, and of Yankton as the best point for a temporary settlement until its further plans could be intelligently executed. The names of these ambassadors were James S. Foster and Ross Brown.

Their report was satisfactory and the members of the association now set about closing up their affairs and preparing for the grand movement westward.

To the West, to the West, to the land of the free,
Where the mighty Missouri rolls down to the sea.
Where a man is a man if he's willing to toil
And the humblest may gather the fruits of the soil.

This colony was the first organization in the United States to emigrate to the new Territory of Dakota. Their association was the result of an intelligent plan on the part of several enterprising and ambitious men to get away from the overcrowded East where the farming lands were too high in price for the man of ordinary means or with an ordinary income from the average trade or profession to think of owning a farm. The work they were engaged in, and the removal they contemplated, was based on the most commendable motives and endorsed by the highest wisdom and judgment and soundest practice of mankind, a work that must forever have the hearty approval of their conscience regardless of the fate which came to the individuals who made up the membership of the colony.

This association had an executive committee to which was finally assigned the duty of attending to all matters connected with the transportation of so large a number of people. This committee was made up of James S. Foster, W. H. Fowler, Chas. Van Epps, R. E. Fairchild and Grove Buell. Each member of the colony over fourteen years of age was required to make a deposit of $25 with the committee as an evidence of good faith and permit the committee to go forward and complete its arrangements for the trip, which contemplated such a program that there would be no hitch or disagreement from the time of departure to the time of reaching their destination, which was at Yankton, Dakota Territory. The route agreed upon was by special train from Syracuse to St. Joseph, Missouri, via Buffalo, Chicago, and Hannibal to St. Joseph, thence by steamboat to Yankton. By this route a through ticket cost $31, which included board on the steamboat from St. Joseph to Yankton, full fare being charged for all emigrants above fourteen years of age, half fare for all aged from five years to fourteen, and under five years, free. This was the route favored by the committee, but because some of the colonists wished to have the discretion of going by a different route, what was termed an all-land route, the committee recommended that they leave the main body at Chicago and proceed to Marshalltown, Iowa, by rail, which was as far west as the railroads had penetrated at that day. At Marshalltown these emigrants were to purchase such equipment as was necessary and proceed to Yankton in true emigrant style, sheltered by the canvas-covered prairie schooner, propelled by mule, horse or ox-power, and camping where night overtook them in some of the romantic valleys of the Hawkeye State near the margin of its crystal streams.

Affairs progressed favorably with the Free Homestead Association, and about the 5th of April, 1864, its members boarded a special train at Syracuse, New York, and most of them bade a final farewell to the homes and friends and scenes they had known from infancy, to make new homes and new friends and new scenes in a land as new and untried as the land they were leaving was a century earlier. The trip West was uneventful; fortunately no accident marred the pleasure of the journey which possessed enough of novelty to awaken and hold their interest. As fate would have it the entire colony abandoned the "main body" and the steamboat transportation before reaching Chicago, possibly fearing sea-sickness which envious railroad men had informed them always afflicted those who ventured for the first time upon the boisterous, billowy Missouri, and elected to take the route via Marshalltown, thence across the plains to Yankton, a potent argument in favor of this route being that they would be able to purchase needed cattle and draft animals and wagons and many other articles necessary in founding their new homes to better advantage at the end of the railway than they could hope to do in the thinly populated territory to which they were going. This change of the route had one result not anticipated when it was decided upon, for it destroyed the unity of the colony to a material extent, as will be seen.

The colonists had their purchasing done and their overland outfits ready for the road on the 10th day of May, and nearly all got away from Marshalltown on that day. They kept together as well as it was practical so to do, until they entered Dakota at Pacquette's Ferry, and here some of the colonists separated from the main body and went up the Sioux. These settled on Brule Creek and above in a charming country; still others left the colony in Clay County and took claims. C. N. Taylor founded Lincoln, which became a stage station and is now Meckling on the C. M. & St. P. R. R. The majority of them, however, came through to Yankton and settled in and around the village, some going on to Bon Homme County, where they took up claims. Whether by chance or design, they did not proceed to carry out their original plan of settling in a compact body and building their own village, but went to work independently, securing claims as a rule, but a number took up their residence in the town and remained citizens. As it turned out, nearly every portion of the Dakota settlements then existing received an acquisition from this first colony, composed as it was of a superior class of people, intelligent, industrious, honest, law abiding and enterprising.

As this was the first colony of Americans to emigrate to Dakota—the pioneer colony—it is deemed historically important that their names be preserved upon the historic page that they may be known to succeeding generations, their pioneer labors appreciated, and be honored by their descendants, who are already quite numerous in South Dakota.

The appended list may be relied upon as correct. It was prepared by a daughter of the late James S. Foster, who was the leader of the colony. This lady was one of the younger children of the colony in 1864, and is now Mrs. O. H. Carney, of Yankton. She has possession of her father's records, and therefore is equipped to furnish reliable and accurate information regarding that important event in Dakota's early history. Added to the list is a brief notice of the death or present home of the old colonists and their descendants.

The success which had attended the efforts of Yankton to secure immigration, as attested by the coming hither of the New York colony, created quite a little envious comment among the people and by the newspapers in the sparsely settled portions of Iowa and Nebraska.

Every western community of any note was striving to secure an increase in population. Dakota's success was made the subject of a leading article in the Omaha Republican, the leading Nebraska journal in 1864. The Republican, designing only to arouse the Nebraskans from an apathetic condition, told the story of the coming to Yankton of "eight hundred to one thousand population at one time," and added:

Yankton is about one hundred and twenty miles due north of this place, and 180 miles distant by the usually traveled route. It is out of the line of travel, with no particular commercial, agricultural or stock growing advantages. Yet we have the foregoing testimony in regard to what that people have accomplished. It is no sense to blink the fact, and we refer to it not out of a spirit of jealousy, but to induce our leading men to turn their attention a little more in the direction indicated.

Dakota's growth during the earlier years of its occupation and settlement by the whites was extremely moderate, but this was not due to neglect or apathy, or want of enterprise on the part of Dakotans, but rather to the force of uncontrollable circumstances that frequently thwarted the most earnest and liberal efforts, made apparently in accord with the most practical methods. Dakota might have successfully competed against ordinary rivals in the matter of getting settling population, but the great Union Pacific Railroad corporation with its empire of lands granted by the Government and with millions of money, was an opponent too formidable for Dakota's available resources. That gigantic and enterprising corporation carefully searched this country over to secure people for its lands, and then crossed the seas and sifted Europe of its youth and enterprise and transplanted it to the fertile plains of Nebraska. Other less powerful corporations worked in the same direction. In addition to these efforts of the land grant railroads, the great states of Iowa and Minnesota were only meagerly settled, and the homeseeker from the eastern states, even when headed for Dakota, was obliged to resist the attractions and advantages that everywhere invited his attention while passing through these commonwealths, and was also beset by tempting opportunities presented by the people and by immigration agents who were working to obtain settlers for their vacant acres. In this way Dakota's immigration was retarded and the territory received but a handful of the hundreds and thousands whose interest in the advantages of the West had been first awakened through the efforts of Dakota's agents. And as a rule the newcomer to Dakota who had resisted the temptations and blandishments presented by the citizens of neighboring states, and finally reached the territory, would have an entertaining story to tell of the methods employed by Dakota's eastern neighbors to dissuade immigration to the territory. The information was given that Dakota was no place for a white man; nothing fit for the subsistence of civilized people could be grown on the arid plains of the territory. It was a land of perpetual drought in summer, and awful blizzards six months in the year. If a farmer was lucky enough to get the promise of a crop the grasshoppers were sure to devour it before harvest; even the potatoes were not safe from the ravages of the ravenous and gluttonous insect who would dig into the ground and consume the tubers. Indians always formed a part of these stories. They were constantly brandishing their tomahawks and scalping the people. Nearly all the dead people in the territory would be found minus their scalp lock. The early settlers of Sioux City were given sometimes to halt a party of immigrants headed for Dakota and in a half confidential tone and manner impart the information that the great American desert would be found just west of "Jim" River; and the immigrant was advised to keep his head shaved.

It will be observed that even at that early day Dakota was becoming somewhat celebrated for push and enterprise. It was setting the pace for western communities that have since outstripped her in the race for population, not, however, because of Dakota's failure to do her whole duty, but due largely to the earlier development of the western railway systems which, at times, has proved inimical to the interests of this section of the Northwest.

IMMIGRATION TO MONTANA GOLD FIELDS

The Missouri River Route

The year 1862 witnessed the beginning of emigration to the newly discovered gold fields of the Northwest, on the headwaters of the Missouri and Columbia rivers. The first steamboats to enter this trade by carrying passengers and miners' supplies by way of the Missouri River came up from St. Louis early in May. Among them were the Shreveport, Key West, Spread Eagle, Emilie and Florence. They were fairly crowded with gold seekers, bound for what was known as the Salmon River diggings which at that time were the center of the mining excitement. These placers were reported to be immensely rich, and old Californians were said to be going in there by hundreds. Discoveries had also been made on a spur of the Bitter Root Mountains about twenty miles from Salmon River, and were reported, in richness, equal to the best placers discovered in California. The reports received were authentic, coming in letters that were vouched for by excellent authority. It was claimed that four men with a rocker were taking out twenty-seven ounces of gold per day, and that the diggings generally were paying from $15 to $100 a day to the men. Laborers were difficult to secure and would listen to no offer of less than an ounce of gold per day. Ordinarily this gold would have been worth from $14 to $17 an ounce; but owing to the increased price of nearly all commodities consequent upon the Civil war, the yellow metal, which was also a commodity, was selling for nearly double ordinary prices, and during the war became of still higher value. These Salmon River discoveries were among the first in the Northwest and were located on the Pacific side of the mountains, but it was quite apparent that the best route for the emigrant on this side of the Rockies was by way of the Missouri River. Dakota people, aware of this decided advantage, put forth their best efforts during this year and for several years following to direct attention to the route, and up to the time when the Union Pacific Railway reached Western Nebraska, the Missouri steamboat interests reaped a golden harvest from this business, and Dakota's trade was also benefited.

Just about this time, June 1, 1862, the Steamboat Emilie reached Yankton from St. Louis having on board a party of explorers and prospectors who represented a St. Louis company, backed with a paid up capital of $100,000, organized to promote traffic by the Missouri route. This party intended to establish trading points in the upper country contiguous to the mines and gather information regarding the overland route after leaving the upper river at or near Fort Benton. Another large body of emigrants rendezvoused at Fort Abercrombie on the headwaters of the Red River about the same time and went overland under a military escort. From this time forward for three or four years, the excitement over these and other discoveries spread throughout the country, and but for the war it is probable that hundreds of thousands of emigrants would have gone in to the gold region during the three or four years following by the Missouri gateway. Notwithstanding the war, however, the public mind was greatly exercised regarding the new gold fields, and the freight and passenger traffic of the Missouri grew rapidly, employing from thirty to fifty steamboats in 1863, 1864, 1865 and 1866.

During the autumn season great fleets of mackinaws came down the river from Fort Benton bringing hundreds of returning miners carrying in their buckskin sacks small fortunes in golden nuggets. The steamer Spread Eagle was the first boat down in 1862, arriving early in July, having made the trip to Benton. Her passengers stated that flour was selling for $1 a pound in the mines. The boat's safe contained a large amount of gold, belonging to one of her passengers. There were not to exceed a dozen of the latter on the boat, and all were going after merchandise for the mines and felt confident of being able to get the Spread Eagle to make another trip before the river fell. These passengers expected to bring enough goods to give the boat all she would be willing to carry. They reported new discoveries of almost fabulous richness on this side of the mountains, and said the Californians were pouring into the country at the rate of hundreds a day.

A great deal of interest had been aroused in the settlements of Dakota in favor of opening an overland route to the new Idaho gold mines. It was claimed that this route was 500 miles shorter than any other that could be selected, and furnished an abundance of wood, water and grass, at frequent intervals, for the use of emigrants. A public meeting was held at Yankton on the 20th of February, 1864, for the purpose of devising a plan for laying this important fact before the public for the purpose of inducing emigration this way, making Dakota towns the outfitting points; the route lying along the Missouri and Niobrara valleys, thence west up the Niobrara and Kcha Paha. Parties who had been in Idaho and were somewhat familiar with the route question were present and Capt. C. M. Davy, of Minnesota, made a strong appeal in favor of the Yankton route. This gentleman was somewhat familiar with the country to be traversed, having recently returned from Idaho by way of the proposed highway. The outcome of this meeting was the appointment of a committee to collect and publish such facts bearing upon the route as the committee should be able to gather. The committee consisted of D. T. Bramble, G. W. Kingsbury, Enos Stutsman, W. T.

Lyman, Maj. Charles E. Galpin, J. Shaw Gregory, A. W. Puett, W. W. Brookings, Mahlon Gore, Joel A. Potter, J. R. Hanson, Capt. Wm. Tripp, M. K. Armstrong, H. C. Ash, C. C. P. Meyers, Geo. P. Waldron and Byron M. Smith, the last named being made corresponding secretary, and requested to furnish a list of articles needed by the parties contemplating the journey to the mines.

Following out the purpose of the meeting, the committee secured a great deal of information, and issued a circular to the public defining the route from Sioux City via Yankton to a point opposite the old Village of Niobrara, which occupied a site on the Missouri River two miles south of the mouth of the Niobrara River. Crossing the Missouri, the route took up the Niobrara ninety miles, then crossed that river to the north and struck almost due west to a point where the Fort Laramie road intersects the Niobrara Valley, distant about two hundred and fifty miles and in the vicinity of the Black Hills; thence a very good route was laid down to the gold fields, with wood, water and grass quite abundant, and danger from unfriendly Indian tribes reduced to a minimum. A fine map of the route was also prepared to accompany the circular. The distance from Yankton to Bannock, Idaho, was placed at 960 miles. A table of distances covering the principal points on the route was published, to show how thoroughly and reliably the pioneers who were striving to open up this route had performed their duty. Through the efforts of Dakota's delegate in Congress, who at that time was Gov. William Jayne, an appropriation of $10,000 was made by Congress for the protection of emigrants going by the Southern Dakota route.

The efforts put forth by the Dakotans awakened considerable interest throughout the country in the gold regions of the Northwest, and there could be no question at that time that the Missouri and Niobrara route was by far the shortest and best for all emigrants east of the Missouri. The only serious drawback was the danger from Indians. This was a constant menace to all overland travel west of the Missouri and emigrants were cautioned regarding it, and advised to go in large parties and employ experienced men and scouts to accompany their march. Yankton drew a large number of people during the late winter and spring of 1864, who were anxious to go through, and came prepared with wagons, tents and camping outfits. A hundred and possibly more of these emigrants' tents were scattered over the townsite, while the hotels were crowded.

It was during this period that the Black Hills began to be talked about as a gold bearing section, and there were old mountaineers in the territory, and a few Indians and half-breeds, who claimed that the hills were richer in gold than Idaho. Some of these parties displayed small nuggets which they stated came from the Black Hills gulches, and were found by the Indians on their fishing and hunting excursions.

The increasing travel from the eastern states to these gold mines of the Northwest had directed the attention of moneyed business men to the necessity of trading points, ferry privileges and general accommodations for the traveling public at important points along the overland and steamboat route. One such point, highly commended, was at the mouth of the Yellowstone River. Here Captain Davey had crossed the Missouri with his first expedition from Minnesota; and here the two great Mackinaw water routes converged leading to and from the gold fields, one down the Missouri and the other along the Yellowstone. Already the Legislature of Dakota had granted a ferry privilege at this point to a number of Dakotans, and in the month of July the following townsite notice was issued:

To all whom this may concern:—

We, the undersigned do hereby claim all the lands and grounds being in these described limits, to-wit:—Commencing at the confluence of the Missouri and Yellowstone Rivers, and extending from said points three miles in a westerly direction or course. The whole to include nine square miles. We claim the said lands and grounds including all meandering of said rivers, for the purpose of a townsite, and for building, erecting and surveying a town thereon to be called and known as Oraopolis. We also claim all ferry rights, titles and privileges on the Yellowstone River and on the Missouri River for fifty miles up and down on all and both sides of said rivers for the aforesaid purposes. All of which a charter has been applied for.

John Howe, president, St. Louis, Mo.; James Stewart, vice president, Virginia City, Idaho Ter.; Samuel Hauser, secretary, Virginia City, Idaho; John J. Roe, St. Louis, Mo.; Jobe Townsend, Oraopolis, Dakota Ter., agent for the Oraopolis Town Company; John Fufts, Virginia City, Idaho; Thomas Townsend, St. Louis, Mo.; W. B. Dance, Virginia City, Idaho.

Given under my hand this 17th day of June, A. D. 1864, at Fort Union, Dakota Ter.

CHAPTER XXXII

THE GRASSHOPPER PLAGUE

GRASSHOPPERS—INDIANS AND INSECTS FOE TO IMMIGRATION—A GRASSHOPPER RAID—GENERAL SULLY'S GRASSHOPPER EXPERIENCE—NATIONAL GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATES—OFF YEARS—HOW THE FARMER FOUGHT THEM—LIEUTENANT WARREN'S STATEMENT—EIGHT HUNDRED AND FORTY-NINE WINNEBAGOES SENT TO NEBRASKA—THE OLD SETTLERS' HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION, AND THE HISTORICAL SOCIETY OF DAKOTA.

There was considerable uneasiness during the summer of 1864 in the farming settlements regarding Indians; but what was fifty-fold more hurtful to the general welfare and prosperity of the territory, was the first grasshopper raid experienced by the white settlers. It occurred in July just after the New York colony had got fairly settled in comfortable quarters; and while it was the first it was the worst and most complete scourge of the kind that ever visited the territory. It was a most unfortunate disaster coming at the time it did. The insects came down at midday while the bright warm sun was shining; the few fields gave promise of a moderate harvest and the gardens were in fair condition, producing a variety of summer vegetables—but all were covered literally by the myriads of these ferocious insects who devoured and destroyed every green thing, even the leaves on the trees, the grass on the prairie, the family washing hanging in the open air, and injured many of the tents in which the new arrivals had their temporary homes. The insects remained all night and departed the next morning as abruptly as they came. Several of the newcomers and some of the members of the New York colony became so affected and discouraged at the frightful damage inflicted that they yoked up their cattle and left the territory intending to settle in Iowa. Great temporary injury was done to the settlements by this calamity—for such it was—and immigration received a decided check from which it did not recover for years, though this lasting injury was due to subsequent visitations, of less harmful proportions comparatively, but sufficient to frighten away the great body of homeseekers. Iowa newspapers and other eastern journals took particular pains to herald this wonderful phenomenon to the world, claiming in many statements that it was an annual occurrence here and an inseparable objection to Dakota as a farming country.

Those who abandoned the territory at this time, many of them, gave out, while passing through the settlements east, a most pitiful story of the perils they had encountered and the privations they had endured, and these stories were seized upon by the newspapers and under the caption "Another Survivor of Plague Stricken Dakota Reaches Gophertown" and then would follow a string of exaggerations concerning Indians, drouth, grasshoppers, frequently embellished with an awful blizzard story that the narrator had received from a "poor old Dakota cripple who had lost both legs and an arm" during one of these winter storms. Dakotans felt very indignant at all this and exceedingly despondent. They were not, however, prepared to make any defense or explanation, for the grasshopper invasion was as novel and as great a surprise to the early settler as to the one who had just arrived. There had never been anything of the kind since the whites came into the country, and the Indians, when questioned about the matter, failed to throw any light thereon.

A history of Dakota Territory would lack completeness if no mention was made of the grasshopper, not that the territory has been on more familiar terms with that notorious insect than many sections in the many states of our Union, but their unwelcome visits here were at a period when Dakota was seeking public favor and people to occupy its vacant lands, and were of such a character, such a multitude of characters, continuing through so many years, as to entitle their visitations to mention among the historic events which have marked the progress of the territory by retarding it possibly more than all other causes combined. It was during the warm summer of 1864 that the early Dakotans first made the acquaintance of this scourge, at a time when the territory greatly needed more people and when the settlers here were putting forth extraordinary exertions to secure immigration. The early planting and growing season had been injuriously affected by a prolonged dry spell, and the cultivated fields reflected this injury in the stunted character and premature ripening of useful vegetation. The grasshoppers came in upon the settlers unheralded and unexpected and in a few brief hours literally devoured and destroyed every form of growing vegetation excepting the prairie grass and this was noticeably diminished. Their coming and the destruction that followed struck terror to the hearts of scores of our people and many of the newcomers of that year summarily threw up everything, gathered their households and household effects together and left the territory, breathing maledictions both loud and deep upon who ever had been responsible for influencing them to come here. These parties spread the story of the grasshopper raid far and wide, the newspapers took it up, and for a time it seemed that this calamity overshadowed in interest the great Civil war which was then raging between our Government and its rebellious citizens. This was the beginning of the grasshopper affliction which continued to impoverish and harass our settlers more or less for the succeeding ten years.

Dakotans became somewhat acquainted with the movements and habits of the insect as time passed, and during the season of spring the grasshopper would form a staple topic of conversation, and the question of its coming would be discussed with the gravest anxiety. At first there would be unpleasant suggestions of grasshoppers in the air, still it might have been only the downy seed bed of the cottonwood, which passing over at a high altitude were not infrequently mistaken for the flying grasshopper. To a person who has not beheld the novel spectacle of a grasshopper cloud moving through the upper air on a sunny day, this similarity between the cottonwood seeds and grasshoppers may need some explanation, and Dakotans can furnish this, for scores of our early settlers will tell of standing for a good fraction of an hour with their necks craned at an angle of nearly ninety degrees and their vision directed as near to the sun as the glare of that orb would permit, endeavoring to make out whether the mass of tiny specks a thousand feet above were living insects or merely the harmless cottonwood seed. It was no uncommon sight to see such people in little groups making this investigation for an hour at a time, and even then turn away with the problem unsolved.

It will be thought that if they were grasshoppers they would alight but this fortunately might not occur. Early Dakotans will testify that they have witnessed the passage of a stream of grasshoppers through the upper air that occupied an hour or two in the passing, and maintaining a steady flight eastward, turning neither to the right nor to the left, nor downward, and some days after these observers would learn through the papers of a destructive Dakota grasshopper visitation a hundred miles away, which would disclose where this great stream of insects settled to the earth and feasted after a long fast and wearisome journey. The grasshopper scourge that infested and kept Dakota and other portions of the West largely impoverished for ten or twelve years from 1864 was not thing peculiar. It was a tremendous calamity, but it was no more a Dakota scourge than it was an Iowa scourge or a Minnesota, Illinois and Indiana scourge, and in fact this might be carried as far east as the Alleghenies, for the pest sorely chastened the farmers in the fertile valleys of Pennsylvania.

To such an extent did this infliction grow that the United States Government sent out an expert commission from Washington to investigate the insect and discover if possible its origin and its habits, and from the report of that commission we have considerable information and much more from actual contact. Though known popularly as the grasshopper it was a very different and far more formidable foe than any grasshoppers the western people had ever known in their eastern abodes. In appearance it resembled the old-fashioned eastern hopper very closely, but aside from this resemblance it differed materially. By many the insect came to be known as the seventeen year locust. It differed from the ordinary grasshopper in its structure which was fitted for flying for as long distances as the wild fowls cover during a flying spell. Its frame was large and hard and though very light was also very tough. They could hop or jump, but flying was their forte, and the flutter of their large amber wings faintly seen in the air near the bright sun gave them the appearance of a mass of cottonwood down, and unless an occasional hopper broke away from the great stream and settled, while one were gazing, which not infrequently occurred, there was no certain method of detecting them. Even in color the difference did not seem to have been detected, but there was a distinguishable difference, the grasshopper being a shade darker, with its wings outstretched. To witness, with your mind's eye, a myriad of these pests alight, presuming you have never looked upon such an invasion with your physical eye, it is best to imagine a quiet heavy snowfall in midsummer, the flakes as large as a 25-cent piece, completely filling the air, and covering the earth as rapidly and completely as a heavy snowfall will do in winter. Just imagine these flakes falling for an hour and then the earth a mass of life, crowding upon everything out of doors and indoors if permitted to enter, covering the bushes and trees and the grass, the fences and the walls of buildings so completely as to effectually conceal them from view and in as brief time as it is required to tell it, stripping the tree of its foliage and devouring the grass and gardens. If there is one plant more than another that they have a special fondness for it is growing corn, which they attack with much spirit and only leave it when they have cut away and devoured all but the naked stalks. Then woe to the careful and cleanly housewife who has left her household linen on the clotheslines or a fine garment out to air. The pest has a peculiar relish for dainties of this kind and we will go farther and quote briefly from one report made by Brig. Gen. Alfred Sully who led several expeditions through Dakota against the hostile Indians during the '60s. Sully was camped between the Missouri and the Yellowstone. In his report he says:

The only thing spoken about here is the grasshopper. They are awful. They actually have eaten holes in my wagon covers and in the tarpaulins that cover my stores. A soldier on his way here laid down to sleep on the prairie in the middle of the day—the troop had been marching all night. His comrades noticed him covered with grasshoppers and awakened him. His throat and wrist were bleeding from the bites of these insects. This is no fiction. Last year, about five days' march from the Yellowstone, we met the army of grasshoppers on their way east. After that I suffered greatly for grass and many of my animals died. The grasshoppers made a general cleaning down to this place and then disappeared.

There would be the sincerest gratitude in every heart when the invaders after their feast and a night's rest would receive flying orders. Some intelligence directed the time of departing and when the signal was given they would rise into the air and fly off eastward—always taking that direction. In a very brief time they would have disappeared and the people would venture forth from their domiciles almost as timidly as they would had Indians been besieging them, to view the havoc and ruin presented in garden and field, and to thank their Maker that the plague had been stayed, and the pest had departed. The parent pest surely had departed, but had left a legacy in an unborn progeny, that would cover the land with gloom when the eggs deposited in the soil were hatched out in the coming spring, and so it came to pass that when the spring opened and the reviving sun warmed up the earth, myriads of tiny hoppers sprang from the ground, hungry as goats, with an insatiable hunger and devoured all vegetation that came in their way. The first attack was on the young wheat and oats as it came up and upon this fodder they thrived and fattened and grew, and the farmer looked on and wrung his hands and said little that we care to repeat. Suffice it that this scourge was fully as hurtful as the former would be, the second generation remaining and gormandizing for two months at least, or until their wings had grown. Wheat and oats and the grass would be greatly damaged and largely destroyed, but later crops would escape.

As soon as the insect had acquired its wings there would come an hour when the myriads would rise into the air and strike off in an easterly direction, following the path of their predecessors.

When on their flight or alighting they might be compared to a great river flowing rapidly, so close together that the sun does not penetrate through the mass, which casts a shadow on the earth similar to that when a cloud obscures it. It was by a mere chance that a small party of Sunday afternoon ramblers were strolling past the suburban premises of Col. G. C. Moody in the '60s. His place is that which a few years later became the home of the late W. B. Valentine and family on the northwestern border of Yankton. Mr. Moody had a 40-acre field of corn, well advanced and promising, the ears beginning to form. A grasshopper raid had invaded the field several minutes before this party reached it, and the living river was pouring into the field and literally covering the corn when the ramblers came upon the scene. The stream stretched away to the south and west as far as one could see in either direction, and the flutter of their wings with the passing of such a host through the air, created a roaring noise that was almost deafening for the time being. Not a ten-thousandth part of the stream had alighted in that field but passed beyond and covered other fields and the face of the country for many miles. They set immediately to work upon Moody's field, devouring the tender leaves and new-formed ears and never ceased their feast until the stalk was as bare as a tent pole.

Colonel Moody and his family stood by and witnessed the complete destruction of his season's labor, which occupied less time than one hour. At the same time the vandals were destroying the Moody field others were laying waste the fields as far away as Vermillion and probably through Union County. They spread all over the portion of Yankton County that had been occupied by farmers, which embraced only a comparatively narrow strip along the river two or three miles in width. Whether they attacked the wild prairie grass was not known but they were known to feast on it in regions farther west where there were no cultivated fields. To witness such a phenomenon is to have brought to mind the biblical account of the plagues visited upon Pharaoh, the Egyptian ruler, when he refused the Hebrews permission to leave his domains.

The scientific gentlemen who came out from Washington did not slight their investigation because of any personal privation they might be obliged to endure. They visited the Dakota settlements and from information obtained in the territory concluded that the breeding place of the pest was in the Rocky Mountains and thither they directed their journey and explorations, accompanied by a small defensive force of Government troops from Fort Sully. Their labors were amply rewarded by the discovery that the insect was apparently indigenous in the barren slopes and foothills of the Rockies, scattered along for hundreds of miles, where the soil or sand was warm. There were their hatching or breeding grounds. They appeared soon after the first real warm days of spring, fed on mountain verdure, hopping about the foothills for two months until their wings were grown, when, as with one accord and under some such leadership and guidance as directs the flight of wild fowl, they would mount into the air to an elevation of thousands of feet and flow out toward the abodes of civilized people. Their flight was invariably directed eastward. Their invasion of the settled and cultivated sections of the country, extending even to Ohio and Pennsylvania, had become a matter of such serious import as to create widespread and well-grounded alarm, and for this reason measures were taken by the Government to destroy them in their breeding haunts, while yet they occupied the little white cell or egg, which in long clusters had been deposited by the parent in the earth. Undoubtedly a great deal was accomplished toward their extermination by the use of fire in destroying the infant insect and also in the destruction of these eggs by various methods, but despite these efforts the grasshopper raids continued to afflict the West with more or less calamitous effect until the year 1875 when they ceased as abruptly as they had begun and for thirty years past they have existed only as a memory that we would not care to lose now that it has been paid for. It is something worth while to have been an eyewitness to a grasshopper raid.

The grasshopper did not visit the settled portions of the Dakotas each year during the period from 1864 to 1874. They occasionally omitted an annual visit, due, as would be ascertained, to their failure to alight, but they passed over in their long flights and swept away the fields and gardens of our neighbors in Iowa, Minnesota and Nebraska. The newspapers and the people of those states and the states farther east grew accustomed to call them the "Dakota grasshoppers" because they came in on them from this direction and because also this name had been bestowed upon them by those tenderfoot emigrants who had been frightened away from this land now celebrated as one of the great garden spots of our nation, but which these thoughtless deserters derided as a land of grasshoppers, drouth, Indian massacres and "blizzards," all of which were but temporary evils that added spice as well as hardship and privation to the pioneer's experience. But these damaging stories had a baneful influence at the time and sadly retarded immigration. The reports were nearly always greatly exaggerated and strongly colored to make them interesting and wonderful; and yet it may be truthfully confessed that there was ground for the reports, for serious drouths did occur that prevented a remunerative harvest, the grasshoppers did devour and destroy more than would have been inflicted by the hostile invasion of an army. The Indians harassed the early settlers and kept their minds in a condition of almost constant anxiety and apprehension and the "blizzards" added their terrible fury to the wintry blasts just as they did and continue to do in all sections of our beloved country. Today Dakota is as free from all these unpleasant and damaging features as any portion of the United States and has enjoyed such immunity for the past thirty years.

Continuing the grasshopper topic it seems appropriate to remark that the disastrous results of a grasshopper visitation were not confined to the single season where they came in to feast on the farmer's growing corn and the housewife's snowy linen hung out to dry. It was the custom of the female insect, on such occasions, to deposit her score of eggs in the soil of our Dakota farms. In the early spring these eggs would hatch and the earth would be literally covered with the tiny wingless hoppers who would not stray far from their birthplace, but were so numerous and ravenous that they would devour the tender blades of wheat and oats, and garden stuff as rapidly as it appeared above the ground. Not a spear could be grown that season in fields so afflicted, the scourge remaining until their wings had grown before departing. Many devices were invented and used to prevent or minimize the destruction they entailed, the most effective being the construction of a ditch about twelve inches deep and two feet wide across the entire field. The farmer with his family and all the help he could muster would then start in at the opposite side and armed with bushes, proceed to drive the insects toward the ditch, where, once safely in they would be unable to hop out. It was a long, tedious and difficult task, but many farmers succeeded in saving half their crop at least by a resort to this device. Finally the field would be practically cleared of the insects and the ditch would be partially filled with them. Coal oil was then poured into the ditch in liberal quantity and a lighted match applied; and for a week after the atmosphere in that neighborhood would be heavy with the odor of the holocaust.

Where the insect was permitted to mature, it would follow the example of its parent, mount into the air on its newly-grown wings and fly away toward the rising sun. Within the brief space of a few hours a section of country covering several townships, where the hatching had been done, and where the crops had been nibbled down, would be entirely free of the pest, and generally in season to mature a crop of corn. Following their departure, after a reasonable time elapsed, reports would float back to us of a Dakota grasshopper raid in some portion of the country east that caused great destruction to growing crops, and in this instance the grasshoppers were in all probability native here and to the manor born, and they would probably repeat the egg depositing process in the section where they alighted. It was observed that the rank and ferocious nature of this insect became modified as they migrated eastward. The Dakota hopper was not as voracious and destructive as its parent, the Rocky Mountain locust, nor as hard and long and brown as that insect, but had a greenish hue and resembled more the ordinary grasshopper that infests all sections of the eastern states and has for a century. It was said that the soil and climate were the agents that produced this improvement, which must have been greatly aided by the incubation of a third generation in the high-toned dirt of Iowa, while another stride would be taken in Illinois the following season in bringing forth a still more attractive and innocuous insect.

Lieut. G. K. Warren, of the United States topographical engineers, under date of January 21, 1858, reported his explorations in Nebraska and the Black Hills of Dakota. He mentions as a serious drawback to the occupation of Western Nebraska by farmers, the grasshoppers that occasionally destroy the useful vegetation. He says:

Often they fill the air for many miles of extent so that an experienced eye can scarce distinguish their appearance from that of a shower of rain or the smoke of a prairie fire. The height of their flight may be somewhat appreciated as one party named James saw them above his head as far as their size would render them visible while standing on top of a peak of the Rocky Mountains 8,500 feet above the level of the plains, and at an elevation of 14,500 feet above that of the sea, in the region where the snow lies all the year. To a person standing in one of these swarms as they pass over and around him, the air becomes sensibly darkened and the sound produced by their wings resembles that of the passage of a train of cars on a railroad when standing 200 or 300 yards from the track. The Mormon settlements have suffered more from the ravages of these insects than probably all other causes combined. They destroyed nearly all the vegetables cultivated last year at Fort Randall and extended their ravages east as far as Iowa.

WINNEBAGO INDIANS REMOVE

The Winnebago Indians, who had been removed from Minnesota and placed upon a reservation at Crow Creek with the Santees, had found life with the wild Sioux unbearable, and had been gradually deserting the reservation for that of the Omahas, with whom they claimed kinship. This Omaha reservation is above Omaha, in Nebraska. Many of these deserters were halted by the troops, who were scouting through the country, and marched to Fort Randall, where they were confined a few days as a punishment for violating the military order prohibiting Indians from leaving the reservation. They invariably set up a tearful complaint of the hardships they endured in the Sioux country, but as the military authorities had no discretion to change their location, they were advised to apply to the "Great Father" for relief; and would then be sent back to their reservation. Hundreds of these, however, succeeded in eluding the troops and reaching the Omahas. The Winnebago complaint was known to be based on facts, and no change for the better could be expected while they were where they could be annoyed by the Sioux, who envied them because they received annuities, and despised them because they would not fight the whites. A reservation was finally procured for them near their kinsmen in Nebraska, and in 1865 they were again transplanted, but they have materially deteriorated on Nebraska soil, and have become almost a reproach to the race, while the Santees, who shared the first reservation with them, have emerged into a civilized and industrious people.

HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION AND LECTURES

The first meeting held under the charter of the "Old Settlers' Historical Association" was on the evening of the 1st day of January, 1863, at the council chamber in the capitol building. Hon. D. T. Bramble was elected president; James Tufts and James McFetridge, vice presidents, and James M. Allen and John H. Shober, secretaries. Addresses were made by Hon. M. H. Somers, of Cole County, and Hon. H. A. Kennerly, of Charles Mix, both members of the Legislature then in session, and also by Mr. Henry C. Ash, the pioneer landlord of Yankton, who set forth the purposes of the association and the value its work would contribute to the future inhabitants of Dakota. Mr. Shober and Judge Tufts also spoke briefly. No business other than the election of the officers was transacted, and after the speeches were concluded the old settlers adjourned until the 8th inst., and there is no record that the association ever held another meeting.

A serious defect in the incorporation act of this association was its failure to provide an association fund, and, second, limiting its membership to citizens who came to the territory prior to the passage of the organic act. This became apparent when in June, 1863, eleven boxes of books containing over five hundred volumes, sent from the Interior Department, reached Yankton, addressed to the "President of the Old Settlers' Historical Association," on which the freight was $124.50.

The society had no money, and the Gregory Bros. received the books and paid the amount, holding the books in their possession.

A preliminary organization of a new association was effected at a meeting held at Gregory Bros.' store on the 25th day of May, 1863, when Enos Stutsman was made chairman, and James Tufts secretary. This movement was favored by the charter members of the "Old Settlers' Historical Association" who were present. Accordingly, the following articles were drawn up and signed, to-wit:

Formation of Dakota Historical and Library Association. We the undersigned citizens of the Territory of Dakota do hereby constitute ourselves an association under the name and title of the "Dakota Historical and Library Association." The officers of this association shall consist of a president, two vice presidents, one secretary, one treasurer and one librarian. Every person becoming a member of this association shall pay to the treasurer of the same an initiation fee of five dollars. Whenever thirty persons shall have signed their names to this article and have paid the amount herein designated to J. Shaw Gregory, the said J. Shaw Gregory shall call a meeting of said association in the Town of Yankton, giving at least ten days' public notice of the time and place of the said meeting by having the same published in the Dakotan. Each of the signers hereto paid $5.00, to-wit:—P. Bliss, W. E. Gleason, J. Shaw Gregory, H. C. Ash, D. T. Bramble, M. K. Armstrong, E. Stutsman, J. Hutchinson, B. M. Smith, Samuel Grant, Henry E. Gregory, James Tufts, George W. Kingsbury, Melancthon Hoyt, J. K. Fowler, J. R. Hanson, C. F. Picotte, J. B. S. Todd, George N. Propper, G. W. Pinney, N. Edmunds.

These payments totaled $105.00, and shortly after W. P. Lyman, N. G. P. Booge, C. C. P. Meyer, C. E. Rowley, John Lawrence, George P. Waldron, making in all $135.00. It was also resolved at this meeting to apply for an act of incorporation to the next Legislature, and the following named gentlemen were appointed a committee to report rules and by-laws, to be acted upon at the next meeting, to-wit: Enos Stutsman, Jesse Wherry, D. T. Bramble, Rev. M. Hoyt, J. Shaw Gregory, M. K. Armstrong, James Tufts, G. W. Kingsbury. The meeting then adjourned subject to the call of the president.

On November 10, 1863, a meeting was called at which the Committee on By-Laws and Rules reported. This meeting was held in Gregory Bros.' store on Broadway. Those present were Rev. Melancthon Hoyt, J. Shaw Gregory, Henry E. Gregory, Capt. William Tripp, Gov. Newton Edmunds, Byron M. Smith and George W. Kingsbury. It was resolved to effect a temporary organization at this meeting, and through the officers apply to the Legislature for a legal organization. Reverend Doctor Hoyt was chosen president; Byron M. Smith, secretary; Henry E. Gregory, treasurer, and Enos Stutsman, librarian. These officers were constituted an executive committee and authorized to provide a course of lectures for the ensuing winter, whereupon the meeting adjourned.

At the ensuing session of the Legislature, the following act incorporating the historical society was passed:

AN ACT INCORPORATING THE HISTORICAL SOCIETY OF DAKOTA

Be it Enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota:

Section 1. That Newton Edmunds, Philemon Bliss, Melancthon Hoyt, William E. Gleason, Henry C. Ash, D. T. Bramble, M. K. Armstrong, Henry E. Gregory, James Tufts, J. K. Fowler, J. R. Hanson, J. W. Pratt, Washington Reed, P. H. Risling, Duncan Ross, William Shriner, E. W. Wall, Jesse Wherry, A. W. Puett, Mahlon Gore, Charles F. Rossteuscher, A. K. Curtis, Almore Gore, David Fisher, and their associates and successors be and are hereby constituted a body politic and corporate, to all intents and purposes, by the name of the "Historical Society of Dakota," and by that name may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered unto; may purchase and receive and own books, pamphlets, statuary and other materials and collections illustrative of the territory and of the history of Dakota, amounting in value to a sum without a limit; and may purchase and receive, hold and convey real property to any amount not exceeding $20,000; and may lease, grant, mortgage, sell and convey, or otherwise dispose of the same for the use and benefit of the society; and to receive donations and to apply the same as the donor or donors may direct, and to devise and keep a common seal with the right to alter the same at pleasure; and to make, adopt and enforce such constitution, by-laws, rules and regulations as the society may choose, and to transfer and turn over to the Historical Society of Dakota all books, documents, pamphlets, etc., owned or claimed by the said "Old Settlers' Historical Association."

The remaining ten sections stated the objects of the society; an annual meeting was provided for; transferring to this association the records and property of the "Old Settlers' Historical Association"; exemption from taxation.

The association gave weekly entertainments during the winter of 1863 in the form of lectures. Hon. M. K. Armstrong opened the course with an address on the "Early Settlement of Dakota." He was followed by United States Marshal George M. Pinney, who spoke on the theory of our state polity; next was Judge Philemon Bliss, who discoursed on the philosophy of the Declaration of Independence. The concluding lecture for the winter was given by Reverend Mr. Tingley, subject, "The Different Races of Men." These entertainments were moderately patronized, there being an admission fee for gentlemen of 25 cents, ladies free. The money was to pay the expense of caring for the territorial library. The Legislature of 1863 passed an act entitled "An Act to Incorporate the Historical Society of Dakota." This act served to unite the Old Settlers' Historical Association and the recent Historical and Library Association.

On New Year's Day, 1864, the incorporators met at the capitol building and effected a permanent organization by the election of the following officers: Newton Edmunds, president; J. O. Taylor, A. J. Faulk, vice presidents; M. K.

Armstrong, secretary; George W. Kingsbury, treasurer; George N. Propper, librarian. A constitution for the society presented by Hon. Enos Stutsman was adopted. It provided, first, that the title of the association should be the "Historical Society of Dakota." The second, third, fourth and fifth articles related to membership. Any person could become a member by making application to the executive board and paying the initiation fee of $5.00. The annual dues were $1.00. Honorary members were provided for. Article 6 defined the objects of the association, the principal one being to collect, embody and preserve in an authentic form materials for the future history of the territory. Articles 7 to 11, inclusive, provided for the election of a president, two vice presidents, secretary, treasurer and librarian, and defined their duties. Articles 12 to 14 constituted the officers an executive board to manage all its affairs, four members to constitute a quorum. They had power to pass on all applications for membership, subject to the approval of the association. Articles 15 to 17 fixed the time of the annual meeting for the election of officers on the first Tuesday of December in each year. No member was eligible to office or to vote who had not paid his dues. The adoption of this constitution closed the business of the annual meeting and it adjourned to December, 1864.

During the winter of 1863-64 the series of lectures was continued for the entertainment of the legislators, when the society, having succeeded in securing a solid footing financially and the popular support, postponed its lectures to December, 1864, when we shall have occasion to make further reference to it.

The society held its annual meeting at the capitol building in Yankton on the 19th day of December, 1865, on which occasion the secretary, Hon. M. K. Armstrong, submitted a report embodying a sketch of the various steps that had been taken since the organization of the territory to found an historical society, and including a list of the lectures and their subjects given before the various societies. This report is here given:

CHAPTER XXXIII

GENERAL SULLY'S SECOND CAMPAIGN

GENERAL SULLY'S SECOND CAMPAIGN—WEST OF THE MISSOURI RIVER—HIS ARMY—DEATH OF FIELDING—THE KILLING OF HIS SLAYERS—FORT RICE BUILT—MARCH THROUGH THE BAD LANDS—A THREE DAYS' BATTLE—DAKOTA CAVALRY IN PERILOUS POSITION—RETURN OF THE EXPEDITION—GOVERNOR EDMUNDS ORDERS THE ORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA—TROOPS STATIONED FOR THE WINTER—ALL DAY BATTLE AT FORT RICE—MASSACRE NEAR FORT PHIL KEARNEY—SULLY'S OFFICIAL REPORTS.

Brigadier-General Sully began his preparations early in 1864 for the campaign against the hostile Sioux, who were now west of the Missouri and north of the Cannon Ball River. He chartered a number of steamboats in March at St. Louis in order to obtain the advantage of the first high stage of water which usually follows the spring break-up and started his supply fleet northward in April. Each boat carried two six-pound guns and a small body of infantry to guard supplies. Although Minnesota furnished a large contingent of troops, this expedition was under the command of General Sully and had no connection with the movements of a second body of troops, as was the case in 1863. In fact, the Indian war in Minnesota was ended, and there were only straggling bands of hostiles in Dakota east of the Missouri. Little Crow had gone to the Happy Hunting Grounds in a very commonplace manner, and not while leading his warriors in battle. In a spirit of bravado he had returned to Minnesota in the spring of 1863 and was shot and killed near the Village of Hutchinson by some party who had suffered the loss of kindred during the first outbreak and massacre of 1862, and the great chieftain's skull is preserved among similar relics by the Historical Society of Minnesota.

The expedition got away from Sioux City early in May. It was rather late in starting, having been delayed by the nonarrival of the boats containing the supplies of food and ammunition for the troops. Companies A and B, Dakota Cavalry, were selected by General Sully, the commander, as his bodyguard, which mark of distinction was regarded as a high honor, especially in view of the regiments from Iowa, Nebraska and Minnesota that were in his command and furnished well seasoned troops. Downer T. Bramble went with Sully's expedition as sutler to the Dakota troops and took with him as clerk Mr. Ed L. Johnson, a young man recently from New York, an ex-soldier. Company B had been stationed at Yankton for a year prior to this selection, that is, the town had been headquarters, the company doing patrol duty through the southern part of the territory, from Choteau Creek on the west to Turkey Ridge Creek on the east, and had also made two expeditions in pursuit of the perpetrators of the Trask and Weiseman murders. Company A had been stationed at Fort Randall and was employed in scouting during the summer of 1863 and went out with Colonel Pattee's reconnoitering expedition in the fall of 1863 and was with the rescue party that aided in conducting the Minnesota women captives from Pierre to Fort Randall and contributed about two hundred and fifty dollars to the released prisoners, which enabled them to purchase clothing to cover their nakedness and placed them in a position of comparative independence for the time being.

General Sully rendezvoused his troops at old Fort Sully, near Farm Island and about three or four miles below the present City of Pierre. His force consisted of Companies A and B, Dakota Cavalry, which were selected as his bodyguard; Colonel Pope's Battery; the Sixth Iowa Cavalry, Colonel Pollock; Brackett's Battalion, Minnesota Cavalry, Major Brackett; three companies of the Seventh Iowa Cavalry, Col. John Pattee; and one company of Nebraska cavalry.

The expedition left Fort Sully about the 26th of June, 1864, and three days later had reached the mouth of the Little Cheyenne River, where Captain Fielding, topographical engineer, was killed by a small band of Indians. Fielding had strayed ahead of the command about a mile and a half in pursuit of his professional duties, accompanied by two soldiers; the party had dismounted and picketed their horses, when a shot was fired from ambush, giving Fielding a mortal wound. The soldiers were some distance away. Three Indians then rushed forward to secure the horses, but the animals, becoming frightened, broke loose and got away. One of the soldiers was shot and the other escaped to the command and gave the alarm. Captain Miner, Company A, Dakota Cavalry, was ordered to pursue and punish the savages. The pursuit was instantly undertaken and after a sharp ride of fifteen miles the miscreants were located in a ravine. Captain Miner and Sergt. A. M. English were in the advance and as they rode up the Indians gave them a broadside at close range, but failed to hit their mark. A number of the boys dismounted and advanced. The Indians, realizing their certain death or capture, fired again without effect, and the next moment were riddled with bullets from a dozen guns. Another party of soldiers who had come out with some refreshments for Company A severed the heads of the dead Indians from their bodies and took them to camp, where they were given to the general, who caused them to be fastened to long poles and these were set in the ground as a warning to the marauding red men. Beheading an enemy in this manner will be considered barbarous and cruel and not creditable to a civilized and enlightened people; but we must consider the circumstances and the surroundings which on occasions like this awaken the dormant savage nature which civilization has never yet been able to expel from the human breast. The command resumed its march and arrived at Swan Lake on the 30th, where it was joined by the Minnesota forces commanded by Colonel Thomas. These consisted of the Eighth Mounted Infantry under Col. Henry Rogers; six companies, A, B, C, D, E and H, of the Second Cavalry, Col. Robt. McLaren; and the Third Minnesota Battery under Colonel Rogers. On the 3d of July the command resumed its march and reached a point a few miles above the mouth of the Cannon Ball River on the east bank. The entire journey thus far had been made on the east bank. Here the command crossed and General Sully proceeded to the erection of what has since been known as Fort Rice. The steamboats came up and discharged their cargoes here and a storehouse was immediately constructed of logs to shelter them. Four companies of the Thirtieth Wisconsin Infantry that had arrived with the boats and two companies of cavalry were detailed to construct the fort, and on the 18th of July the expedition cut loose from the river and headed for its toilsome journey to the head of the Yellowstone. Ten days later the Indians were encountered in strong force near Deerkill Mountain, in what is now Starke County, North Dakota, and here the first battle was fought, lasting all day. It was in a country admirably calculated for Indian tactics and the savages felt so confident of victory that they had neglected removing their squaws and papooses from their camp. The Indians fought desperately at times, but notwithstanding their superior numbers, estimated at about five thousand warriors, they were slowly driven back, their camp captured, the women and children fleeing to the friendly refuge of the neighboring cliffs and mountains. By nightfall the enemy had disappeared, losing in the neighborhood of two hundred men. Sully's forces lost fourteen killed and thirty wounded. This battle is called the battle of Killdeer Mountain or Deerkill Mountain. Companies A and B, Dakota Cavalry, were detailed to destroy the supplies left in the Indian camp, which was accomplished by piling the lodge poles and other camp material, together with a vast amount of buffalo meat and thousands of robes, in one huge pile and giving it over to the flames. Sully encamped near the battlefield and remained two or three days, being constantly annoyed by the savages, who watched every opportunity to kill a sentinel or steal a horse. Early in August the expedition was again on the march, retracing its steps to the corral, and made a journey the first day of twenty-five miles, camping on Heart River. On the 5th of August the command reached the edge of the Bad Lands, at a point southwest of Killdeer Mountain, and the following day entered that desolate waste, camping at night on the Little Missouri River. Here the Indians in strong force began to seriously threaten the army, and while the command pressed forward the following day the troops were continually engaged with the Indians, who from their advantageous hiding places with which the Bad Lands abound, assailed the troops in the advance and in the rear, and threatened the capture of the supply train. It was a busy day for the soldiers, who were constantly employed in beating back the skulking, tireless foe. The fighting continued until darkness put an end to it, the soldiers resting on their arms until daylight the following morning, when they were assailed more fiercely and with greater numbers than the day before. An inexperienced commander must have lost his head in this conflict. The Indians seemed to have every advantage, for while our troops were constantly exposed, the Indians in small bands would make a sudden sortie and as suddenly disappear behind the frowning crags with which the Bad Lands are so generously supplied. This battle continued well into the forenoon of the 9th of August and the journey through the Bad Lands, described by Sully as "looking like hell with the fires put out," was almost completed when the savage foe, baffled and beaten at every point, withdrew. They seemed to fade away or sink into the earth in the space of an hour, and as the expedition emerged from the Bad Lands at noon no trace of an enemy was to be discovered; the last and final battle with the Sioux nation, it was believed, had been fought in that two days' struggle in the Bad Lands.

The annals of Indian warfare fail to disclose a militant situation so fraught with actual peril through so many days as this march through and battle of the Bad Lands. It would seem that the advantage was all on the side of the Indians. The thousand rocky cliffs on every side afforded them ample shelter from the guns of the soldiers and because they were well armed it would seem that they could have killed half of Sully's command by picking them off one by one, for he had less than fifteen hundred to oppose 3,000 Indians. He also had, because of the nature of the country, to stretch his column out to great length, and to guard his supply train. His ability as a commander was strikingly evident during this three days' journey through the defiles of "Mauvaise Terre," with a supply train to guard and thousands of hostile Indians surrounding and eagerly thirsting for blood. It was in these engagements, on the second day, that a portion of Company A, Dakota Cavalry, had its narrowest escape from destruction during its entire term of service. Sergt. A. M. English thus relates the incident:

We were now fighting on foot against a party of Indians who were attempting to get between us and our train. Captain Miner ordered the writer, who was in command of the first platoon, to take possession of a hill which would command their position. We secured the hill at once, but the Indians continued to multiply and we soon found ourselves cut off from the main command and surrounded by not less than five hundred Sioux warriors, making the air hideous with their wild war whoop. They kept closing in, and were so close that we were able to see the color of the paint on their faces. Our fire was quite effective on their ranks, and we thought that we had perhaps answered our last roll call, but we heard the clattering of troops in our rear, and looking around I saw our brave captain at the head of the Coyotes coming down on the savages at a swift gallop. He struck them with the force of a cyclone. He hurled his troops against the red devil in the center and scattered them to the four winds. A hearty thank God went up from the men of the men who had composed my little command. When cavalry dismount to fight every fourth man is detailed to hold four horses. In the heat of the fight I remember ground, not giving my horse a thought. After the Indians were driven back I looked around for him; I choked up until I could hardly speak for fear I had lost him; but no; he was close at my heels; his nose almost on my shoulder. After that I was not afraid that he would leave me. That was the hottest scrap the company got into during its term of service. The battle continued until dark, only to be renewed in the morning. We were now nearly out of the Bad Lands and the Indians charged our lines at all points, but they were beaten and driven back. Discouraged, disheartened and thoroughly defeated, their supplies captured, they finally gave up the contest and allowed us to pursue the remainder of our way unmolested. Thus ended the battle of the Bad Lands, a three days' conflict against the allied forces of the whole hostile Sioux nation.

The command after emerging from the Bad Lands marched to the Yellowstone River, August 12th, subsisting in the meantime on a cracker a day. At the Yellowstone they were overjoyed to find the steamboats laden with their supplies. Here their difficulties of a serious nature ended. They swam the Yellowstone, crossed the plains to the Missouri, and by leisurely marches journeyed down that stream to various points on the river, where they were stationed for the winter. They met with no hostile Indian parties on the return, indicating the complete discomfiture of the hostile Indian element.

There is no way of estimating how many Indians were killed or wounded in these engagements, but it is certain that they acknowledged complete defeat. In after years the chiefs who were in these battles stated that they had been completely surprised at the determination and endurance of the white soldiers. The young Indian warriors who composed nine-tenths of the enemy had never been in a battle with the pale-faces and expected an easy victory. It was not the loss of men that disheartened and demoralized the Indians, for their losses were comparatively small for the number engaged, but it was the invincible stubbornness and intrepidity of the soldiers. The Indians concluded that they were no match for those qualities and surrendered to the peace commissioners who went out to meet them the following season. Sully was not further annoyed. He reached the Yellowstone River August 12th, found two boats there laden with army supplies and for the first time in several weeks the troops were supplied with full rations. The last three days they had been reduced to one hardtack a day.

The second day's battle was called the Battle of the Bad Lands.

Sully's losses in these battles were twenty-three killed and fifty-six wounded. There were also seven men killed during the outgoing and incoming journey. One sergeant was killed by his men, who mistook him for an Indian.

The site for a new fort was selected after the return of the expedition fifteen miles above Pierre, to be named Fort Sully. Old Fort Sully below Pierre was then abandoned.

While the campaign had put an end to the general Indian war in the Northwest, this did not render the settlements of Dakota safe from small predatory and irreconcilable savages who were averse to peace on general principles. These continued to alarm the settlers and constituted an almost impregnable barrier to rural improvements and immigration.

The disastrous effect upon the Indians of this campaign may be clearly inferred from the concluding paragraph in the annual report of Major-General Pope, in command of this department, who made this unqualified statement:

I may say finally that the Government may dismiss safely all apprehensions of Indian war in the Northwest. Small raids there will doubtless be, as there always have been, for stealing horses, but no hostilities by any considerable number are likely again to occur.

This prediction of the head of the department proved reasonably accurate, and for nearly ten years, or until the opening of the Black Hills, there was comparative peace on the frontier. Then came the Sitting Bull wars on the Northern Pacific and the Custer Massacre.

Fort Wadsworth was built by Colonel Rodgers, of Minnesota, on his return trip from Sully's Bad Land campaign of 1864, by a detachment of Wisconsin troops. The Minnesota troops separated from the main command at Fort Rice, on the return, and taking a route somewhat to the north of the course pursued on their outward journey, they crossed the James River at the head of Goose Lake; where it was designed to construct a fort, but the plan was changed and a site selected about half way between the James River and the lower end of Lake Traverse, where a post was built and named Fort Wadsworth, which afterward was called Fort Sisseton.

GENERAL SULLY'S REPORT

Here follows the official report of General Sully's expedition against the Sioux Indians in Dakota Territory, July-October, 1864.

Headquarters Northwestern Indian Expedition,
Camp on Heart River in Dakota Territory, July 31, 1864.

Sir:—I have the honor to make the following report of my operations since July 25th:

On the 23d of this month I reached this point, having made rapid marches, considering I had a large emigrant train under my charge. I had started in a direction west, but on the road, receiving information that the Indians were on or near the Knife River, I changed my course in a northerly direction. On my arrival at this point I corralled all my wagons and the emigrant train, leaving it in charge of Captain Tripp, Dakota Cavalry, with a sufficient force to guard against danger, intending to start with pack mules, but on opening the boxes I found no saddle blankets. This I replaced with gunnysacks. I then found the bands that go over the packs (called cintuas, I believe) instead of being made of webbing or several thicknesses of duck sewed together, and about six or eight inches wide, were made of hard leather about three inches wide. The torture to the mules, when these pieces, that ought to be called sheet iron, were brought tight into their bellies was such that they were kicking and jumping in all directions and succeeded in either getting their packs off or breaking the saddle. I therefore had to give up the pack mule system, for two days' march with such instruments of torture would completely use up all my animals. I then pressed into service all the light private wagons with me, placing in each four of my best mules and hauling 1,000 pounds each. By throwing away all tents, everything but provisions and ammunition, I could move rapidly with a very few wagons. About 3.00 P. M. of July 26th I succeeded in getting off, and about 10.00 A. M. of the 28th succeeded in reaching the enemy's camp, about eighty miles march. All their camp was standing when I reached there, and they prepared for a fight, no doubt with full confidence of whipping me, for they had twenty-four hours notice of my advance by a party of my scouts falling in with a war party of theirs not sixteen miles from here. We followed their trail, which led to the camp. I found the Indians strongly posted on the side of a mountain called Tahkahokuty Mountain, which is a small chain of very high hills, filled with ravines, thickly timbered and well watered, situated on a branch of the Little Missouri, Gros Ventres, latitude 47 degrees 15 minutes, as laid down on the government map. The prairie in front of the camp is very rolling, and on the left, as we approached, high hills. On the top and sides of these hills and on my right at the base of the mountains, also on the hillocks in front on the prairie, the Indians were posted; there were over sixteen hundred lodges, at least five or six thousand warriors, composed of the Uncpapas, Sans Arcs, Blackfeet, Minneconjous, Yanktonnais, and Santee Sioux. My force consisted as follows: Eleven companies of the Sixth Iowa Cavalry, Lieutenant Colonel Pollack commanding; three companies of the Seventh Iowa Cavalry, Lieutenant Colonel Batten commanding; two companies of Dakota cavalry, Capt. Nelson Miner commanding, four companies of Brackett's Minnesota Battalion, Major Brackett commanding; about seventy scouts, and a prairie battery of two sections, commanded by Capt. N. Pope. This formed the First Brigade. Ten companies of the Eighth Minnesota Infantry, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Rogers; six companies of the Second Minnesota Cavalry, under Colonel McLaren, and two sections of the Third Minnesota Battery, under Captain Jones, formed the Second Brigade, under command of Colonel Thomas, the whole of my force numbered on the field about twenty-two hundred men.

Finding it was impossible to charge, owing to the country being intersected by deep ravines filled with timber, I dismounted and deployed six companies of the Sixth Iowa on the right and three companies of the Seventh Iowa, and on the left six companies of the Eighth Minnesota Infantry; placed Pope's Battery in the center, supported by two companies of cavalry; the Second Cavalry on the left, drawn up by squadrons, Brackett's Minnesota Battalion on the right in the same order, Jones' Battery and four companies of cavalry as a reserve. The few wagons I had closed up and the rear guard, composed of three companies, followed. In this order we advanced, driving the Indians off as reached the plain between the hills and the mountains. Here large bodies of Indians flanked me. The Second Cavalry drove them from the left. A very large band of Indians collected on my right for a charge. I directed Brackett to charge them. They met gallantly, driving them in a circle of about three miles to the base of the mountains and beyond my line of skirmishers, killing many of them. The Indians, seeing his position, collected in large numbers on him, but he repelled them, assisted by some well directed shots from Jones' Battery. About this time a large body of Indians, who we ascertained had been out hunting for me, came up on my rear. I brought a piece of Jones' Battery to the rear, and with the rear guard dispersed them. The Indians, seeing the day would not be favorable for them, had commenced taking down their lodges and sending back their families. I swung the left of my line round to the right and closed on them, sending Pope with his guns and the Dakota Cavalry (two companies) forward. The artillery fire soon drove them out of their strong positions in the ravines, and Jones' Battery, with Brackett's Battalion, moving up on the right, soon put them to flight, the whole of my line advancing at the same time. By sunset no Indians were on the ground. A body, however, appeared on top of the mountain over which they had retreated. I sent Major Camp, Eighth Minnesota, with four companies of the Eighth Minnesota forward. They ascended to the top of the hill, putting the Indians to flight and killing several. The total number of killed, judging from what we saw, was from one hundred to one hundred and fifty. I saw them during the fight carry off a great many dead or wounded. The very strong position they held and the advantages they had to retreat over a broken country prevented me from killing more. We slept on the battle ground that night.

The next morning before daylight we started to go round the mountain, as I could not get up it with wagons and artillery in front. After six miles march I came in sight of the trail on the other side of the mountain but could not get to it. One sight of the country convinced me there was no use trying to follow up the Indians through such a country and find them. I went on top of the hill, and as far as I could see with my glass (some thirty miles) the country was cut up in all directions by deep ravines, sometimes near one hundred feet deep, filled with timber, the banks almost perpendicular. I therefore thought the next best thing to do was to destroy their camp. This I did, ordering Colonel McLaren, Second Cavalry, on that duty. I enclose you a report of the property destroyed by him.

McLaren's Report:—I commenced by disposing of the various forces so as to destroy with the least delay the vast quantities of goods left in the timber and ravines adjacent to the camp. The men gathered into heaps and burned tons of dried buffalo meat packed in buffalo skin cases, great quantities of dried berries, buffalo robes, tanned buffalo, elk and antelope skins, household utensils, such as brass and copper kettles, mess pans, etc., riding saddles and dray poles for ponies and dogs. Finding that one day was too short a time to make the destruction complete, I ordered the men to gather only the lodge poles in heaps and burn them, and then deployed the men and fired the woods in every direction. The destruction was thus complete, and everywhere was manifest the rapid flight of the Indians, leaving everything, even their dogs and colts tied to pickets. In skirmishing the timber dead Indians were found killed by exploding shells. After a thorough examination of the camping ground and judging from the amount of lodge poles burnt, I should judge the camp to have amounted to 1,400 lodges. I would report that after the work of destruction commenced the Indians carried a white flag on the bluff close to the camp. As I could not interpret the meaning at this particular time, I did not feel called upon to report the fact to you until I had accomplished the object and carried out order No. 62.

(The two companies of the Dakota Cavalry under Captain Miner, with four companies of the Second Minnesota; four companies of the Sixth Iowa and three companies of the Eighth Minnesota, were engaged in this work of destruction.)

General Sully's report proceeds: That afternoon I marched six miles from the battle ground and camped. About dark a large body of Indians came on to my pickets and killed two. A command was immediately sent after them, but they fled in all directions. They made no further demonstrations on my march to this point, which I reached yesterday, my animals well tired out, having made a march of over one hundred and sixty-five miles in six days, one day being occupied in the fight. The officers and men of my command behaved well, and all appeared desirous to carry out my instructions as well as they could. My thanks are due to the officers of my staff for communicating my orders promptly, sometimes being obliged to expose themselves very much in so doing.

I shall march toward the Yellowstone in two days, bearing a little south, and I expect to overtake the enemy again on my way. In the battle of Killdeer Mountain above narrated, there were 2 killed and 8 wounded in Brackett's Minnesota Battalion; 1 killed and 1 wounded in the Sixth Iowa; 2 killed in the Second Minnesota; and 1 wounded in the First Dakota Cavalry.

General Sully's next report is from his camp on the Yellowstone, after his passage through and the battles of the Bad Lands. It is as follows:

Camp on the Yellowstone River, Dakota Territory,
August 13, 1864.

Sir: I have the honor to make the following report of my operations since I made my last report, on the 31st of July, on my return to Heart River, after my fight:

I assembled together all my Indian and half-breed guides I had to consult about my course. I had not quite six days' full rations on hand, and I must strike the Yellowstone by the most direct route at the Brazeau House, where I had ordered two small steamers to meet me the first part of August. They all told me it was impossible for wagons to get through the country near the Little Missouri, without they went south, the route I started on before I was turned north by the report that the Indians were on Knife River. I would thus strike the Yellowstone near the Powder River, and it would take me two or three weeks, and then, besides, I could not meet my boats there. One Indian, however, a Yanktonian, told me he had frequently been across that country on war parties, and he thought he could take the wagons through by digging some of the hills. I placed myself under his guidance, and he took me in a west direction for three days along the Heart River; plenty of good grass and water, but timber scarce; the country filled with extensive beds of coal, in some places beds ten feet thick. From what I have seen, coal, I feel sure, can be found in all this country, from the Missouri west to the Yellowstone. On the 5th day of August we came in sight of the Bad Lands, which extend along the Little Missouri, the valley being about twenty miles across; through the middle of this valley runs the river. When I came in sight of this country from the top of the tableland we were marching on, I became alarmed, and almost despaired of ever being able to cross it, and should have been very much tempted, had I rations enough, to turn back, but, on a close examination of my rations, I found I had only rations for six days longer, by some mistake of my commissary. I suppose, for he is not with me to explain, as I left him back at Fort Rice. I therefore had to reduce the bread ration one-third, all other stores except meat, one-half, so as to make it last me to the river. We camped that night with little or no grass and but a few holes of muddy rainwater. I have not sufficient power of language to describe the country in front of us. It was grand, dismal and majestic. You can imagine a deep basin, 600 feet deep and twenty-five miles in diameter, filled with a number of cones and oven-shaped knolls of all sizes, from twenty feet to several hundred feet high, sometimes by themselves, sometimes piled up into large heaps on top of one another, in all conceivable shapes and confusion. Most of these hills were of gray clay, but many of a light brick color, of burnt clay; little or no vegetation. Some of the sides of the hills, however, were covered with a few scrub cedars. Viewed in the distance at sunset it looked exactly like the ruins of an ancient city. My Indian guide appeared to be confident of success, and trusting to him, I started next morning, and by dint of hard digging, succeeded by night in reaching the banks of the Little Missouri, about twelve miles. I regret very much that some gentlemen well acquainted with geology and mineralogy did not accompany the expedition, for we marched through a most wonderful and interesting country. It was covered with pieces of petrified wood and on the tops of some of the hills we found petrified stumps of trees, the remains of a great forest. In some cases these trees were from sixteen to eighteen feet in diameter. Large quantities of iron ore, lava, and impressions in the rocks of leaves, of a size and shape not known to any of us. The banks of the Little Missouri are thickly timbered with cottonwood, and the river resembles very much the Missouri on a small scale. We had now reached the river and the middle of the Bad Lands. Having dug our way down to this point it was now necessary to dig our way out. I therefore ordered out a strong working party, with four companies of cavalry, under charge of Lieutenant Colonel Pattee, Seventh Iowa Cavalry. I remained in camp to allow the animals to rest and pick up what grass could be found around, there being very little to be found. Some few of the men, however, without orders, took their horses into the timber beyond the pickets, leaving their saddles and arms in camp. A small party of Indians crawled up to them, fired on them, creating a stampede. Most of the men ran away, leaving their horses, and the Indians succeeded in getting a few away, but three or four men, having some courage, mounted their horses bareback and gave chase, causing the Indians to drop all the horses, which were retaken, save one or two. A company was soon in pursuit, but the Indians escaped through some of the numerous ravines and forests. As we had saddled and hitched up everything at the first alarm, I broke camp and moved up the river three miles in the direction of our route, where the grass was said to be better. By evening the working party under Colonel Pattee returned, having cut three miles of the road. A part of a company, however, by accident, had been left behind. They were surrounded by Indians and were near being cut off, but by a hasty retreat they succeeded in getting through a deep gorge, where the road was cut, the Indians firing at them from the tops of the hills. They pursued them to the river and showed themselves on the tops of the high bluffs opposite my camp, firing into my camp, but a few shells from Jones' battery soon scattered them, and with the exception of a little picket firing there was no more trouble that night. I now knew I had come upon the Indians I had fought about a week ago, and in the worst possible section of the country I could possibly wish to encounter an enemy. My road lay through a succession of mountain gorges, down deep ravines, with perpendicular bluffs, so narrow only one wagon could pass at a time, intersected with valleys, down which the Indians could dash onto any point of my train. Stretched out in a single line we would extend from three to four miles. The large emigrant train I had were ox teams heavily loaded, and it was impossible to move them except at a snail's pace. I felt more apprehension for their safety than for that of my command, for they had with them a large number of women and children. Therefore I took every precaution for protection as well as for attacking. I distributed my companies along the flanks of the train, and a strong guard in the rear, with Captain Pope's howitzers; with orders for companies to dismount and take the heights at daybreak.

remaining there until the next company in their rear relieved them. I sent three companies of the Second Brigade, who had the advance, ahead with the pioneer party, followed by Jones' Battery. Colonel Thomas, with the rest of his Second Brigade, followed on the flanks of the wagons, while the First Brigade followed, guarding the rest of the trains. I accompanied the advance brigade. I had given orders that at every point when the nature of the ground would allow it, for the teams to double up and park as close as they could, so as to close up the rear. After marching about three miles we came on to the Indians strongly posted in front and on the flanks of a deep mountain pass. They were dislodged after some little trouble, the shells from Jones' Battery doing good execution, and the advance with other troops pushed on, while the pioneer party made the road. The Indians attacked me on the flanks and rear at the same time, but on all occasions they were repulsed with heavy loss by troops near by, and thus we advanced, fighting, hunting a road and digging it out, till we reached a small lake and spring about ten miles from our starting point, repulsing the Indians at every point with great slaughter. I speak partly from what I saw, for in their hasty retreat they had to leave in many instances their dead on the ground; they carried them off whenever they could. At the spring there was for a short time a brisk little skirmish, the Indians trying to keep us from the only water we had that day, and the day was so hot that the animals were suffering very much, having not much to eat for two days. Part of Colonel McLaren's Second Minnesota had most of the work here. One of his companies in advance got separated from the rest and surrounded; they, however, got into a hollow and defended themselves until relieved by other companies sent out from Colonel Thomas's command. Their loss, however, was slight in comparison to their danger. Unfortunately this day I lost the services of my guide; he was shot, having ventured too far in the advance. He was the only one who knew the country over which we were marching.

The next morning we moved onward. The Indians were in front of us, appearing as if intending to give us battle. Probably about one thousand showed themselves. I pushed forward Major House, Sixth Iowa, with two companies of the Sixth, and Captain Tripp's company of Dakota Cavalry, and sent forward Major Brackett with one company of his battalion, and Pope's four howitzers, dismounting the rest of the Sixth Iowa, under Colonel Pollock, on the right, and three companies of the Seventh Iowa, under Lieutenant Colonel Pattee, on the left, to push out and clear our flanks, and moved forward with Jones' Battery and the train; Colonel Thomas, with his Minnesota Brigade, taking care of the rear. We advanced without much trouble with a little skirmishing in front and also an attack in the rear. The enemy were repulsed on all sides. It was evident in spite of all their boasting that all fighting was out of them. A few miles brought us to an open country, and the last we saw of the Indians was a cloud of dust some six or eight miles off, running as fast as they could. They were better mounted than we were. The men behaved well. There were many acts of individual bravery displayed. A great deal of ingenuity in many cases was shown by the men in trapping the Indians who, afraid of our long ranged rifles and artillery, kept themselves at a respectful distance. Parties would crawl out behind hills while a small party mounted would dash onto the Indians, fire and retreat, drawing the Indians into an ambuscade, when they would succeed in emptying a few saddles and capturing a few ponies. It is impossible for me to give anything like a correct report of the number of Indians killed, the fighting extended over so great a distance, and was a succession of skirmishes; there was certainly over one hundred killed. Other officers feel sure there were double or treble that number. It is certain, however, their loss was very heavy. The same Indians I fought before were engaged, besides Cheyennes, Brules, Minneconjous, and others from the south. This I got from my own Indians, who, during the fight, conversed with them from behind the hills. They met me under every disadvantage on the strongest of positions and were entirely crushed and routed. If I had had anything to eat and was not encumbered with an emigrant train, and if my animals had not been without food so many days, I might have overtaken some of them, for they fled in all directions.

I would here state that on crossing the Little Missouri I found the country covered with myriads of grasshoppers, who had eaten everything. My animals were almost starved. I found this state of things all the way to the Yellowstone, and I was obliged to abandon and shoot a number of animals on the road. After marching six miles this day, we came to the place where the Indians left about thirty hours before my arrival. From the size of their camp, or rather bivouac, for they had pitched no lodges, I should judge all the Indians in the country had assembled there. The space they occupied was over one mile long and half a mile wide, besides which we discovered camps all over the country, close by this spot. I found the lodge trails turned to the left in a southwest direction. We still continued our course west by north, and next day crossed a heavy trail going northeast toward the same point where I first fought them. It was evidently not all the lodges that went that way. We continued our way across the country to the Yellowstone, which we reached on the 12th of August, over a section of country I never wish to travel again; our animals half dead with hunger, the grass entirely eaten off. I should judge it is never very good grass in the best of seasons. The water we had to drink, the worst sort of alkali water; this told on the animals. Fortunately we here met the two boats I ordered to get up the Yellowstone, if possible, and the first steamer that ever attempted to ascend this river. These boats were the Chippewa Falls and the Alone, small stern-wheel steamers, the former drawing only twelve inches light; they each had about fifty tons of freight; very little of it corn. The steamer Island City, having aboard nearly all my corn, struck a snag near Fort Union and sunk. The steamers attempted to go above this point, but a rapid shoal rendered it impossible. It was also fortunate for the boats that we arrived when we did, for the water is falling fast, and it will be impossible for them to go down the stream over rapids below without the help of our wagons. Having no grass to recuperate my animals, I had to again change my plans. I intended to again strike across the country north-east, in hopes of reaching the Indians again, but without any grass for several days this could not be done. I therefore crossed the command over the river, fording it with my wagons without much difficulty. The building of the post on the Yellowstone this year I consider not practicable. The loss of one of my boats, the impossibility of getting boats this late up the river, and the want of grass preventing me from hauling stores several hundred miles up the river, will show you the reasons. I shall follow down the Yellowstone to its mouth, cross the Missouri and down it to Bertold. I will by this means have grass and a good road, though I increase my distance over one hundred miles. I have the honor to enclose you the reports of commanders in regard to the part they took in the different skirmishes. With much respect, your obedient servant,

ALF. SULLY, Brigadier General.

Assistant Adjutant General, Department of the Northwest.

The subsequent reports of General Sully, made at various points as he was returning from his expedition, are principally devoted to the conduct of the war, and the policies and methods of the Government in dealing with the Indians. No further trouble was experienced from the hostiles, who had apparently suffered too much to be able to make another stand against the troops and had already in large numbers made their way to places of safety, some returning to the various Indian agencies where they could secure rations and deny that they had participated in any hostile acts against the Government; while others went north into the British possessions, where they could feel secure, as our troops were not permitted to cross the line. Sully reached Fort Union on the Missouri August 18th, and speaks in his report from that point of the difficulties encountered by the steamboats, caused by low water, in their voyage down the Yellowstone. He also parted company with his emigrant train, which pursued its journey toward the setting sun, taking along sundry mules, oxen, rifles, ammunition, etc., from Sully's property. He sent an expedition after the purloiners which overtook one party composed chiefly of the gentlemen of the train, and who had only taken ten mules, a half dozen oxen, some rifles, pistols, and other minor things. Those that were less gentlemanly were not pursued further owing to the exhausted condition of the cavalry horses, but the general felt that they had secured the bulk of the spoils of war taken during the campaign. At Fort Union, which was situated a few miles above the mouth of the Yellowstone, the expedition crossed to the north side of the Missouri, the cavalry fording the stream, which was very low. Fort Union was found to be in a very dilapidated condition, and was being used as a trading post. The general realizing the necessity for a military post at or near this point, though not favoring Fort Union, selected a new site below the Yellowstone's mouth for a post to be erected the next season. He deposited the supplies he had brought along for the post he had expected to establish on the Upper Yellowstone, at Union, and left one company of the Thirtieth Wisconsin in charge. On the 21st day of August he resumed his march for Fort Berthold, sending his sick and wounded down on the steamboats.

On the march the general learned that a large portion of the Indians he had fought at Killdeer Mountain had been supplied with powder and balls by half-breeds of the North who lived on the other side of the line, and claimed the protection from the British flag, which flag was looked upon as unfriendly to the United States in the Civil war then pending. He also learned from what he esteemed as good authority that thousands of the hostile element were anxious to make peace, and he had great confidence in these reports, which were abundantly substantiated during the following winter and spring. No hostile bands were met with.

At Fort Berthold, an Indian settlement, the general met the Rees, Gros Ventre, and Mandans, who gave him a cordial welcome. These Indians had been friendly to the whites for scores of years, the Mandans always. On that account they were at constant war with the Sioux, and Sully as a mark of appreciation for their consistent loyalty left Captain Moreland with a company of the Sixth Iowa Cavalry with them to assist them in their unequal combats with the Sioux. These Indians were industrious and progressive and were gathering a large crop of corn when the general reached their settlement, which was composed of a large number of frame structures as well as substantial dirt and pole lodges. They offered to send out a force with the general, but he was not then going on another fighting expedition. Subsequently Fort Stevenson was established for the protection of these people, and as a supply post for Fort Totten at Devil's Lake, which was built a year or two later. Fort Buford was also provided for.

On the 30th the march south was resumed, and camp near Fort Rice was made September 9th. It was here learned that a large train of emigrants led by Captain Fisk had reached Fort Rice a month earlier under cavalry escort, and that Fisk had induced the commander at the fort to furnish him an escort through the Indian country west recently traversed by Sully's expedition. At the time of Sully's arrival messengers had come in from Fisk's train, asking for a larger escort to pilot him beyond the danger line. The messengers brought word that Fisk was surrounded by the savages and could not move forward without an escort. It was known that a large number of women and children were with the train, and Sully, though determinedly opposed to the policy of escorting emigrants, whom he characterized as made up of men largely who were trying to escape being drafted, concluded to send out a strong detachment and bring the train back, but on no account would he furnish an escort if they insisted in going ahead. Accordingly Col. Daniel J. Dill, of the Thirtieth Wisconsin Infantry, then stationed at Fort Rice, with a force of 550 infantry, 300 cavalry and one section of artillery, were at once dispatched to the relief of the beleaguered train. This expedition followed Sully's trail five days, then turned a little south and on the tenth day came up with the emigrants, 180 miles out. They found the emigrants well fortified and in condition to resist any attacks from Indians. No Indians had been seen for a number of days, and Colonel Dill concluded that they were secreted in the Bad Lands, which were nearby, waiting for the train to move. The people of the emigrant train were of the same mind and had resolved they would not move another mile without an escort. Fisk, however, favored going forward, escort or no escort, though he urged Dill to pilot them through the Bad Lands, where he thought they were strong enough to take care of themselves. Colonel Dill informed the emigrants that he would be unable to furnish them any escort whatever if they persisted in going on; but that he would start on his return to Fort Rice at six o'clock the following morning, and any who wished the protection of the command to return could have it by being ready at that time. The emigrants took a vote on the question and all but twenty voted to return, and when the return march was begun the next morning the entire party had agreed to return. Colonel Dill met with no Indians, but crossed a number of large Indian trails on his return. A small party of Indians attempted to stampede his animals during early morning and succeeded in getting away with fifteen. He lost one man belonging to the Eighth Minnesota. The man obtained liquor from some of the emigrants and became intoxicated the morning the command left, and was supposed to have laid down and was left behind. This relief expedition reached Fort Rice on September 30th, having been absent twenty days. The emigrants divided here, some going back with the Minnesota troops, and the larger part with the troops coming down the river.

The general was very much gratified at the result of this expedition and the safety of the emigrants. Had the train been captured by the hostiles it would have emboldened them to further depredations and largely neutralized the effect of Sully's victories, which had so dispirited the hostiles that large numbers of them were already inclined to sue for peace.

The commanding general left Fort Rice, which he pronounced as one of the best posts in the West, about the 20th of September, halting on his way down at the various camps and disposing of his troops for the winter. He reached his headquarters at Sioux City about the 20th of October.

The result of the campaign had undoubtedly destroyed the confidence of the Indians in their ability to cope with the military force of the Government. Sully's campaign had thoroughly demoralized and disheartened the leading hostiles, and broken up the combination of the various tribes that had made up the hostile army. Sully assured the Government that no aggregation of hostile forces need be feared, and the only danger apprehended was from the frequent stealthy depredations of small bands, and troops had been distributed to guard against this so far as practicable.

General Pope, commanding the department in which Dakota was included, complimented Sully for the energy that had characterized his conduct of the campaign and the success which had crowned his labors. Pope felt that the Indian war was ended, and so assured the people, but he did not believe the situation was secure, and would not be so long as the British possessions afforded security to the hostile element and even offered inducements for the continuation of hostilities. In concluding his report to Major General Hallock, commander of the army, General Pope suggests that:

In some manner the British Government should either prevent hostile Indians who reside within the boundaries of the United States from seeking refuge in British territory, or should secure the United States against the raids of such Indians, or should permit the United States forces to pursue into British territory all Indians who belong south of the line and who are at war with citizens of the United States. One of these three demands is certainly reasonable, and will effect the desired purpose. In the same connection it will be necessary to prohibit half-breeds and other British subjects from coming into the territory of the United States to trade with Indians, whether hostile to us or not, who live south of the British line. The hostile Sioux have, for the past two years, been supplied with ammunition, provisions, etc., to carry on hostilities against the United States by British subjects, both in their own territory and ours. A state of hostility between the Sioux and citizens of the United States of course throws all the trade with such Indians into the hands of British traders, hence the anxiety of those traders to prevent peace with the Sioux Indians.

As future experience disclosed, the Indian war which was inaugurated by Little Crow in Minnesota in August, 1862, was terminated with the conclusion of this campaign. The causes of the long and costly and unprecedented insurrection have already been sufficiently referred to. While a period of comparative peace ensued for some years following, the repeated efforts of the whites to open the Black Hills, and the building of the Union Pacific Railroad and the surveys for the Northern Pacific later, served to keep the Indian mind in a state of irritation and antagonistic. The redmen complained of these projects, which, with the increase of travel through what they called their country, drove away their game and deprived them of their subsistence.

This condition could not be avoided; the Government recognized it, and was abundantly prepared to make up the deficiency and much more. In fact it was even then supplying to its Indian wards generous supplies of food and clothing.

CAPTAIN NELSON MINER'S REPORT

Northwestern Indian Expedition,
Camp First Battalion, Dakota Cavalry,
Deerkill Mountain, August 2, 1864.

Sir: I have the honor to report that in the battle on the 28th of July, 1864, my command was held in reserve for a time in rear of the battery of the First Brigade until a charge occurred in the skirmishers on the left between the Eighth Minnesota Infantry and the Seventh Iowa Cavalry, when I was sent with Company A, of my command, to occupy the space. When, after driving the Indians for some two miles, a large force of Indians appeared on the hill in front of us, when we charged up the hill and met several times at short range, with good effect, when Captain Pope, with his battery, Company B, of my command, Company M, Sixth Iowa Cavalry, and the Nebraska Scouts came prominently support, which caused the Indians to retreat. I then, with Company A, Dakota Cavalry, passed to the left of a hill which was in our front, when the battery, with Company B of my command, went to the right, when after a little skirmishing the Indians went up the mountains, which were in front of the command. We then halted and soon after returned and camped with the rest of the command on the battlefield. At an early hour next morning, after ascertaining that it was impossible to follow the Indians farther with any prospect of success, I went to the Indian camp with both companies of my command, in accordance with orders, for the purpose of destroying the property of said Indians, and although several other companies were at work destroying the property of the Indians, my two companies destroyed some seven hundred skin lodges, a large quantity of buffalo robes, camp equipage and provisions. The casualties in my command were only one soldier, of Company A, slightly wounded. In conclusion, I beg leave to state that in my opinion great wisdom was displayed in the conducting of said battle by our most worthy general. I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

NELSON MINER,

Captain, Commanding Dakota Cavalry.

BRIG. GEN. ALFRED SULLY, Commanding Expedition.

This was the only official report of any battle in which the Dakota troops were engaged. They took part in several skirmishes at Sioux Falls, Yankton, and on Sully's march up the Missouri Valley, and were employed extensively in scouting and patrol duty.

From the report of Col. M. T. Thomas, colonel of the Eighth Minnesota Volunteers, who commanded the Minnesota brigade on its march across Central Dakota in 1864, to the Missouri River, and joined General Sully opposite, or a few miles above, the mouth of the Cannon Ball River:

Headquarters Minnesota Brigade, Northwestern Indian Expedition,

Fort Ridgely, Minnesota, October 9, 1864.

Captain: I have the honor to make the following report of the operations of the Minnesota or Second Brigade of the Northwestern Indian Expedition, ordered from this district to join Brigadier General Sully on the Missouri River:

The force, consisting of the Eighth Minnesota Regiment, Volunteer Infantry, mounted; six companies of the Second Minnesota Cavalry Volunteers; one section of six-pounder smooth bore guns, and one section of twelve-pounder mountain howitzers, all brass pieces; a corps of forty-five scouts, with a train of ninety-three six-mule teams and twelve ambulances, was rendezvoused at this camp on the 1st day of June, 1864, and took up the line of march on the 6th day of June, with thirty days' rations, via the Minnesota and Intpah rivers and Captain Sully's Trail, to Goose Nest Lake on the Minnesota Coteau; from thence to the James River below the mouth of Elm River; from thence to the headwaters of said river, at the foot of the Missouri Coteau, across it to the Bois Cache Creek, and down to Swan Lake Creek, which we struck at a point seven miles from the Missouri River, and joined General Sully's command on the 30th day of June, having marched 332 miles. July 4th, marched for Long Lake River; arrived on the 8th, ninety-nine miles. Opposite this point General Sully located Fort Rice, above the mouth of the Cannon Ball River. The whole command crossed the river on steamboats and prepared for a campaign against the Indians, which preparations consumed eleven days. Leaving Fort Rice on the 19th of July, marching up the Cannon Ball River for five days, nearly a west course, thence one day's march to the Heart River, 110 miles. At this point the main train, with 125 Idaho emigrant wagons that had followed us from Minnesota, were corralled, and, taking six days' rations in light wagons, started north in search of the Indian camp, reported to be on Knife River. On the third day after crossing Knife River we arrived in sight of the enemy's camp, located on a plateau, or succession of rough land, with great rugged buttes overhanging it. The position for defense and safety could not have been better, being protected in front by almost impassable wooded ravines, and in rear, as soon as the hills were ascended, through narrow chasms, they were safe from pursuit, except from dismounted men or the equally active Indian ponies belonging to the enemy. For particulars of the engagement please refer to my official report to Brigadier General Sully, of the date of July 28 and 29. Returned to Heart River July 30th, having marched in six days 172 miles, and fought the battle of Tah-kah-o-kuty.

Starting from this point August 3d, we reached the Little Missouri River August 7th, 83½ miles. At this point the Indians again made their appearance, and made some slight offensive demonstrations, which were easily quieted. The country for sixteen miles before reaching the river had been of the most terrible and indescribable character, and continued so for twenty miles beyond.

On the morning of the 8th of August, in making an egress from the river bottom, the battle of the Little Missouri, or "The Hills That Look at Each Other," commenced and was fought during that and the succeeding day. (A report of the operations of the brigade during the battles of that date enclosed.)

From the best information it has been ascertained that the Indians that were first encountered at Tah-kah-o-kuty had been largely reenforced by other bands and returned war parties, and had collected at this point to oppose us, and certainly felt confident, with the advantages of position (which could not have been better chosen), of an easy victory.

It certainly was the largest body of Indians ever assembled on the American Continent to fight a battle.

The Minnesota Brigade, having the advance in the battle of the 8th instant, had the honor of encountering this immense horde, and fighting nearly all of them through the day, whipping and driving them about twelve miles. Commencing at 7 A. M., the fight was continued until dark of a long summer day, without water, and the thermometer at 110 degrees in the shade. Over buttes, through ravines, rocks, and stones, the wild yells and rapid dashes of the savages, the troops pressed forward with a courage and untiring energy that rapidly overcame all obstacles, and night closed the wild wake, and the men laid down on their arms in line of battle, eager for the morning's light to again commence the work of death. Hundreds of the savages lay along the hillsides and ravines. Our loss was but seven wounded, and a few horses. During the 9th instant they entirely disappeared, and our march was continued to the Yellowstone River, over a country almost devoid of water or grass, and two-thirds rations for the men, a distance of 104 miles.

The remainder of Colonel Thomas' report, so far as it relates to the return march to Fort Rice, is substantially the same as the report of General Sully, given in former pages. Of his return march to Minnesota, Colonel Thomas gives but a brief account, as follows:

Having been relieved at Fort Rice from duty with the Northwestern Indian Expedition, the Minnesota Brigade started for Fort Wadsworth September 15th, marched by way of Long Lake, crossing the James River a few miles below the Bone Hills, and reaching Wadsworth September 26th, distance, 206 miles. Having been directed to relieve the battalion of the Thirtieth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry at this post, Major Rose, with companies B, C, D and H, Second Minnesota Cavalry, was detached for that purpose. Major Clowney's Battalion, on being relieved, joined the command, marching on the 26th of September, and reaching this post (Fort Ridgely) October 8th, four months and three days after our departure. In that time we have marched 1,625 miles. The behavior of both officers and men has been all that could be desired.

General Sully had left but a small force to guard the settlements during the absence of his expedition. There was, all told, about two hundred and forty soldiers distributed through the settlements between the Big Sioux River and Choteau Creek, a distance of 150 miles, and despite their unwearied vigilance, small bands of from three to ten bold hostiles would penetrate the patrol line, commit some depredations, inflame the mind of the settlers, and make their escape.

Governor Edmunds, for the purpose of preventing these damaging incursions, issued the following order:

The calamities which have recently fallen upon the border settlers in our neighboring territory, Nebraska, extending into the State of Kansas, from roving bands of hostile Indians, should admonish all citizens living on the border, or in the immediate vicinity of the Indian country, that, as a precautionary measure they should prepare to meet the wily foe. While I, at the present time, see no greater cause to apprehend an attack on our settlements than heretofore, still, inasmuch as roving bands of hostile Indians are committing depredations upon our neighbors, I have deemed it a matter of duty to call the attention of our citizens to this very important subject, that they may be fully advised, and take such steps as may be thought necessary to place themselves in the best possible state of defense.

Now, therefore, I, Newton Edmunds, governor and commander-in-chief of the militia of the territory, do order as follows, viz.:

All male citizens liable to perform militia duty under the laws of the territory are hereby ordered to assemble at the place and time designated below and enroll their names preparatory to being formed into companies. After the enrollment on the days designated the citizens thus enrolled will at once proceed to the election of officers to take command of the men enrolled at the various rendezvous. Each list of forty to sixty names will proceed to elect one captain, one first and second lieutenant, who will, upon a list being forwarded to the commander-in-chief at headquarters, be commissioned to the grades, respectively, to which they have been elected. Five sergeants and eight corporals will be allowed to be elected. Where sixty or more names are enrolled, two or more companies may be formed. The militia ment at all points will begin at 10 o'clock A. M. on Thursday, the 8th day of September, 1864, at the following named rendezvous:

Brule Creek, Union County, at Richland.
 Big Stone Point, Union County, at Twelve Mile Hotel.
 Elk Point, Union County, at Elk Point Hotel.
 Clay County, east of the Vermillion River, at Vermillion.
 Between the Vermillion and Dakota rivers, at Peter Emerson's.
 Yankton County, west of the Dakota River, at Yankton.
 Bon Homme County, already enrolled.
 Charles Mix County, at Major Haunnter's, near Fort Randall.
 Todd County, at the Ponea Agency.

Upon receiving notice of the enrollment and organization of companies, steps will be taken at once to distribute arms and ammunition to the various companies in proportion to the number enrolled and officers.

Witness my hand and the great seal of the territory, at Yankton, Dakota Territory,
 August 29, 1864.

[SEAL]

NEWTON EDMUNDS,
 Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Militia.

Attest:

JOHN HUTCHINSON, Secretary.

Lieut. T. Elwood Clark, of Company B, Dakota Cavalry, was left by General Sully in charge of the military stores at Yankton in 1864, and had also a command of forty-two men of the Sixth Iowa Volunteers. With this force he built a very substantial log fort about six miles southeast of Yankton, on James River. Its dimensions were liberal and intended to accommodate 100 soldiers. With his small force of soldiers and formidable fort, which he named Fort Hutchinson, he exerted a strong and favorable influence in allaying the anxiety of the settlers regarding the Indians, who continued to be disturbed by apprehensions of undersight raids, greatly hindering the settlement and improvement of the land. There was also a detachment of Iowa troops at Vermillion, and on the Big Sioux, at Brule Creek, was stationed Company M of the Sixth Iowa, who built a small fort and patrolled the country as far west as James River. Another small force was stationed at Sioux Falls, and still another at Turkey Creek crossing of the Sioux Falls and Yankton wagon road; in all 246 soldiers, who patrolled the country from the Big Sioux River to Choteau Creek. The presence of these troops and their efficient vigilance, together with the friendly and timely acts of the Yankton Indians, served in great measure to quiet the apprehensions of the exposed settlers, who were engaged in making farms and building homes on the prairies.

General Sully made the following disposition of troops in this military division for the winter by an order issued November 15, 1864.

One battalion of the Seventh Iowa Cavalry at Sioux Falls, Lieutenant Colonel Pattice commanding.

Companies E and F, same regiment, on the northern frontier of Iowa, in small detachments.

Company I, Sixth Iowa, and a detachment of Companies A and B, Dakota Cavalry, at Fort Yankton. This fort was six miles north on the James River.

Companies A and B, Dakota Cavalry, were assigned to duty at Vermillion, Bon Homme, Choteau Creek, Yankton Agency and Fort Randall. Headquarters Company A, Captain Mimer, at Vermillion; headquarters company B, Captain Tripp, Yankton Agency.

Companies A, L and M, Sixth Iowa, Fort Randall, Major Galligan commanding battalion; Colonel Pollock in command of the fort.

Companies of Iowa troops were stationed at Crow Creek; Lieutenant Berst, Fort Sully; Major Home in charge at Fort Berthold, Iowa troops.

This disposition of troops gave general satisfaction. There was little apprehension of Indian raids during the winter, and would have been none whatever had it been known that the hostile Indians had been so terribly defeated by Sibley and Sully during the summer, their arms and ammunition destroyed and themselves scattered in small bands along the upper river, eking out a bare and scanty living by begging at the military posts and from friendly Indian tribes.

Regarding the Indian wars in Dakota, beginning in 1862 and ending in 1864-65, one fact should be remembered. The immediate cause of Indian hostilities did not arise in Dakota. The war began with the Little Crow uprising and slaughter of whites in Minnesota in August of that year. Prior to 1862, the Dakota Indians had been on a peace footing with the whites and the Great Father for a score of years, and to all appearances seemed inclined to peaceful relations up to the time of the Minnesota massacre. But the hostile flame kindled in Minnesota spread with great rapidity until it enveloped the entire Sioux nation and threatened the peace of the entire Northwest. In magnitude it exceeded all the Indian wars in which our Government had been engaged; the wide theater embraced in the hostile country; the difficulties which confronted the armies sent to subdue the savages; the formidable character of the enemy in numbers, in confidence, skilled in warfare and well supplied with modern firearms—all gave the Indians an advantage they had never before possessed in their armed conflicts with the whites. If this condition was not more freely and generally recognized and acknowledged at the time, it was because of that much greater and more important conflict in which over two million of our countrymen were engaged during the same years, and which was conducted on a scale so stupendous as to dwarf the Indian troubles into an insignificant affair by comparison, as it also dwarfed all other wars our country had ever engaged in. It is highly creditable to the troops engaged and to those who managed these Indian campaigns and carried the war to such a successful conclusion, that they overcame all obstacles, and there were others nearly as formidable as the hostile Indians; restored to the nation peace on its vast northern and western frontiers and opened the way for the settlement and development of this great Northwest, which has proved such a tower of strength to the nation, and added so materially to its wealth and prosperity during all these succeeding years. The white people who had settled in Dakota contributed their full share to this creditable and gratifying result.

CHAPTER XXXIV

THE ELECTION OF 1864

ELECTION IN 1864—DIVISION IN THE REPUBLICAN LEADERSHIP—BURLEIGH AND BLISS FACTIONS—TWO REPUBLICAN CONVENTIONS—BLISS RELIES ON DEMOCRATIC SUPPORT, BUT GENERAL TODD DECIDES TO RUN—BLISS AND BURLEIGH COMPROMISE AND THE JUDGE LEAVES THE TERRITORY—BURLEIGH ELECTED; TODD GIVES NOTICE OF CONTEST—LEGISLATIVE INVESTIGATION—CONTEST WITHDRAWN.

Maj. Walter A. Burleigh, agent of the Yankton Indians, was an announced candidate for the office of delegate to Congress in the winter of 1863-64. The election would be held in September of that year, and Mr. Burleigh had managed his campaign so successfully that he had no opposition among the faction of the republican party which he was presumed to represent, which faction controlled the regular republican organization. There was, however, a very strong opposition among the republicans, not directed so much against Mr. Burleigh, as against the party which had been identified with Governor Jayne in his campaign against General Todd. This campaign had left a serious breach in the republican organization, which instead of healing over had gradually assumed a more formidable antagonism, until another organization was formed with Chief Justice Philemon Bliss as the standard-bearer. The national republican convention had been called to meet in Baltimore in June, 1864, to nominate a President and vice president. The regular, or Jayne, faction of the Dakota republicans had held their convention, to elect delegates to the national convention, in January, as previously noticed, and the rival organization headed by Judge Bliss had determined to hold a convention and also elect delegates. The political outlook in the spring of 1864 in the Dakota field revealed these two rival parties, both republican and nothing more. There was no democratic party in view, and it was an open secret that the democrats would not put a candidate in the field, but would leave the supporters of that party free to vote for whichever of the republican candidates they might prefer. It would seem that the majority of the democrats would naturally lean toward the Bliss faction, that gentleman having been considered friendly to General Todd in the previous contest, and this might have proven true, had Burleigh been an idle politician, which he was not; and as he had diagnosed the situation intelligently and correctly, he had secured many of the most active democrats among his recruits as one of his first successes and before any conventions were held. Up to this time, April, 1864, the Jayne-Todd contest before Congress had not been decided. Jayne had been given the seat pending the contest. Todd had the moral support of the Bliss republicans in Dakota and was anxious to retain it until the contest was over, in any event, and if he had any thought of being again a candidate in 1864, he was wise enough to conceal it. Todd's closest friends in his own party were those who were giving Judge Bliss and his partisans the utmost encouragement in his fight against the Jayne, or Burleigh, faction. They appreciated the advantage of having two republican candidates.

Among leading republicans, Burleigh was sustained by Governor Edmunds, General Hill, W. W. Brookings, the United States land officers, Boyle and Allen, of Vermillion, and George Stickney, of Elk Point, while Bliss had Attorney General Gleason, United States Marshal Pinney, Provost Marshal Waldron, Secretary Hutchinson, Major Dewitt and Byron Smith. Quite a number of democrats were also in the republican ranks, who had abandoned their old party on war issues, Enos Stutsman being the recognized leader of this element and a supporter of Doctor Burleigh.

It would seem that in accordance with the ordinary practice of political parties, and of an administration, the republican party of the nation would have recognized and given preference and support to one of the republican parties in Dakota and endeavored to strengthen it with the federal patronage, but for a great many years after the organization of the territory no such recognition was given, with the exception of the term when Mr. Johnson was President. It is true that the majority of territorial appointments had been given to the citizens of the states where the people were privileged to vote for President and could elect senators, a privilege denied to the territories, and yet a few crumbs fell to the territory, but were disposed of to those who were regulars, bolters or independents, as the case might be, in about equal proportion. It appears that from the standpoint of the appointing power the republicans of Dakota were engaged in a family quarrel in which neither faction could maintain a claim of superior fealty to the national organization, because all were alike strenuous in their profession of loyalty to the Union and support of the administration. This peculiar situation continued until Mr. Hayes became President in 1877, when there was something of an effort made to induce the new appointees from outside to use their influence to harmonize the warring elements, which was partially successful, for thereafter no appointments were made from citizens of the territory unless they were endorsed by the trusted advisers of the administration.

These factional differences in the republican party of Dakota grew to such antagonistic proportions during 1863 that the Dakotan newspaper at Yankton was no longer able to maintain a neutral position regarding these differences, and as Doctor Burleigh was part owner of the plant and a leader of the strongest faction, he desired the support of the paper, even at the expense of an open rupture with the Bliss element. This did not coincide with the views of the active partner, Mr. Kingsbury, and the result was an arrangement which placed the editorial department of the paper in the hands of a very able party, satisfactory to both factions, who was expected to bring about a peaceful and amicable adjustment of the difficulty. This task was given to Hon. Enos Stutsman, but he wearied of it after a few months of patient effort, having exhausted his supply of oil and accomplished nothing in the way of harmony. Rev. Albert Gore, of Union County, a Baptist clergyman, was then employed, and this was followed by the purchase of the entire plant by Mr. Burleigh, Mr. Kingsbury remaining for a time as the publisher. The Dakotan now took up the advocacy of Mr. Burleigh's nomination to the position of delegate to Congress, and opened its batteries rather pointedly, though mildly, upon the other factions.

This situation begot a desire on the part of the Bliss people for another paper that would defend their position, and the result was the purchase of a new printing plant and the establishment of the Dakota Union Newspaper in the spring of 1864, the first number of which was issued on the 10th of May of that year, with M. K. Armstrong as editor and G. W. Kingsbury as associate and publisher. The Dakota Union supported the Bliss faction. The democrats had no newspaper in Dakota, but the Sioux City Register, under Mr. William Freney, became their organ and accorded them able support.

A call was issued July 7th for a republican union territorial convention, of which the following is a copy:

The voters of Dakota who desire the unconditional maintenance of the Union, and the supremacy of the Constitution, and the complete suppression of the existing rebellion, with the causes thereof, by vigorous war and all apt and efficient means; also all persons that are opposed to the location by the speculators of Sioux half breed settlements on the lands to the prejudice of bona fide settlers, are invited to send delegates to a territorial convention.

to be held at Vermillion, on Wednesday, July 27, 1864, at 12 o'clock A. M., for the purpose of nominating candidates to be supported for delegate to Congress, territorial treasurer and auditor, and also to transact any other business that may properly come before the convention. The basis of representation will be as follows:

Union County, 8 delegates; Clay County, 9; Yankton County, 8; Bon Homme County, 3; Charles Mix County and Buffalo, 3; Todd and Gregory, 3; Company A, Dakota Cavalry, 1; Company B, Dakota Cavalry, 1.

The members of the territorial committee for each county will call the county conventions where there are no county committees. The committee would recommend that the different conventions be held the 23d day of July at 2 o'clock P. M.

W. W. BROOKINGS, Yankton.

L. BOTHUM, Clay.

Republican Union Territorial Committee.

TERRITORIAL CONVENTION, REPUBLICAN AND UNION PARTY

Pursuant to public notice, the republican and union territorial convention met at Vermillion on Wednesday, July 27, 1864. W. W. Brookings called the convention to order, after which a temporary organization was effected by the election of G. C. Moody, chairman; A. W. Puett, secretary.

The convention then proceeded to a permanent organization, and on the first ballot for president, A. W. Puett received twenty-four votes, and J. M. Allen, register of the United States land office, eight votes. Mr. Puett took the chair, and Mahlon Gore, of Union, was elected secretary, and B. A. Hill, same county, assistant secretary. On motion of W. W. Brookings, a Committee on Credentials was appointed, consisting of W. W. Brookings, John Mechlin, Michael Chaussee, Ole Bottolfson, Judson LaMoure and J. S. Kenyon. On motion the chair then appointed J. R. Hanson, D. Chaussee and G. C. Cole a Committee on Resolutions. The convention then adjourned ten minutes to give the committees time to make up their reports, and on being called to order, the Committee on Credentials reported the following named persons entitled to seats:

Union County—M. M. Rich, N. G. Curtis, Judson LaMoure, S. Goucher, D. Chaussee, Wm. Matthews, A. R. Phelps, Mahlon Gore. Clay County—C. N. Taylor, G. A. Jacobson, Ole Bottolfson, J. M. Allen, H. Compton, Wm. Shriner, Peter Nelson, A. W. Puett. Yankton County—J. R. Hanson, W. W. Brookings, G. N. Propper, J. M. Stone, W. Reed, C. F. Picotte, G. C. Moody, Ole Sampson. Bon Homme County—J. S. Kenyon, D. P. Bradford, G. C. Cole. Charles Mix County—C. E. Hedges, J. J. Thompson, John Mechlin. Todd County—J. A. Potter, J. Dillon, Wm. Keegan. Company B, Dakota Cavalry—T. Elwood Clark.

Mr. Clark then addressed the convention on the subject of citizen soldiers being represented in the convention and while advocating the right he deemed it his duty under the circumstances in this case, to decline to sit as a delegate.

The report of the committee was adopted.

The Committee on Resolutions submitted the following report:

Resolved, That it is the highest duty of every American citizen to maintain against all their enemies, the integrity of the Union and the paramount authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that laying aside all differences and political opinions, we pledge ourselves as Union men, animated by a common sentiment and aiming at a common object, to do everything in our power to aid the Government in quelling, by force of arms, the Rebellion now raging against its authority, and in bringing to the punishment due to their crimes, the rebels and traitors arrayed against it.

Resolved, That we approve the determination of the Government of the United States not to compromise with rebels, nor to offer any terms of peace except such as may be based upon an unconditional surrender of their hostility and a return to their first allegiance to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and we call upon the Government to maintain their position, and to prosecute the war with the utmost possible vigor to the complete suppression of the Rebellion, in full reliance upon the self-sacrificing patriotism, the heroic valor and the undying devotion of the American people to their country and its free institutions.

Resolved, That as slavery was the cause and now constitutes the strength of the Rebellion, and as it must be always and everywhere hostile to the principles of republican government, justice and the national safety demand its utter and complete extirpation from the soil of the republic, and while we uphold and maintain the acts and proclamations by which the Government, in its own defense, has aimed a death blow at this gigantic evil, we are in favor of, furthermore, such an amendment to the Constitution, to be made by the people in conformity with its provisions, as shall terminate and forever prohibit the existence of slavery within the limits of the jurisdiction of the United States.

Resolved, That we approve and applaud the practical wisdom, the unselfish patriotism, and the unswerving fidelity to the Constitution and the principles of American liberty, with which Abraham Lincoln has discharged, under circumstances of unparalleled difficulty, the great duties and responsibilities of the presidential office; that we approve and endorse, as demanded by the urgency, and essential to the preservation of the nation, and as within the provisions of the Constitution, the measures and acts which he has adopted to defend the nation against its open and secret foes; that we approve especially the proclamation of emancipation and the employment as Union soldiers of men heretofore held in slavery, and that we have full confidence in his determination to carry these and all other constitutional measures, essential to the elevation of the country, into full and complete effect.

Resolved, That we deem it essential to the general welfare that harmony shall prevail in the national councils, and we regard as worthy of public confidence and official trust those only who cordially endorse the principles proclaimed in these resolutions, and which should characterize the administration of our Government.

Resolved, That the Government owes to all men employed in its armies, without regard to distinction of color, the full protection of the laws of war, and that any violation of these laws or the usages of civilized nations in time of war, by the rebels now in arms, should be made the subject of prompt and full redress.

Resolved, That foreign emigration, which in the past has added so much to the wealth, development of resources and increase of power of this nation—the asylum of the oppressed of all nations—should be fostered and encouraged by a just policy.

Resolved, That we are in favor of the construction, speedily, of a railroad to the Pacific coast.

Resolved, That the national faith, pledged to the redemption of the public debt, must be kept inviolate; and for this purpose we recommend economy and rigid responsibility in the public expenditures, and a vigorous and just system of taxation, and that it is the duty of every loyal state to sustain the credit and promote the use of national currency.

That we approve the position taken by the Government, that the people of the United States can never regard with indifference the attempt of any European power to overthrow by force or to supplant by fraud, the institutions of any republican government on the Western Continent, and that they will view with extreme jealousy, as menacing to the peace and independence of their own country, the efforts of any such power to obtain new footholds for monarchical governments, sustained by a foreign military force, in near proximity to the United States.

That having come to Dakota to seek a home for ourselves and families, we deem it the first duty of every loyal citizen to do all in his power toward laying the foundation of a state that shall reflect honor upon the general government to which we owe unflinching allegiance, and to whose protecting care we are indebted for our prosperity and security.

Resolved, That as a matter of economy to the Government, and as affording also the only effectual means of security to our frontier settlements, we are in favor of the establishment of a line of military posts extending from Minnesota to the Platte River, which posts should be placed between the hostile Indians and our frontier population, and not beyond the unfriendly Indians as is at present the case; and as this matter is one of vital importance to our people, we will use every means in our power to accomplish it.

Resolved, That while we watch, with the deepest solicitude and interest, the efforts of our Government to save our Union from destruction, and while we would object to any lavish and unnecessary expenditure of the public treasure, we should not entirely lose sight of our local interests, or hesitate to ask of our parent Government, aid in certain important matters; therefore we are in favor of, and the nominee of this convention is pledged, if elected, to use his most vigorous efforts to secure such an amendment to the Pacific railroad bill as will give this territory the benefit of a branch of said road, and also to secure an appropriation to open a mail route from Dakota to Idaho.

Resolved, That we are in favor of the settlement of local questions, in the territory, by a majority of the legal voters in the manner prescribed by law.

Resolved, That we are opposed to all monopolies and private speculation, whereby the settlement of our territory is in the least retarded or the rights of its citizens abridged.

Resolved, That the right of suffrage is among our dearest and most sacred rights, that it should never be tampered with or trampled upon, and we do hereby condemn and utterly repudiate all improper interference with the elective franchise from whatever source it may emanate.

Resolved, That we welcome to our territory all those who have come among us to find homes for themselves and families, regardless of the lands from whence they came, and we pledge ourselves to extend to them the same rights and privileges that we are permitted to enjoy, and also to do all in our power to induce further immigration to our territory.

Resolved, That through the education of the masses of the people our free institutions are to be preserved, and therefore we pledge ourselves to do all in our power to sustain such a system of free schools and colleges as shall insure the free and liberal education of the rising generation in this territory.

Resolved, That the political party represented by this convention is the republican and union party of this territory, and the only political party in this territory that has sustained the administration of Abraham Lincoln for the last four years and during the terrible ordeal through which our country has been passing.

Resolved, That having adopted and proclaimed our platform and political creed, and placed in nomination our standard bearers for the coming campaign, we pledge ourselves to use all laudable efforts to secure their election on the second Tuesday of October next.

The report on resolutions was adopted.

Nominations being then in order, J. R. Hanson presented the name of W. A. Burleigh for the nomination as delegate to Congress, which was seconded, and no other name being presented, Mr. Burleigh was nominated by acclamation. I. T. Gore, of Union County, was nominated for territorial treasurer, and Charles LaBreche for territorial auditor.

On motion of George N. Propper, the president of the convention was instructed to notify Mr. Burleigh, by letter, of his nomination, whereupon the following notification was sent to the nominee:

Republican and Union Convention of Dakota Territory.

In Session at Vermillion, July 27, 1863.

Hon. W. A. Burleigh.

Sir: It affords me great pleasure to inform you that the convention has unanimously nominated you for delegate to Congress, and hope you will do us the honor to accept. Your answer, by letter, would be regarded as a favor.

Yours very truly,

A. W. PUETT, President of the Convention.

MR. BURLEIGH'S REPLY

Vermillion, Dakota Territory, July 27, 1864.

Hon. A. W. Puett, President Republican and Union Convention.

Sir: I have the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the present date, informing me of the action of the convention over which you have the honor to preside, in nominating me as the candidate of the republican and union party to represent this territory in Congress. I accept the nomination and tender to the convention, through you, my thanks for the honor conferred.

Respectfully and truly yours,

W. A. BURLEIGH.

On motion of Mr. Brookings, the delegates from the different counties were requested to select the names of proper persons for their counties for the territorial committee for the ensuing year, whereupon the following were selected:

Charles Mix County—Joseph V. Hamilton. Todd County—Joel A. Potter. Bon Homme County—H. C. Wood. Yankton County—J. R. Hanson. Clay County—Ole Bottolfson. Union County—R. S. Kenyon.

J. R. Hanson was appointed chairman of the committee.

On motion of Mr. Moody, it was decided that the proceedings of the convention be published in the Dakotian.

On motion of Mr. Brookings the convention adjourned.

MAHLON GORE, Secretary.

A. W. PUETT, Chairman.

Following the convention a ratification meeting was held at Vermillion the same day, at which addresses were made by Colonel Moody, Doctor Burleigh, Gen. G. D. Hill, Hon. Enos Stutsman and Geo. M. Pinney. In the course of his remarks, Doctor Burleigh, the nominee for Congress, referring to the platform adopted, said that he would "stand upon it until he could stand no longer, then to sit upon it, and should death cut him down destroying all his hopes and anticipations, he desired that his winding sheet might be the platform of the republican and union party of Dakota."

Mr. Geo. M. Pinney said he appeared to ratify the nominations of the the Baltimore convention; his sentiments were with the supporters of the Union; he stood with a large number of men who were yet free and uncommitted concerning the action of this convention; that he was not prepared to pledge support to the nominees of this convention. Mr. Pinney was the United States marshal, and while he had not avowed himself, was looked upon as friendly to Judge Bliss. Mr. Lincoln had been renominated at Baltimore, and this ratification gave him an opportunity to declare himself on national issues.

The purpose of giving the full text of the resolutions adopted is, principally, to show the paramount questions then engaging the attention of the people of the United States, and also to exhibit the advancement of public sentiment in favor of the abolition of slavery, which was now generally advocated by the friends of the Union. Union men began to regard slavery as the stronghold of the rebellious states. Such a proposition would have met with little open countenance in a republican union convention two years earlier, the position of the union leaders, as publicly declared, being not to disturb slavery where it existed under the sanction of state laws, but unalterably opposed to its extension. Now the public mind had become awakened to the recognition of slavery as the primary cause of the fraternal strife, and the mainstay of the rebellion; and this change in sentiment found expression through resolutions adopted by state conventions during this national campaign, and through thousands of public meetings.

THE ANTIS

The anti-Jayne-and-Burleigh wing of the republicans did not propose to be misrepresented, or not represented, at the National Union Convention to be held in Baltimore, in June; and inasmuch as the Burleigh wing had elected delegates to that most important gathering (in the estimation of federal office holders), during the legislative session in January preceding, the new organization now entered the field, under the title of the Union Party of Dakota Territory, in May, 1864, led by Chief Justice Bliss, Secretary Hutchinson, J. F. J. Dewitt, U. S. Attorney Gleason, Byron M. Smith, Geo. P. Waldron, U. S. Provost Marshal and others, republicans, and issued the following call:

UNION CONVENTION

A territorial union convention will be held in Yankton on the 23d day of May, inst., to elect a delegate to the national union convention to be held at Baltimore on the 7th of June next, and for other purposes. All citizens who are in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war, and of sustaining the administration in its efforts to restore the Union, and who are opposed to the frauds and the illegal tampering with the ballot box that have disgraced our young territory, are requested to meet in their respective assembly districts, on the 2d inst., and elect delegates to said convention. Each county or district is entitled to as many delegates as it has members of the council and House of Representatives.

T. C. WALSON,
JOSEPH LEBARGE,
JACOB DEUEL,
JOHN GOEWLY,
A. G. FULLER,

G. W. PRATT,
P. BOCK,
JOHN HUTCHINSON,
J. HELLMAN,

Territorial Central Committee.

Pursuant to the above call the chosen delegates from the various districts in the territory, met in convention at the capitol building in Yankton, at 2 o'clock, on Monday, the 23d of May. The convention was organized by the election of Chief Justice Bliss, chairman; and B. M. Smith, secretary. The roll being called every assembly district in the territory was found to be represented.

The following resolutions were then presented:

Whereas, A presidential election is approaching and the loyal citizens throughout the country are organizing for the purpose of preventing the Government from falling into the hands of sympathizers with rebels; and,

Whereas, The people of Dakota, who desire the success of the union party, and wish the restoration of our Government to its former greatness and dignity, while they have no voice in the election of a president, should act in harmony with the national union party, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the present rebellion is putting to the test the experiment of a republican form of government; and that our armies must prevail on our free institutions remain, and therefore, while we are struggling for our national existence, we should lay aside all party ties, persons, and all minor questions, and never for a moment entertain thoughts of concession to traitors.

Resolved, That every state now in rebellion should be brought back and made to recognize the supremacy of the national Constitution.

Resolved, That slavery was directly or indirectly the cause of the present rebellion, and therefore to guard against a second occurrence of the crime, it should be blotted out, and the Constitution so amended as not to tolerate it within the boundaries of the United States.

Resolved, That the barbarous massacre of our soldiers by the rebels, at the capture of Fort Pillow, and at various other places, calls for the severest retaliation.

Resolved, That we cordially approve of the policy pursued by Abraham Lincoln, as chief magistrate of the nation, deeming his administration thus far, as characterized by wisdom, integrity, and unselfish devotion to our common country.

Resolved, That in our Indian relations, we demand prompt punishment for all Indian aggressions, and at the same time the most scrupulous good faith in our treatment of them, conceding that all men have rights which we are bound to respect.

Resolved, That we are opposed to the disfranchisement of our citizen soldiers, however remote they may be, and any attempt to deprive them of their just rights will meet with our earnest protest.

Resolved, That while we shall act in concert with the union party throughout the country, we are not unmindful of our duty at home, and we will at all times oppose and condemn the repeated outrages upon the elective franchise—that sacred privilege of an American citizen—so often practiced by corrupt politicians in this territory, and we pledge ourselves to protect the purity of the ballot box against a repetition of the ballot box stuffing and fraudulent voting, which have so disgraced our territory.

Resolved, That we cordially and earnestly invite all classes of our citizens throughout this territory, without regard to past political party preferences, to join with us for the purpose of promoting the sentiments expressed in these resolutions, also for the purpose of more thoroughly organizing the union party of Dakota, and as such, to cooperate with the national union party of our common country.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted, and declared to be the platform of the union party of Dakota Territory.

On motion, Attorney General William E. Gleason was elected delegate to the Baltimore convention, and Judge L. P. Williston as substitute. Judge P. Bliss was elected chairman of the territorial central committee. The convention then, on motion, adjourned in peace and harmony.

B. M. SMITH, Secretary.

P. BLISS, Chairman.

The purpose of the union party organization was to place in the field a republican candidate for delegate to Congress, in opposition to Candidate Burleigh, the nominee of the republican and union party. This movement discloses the fact that the federal officials of the territory were seriously divided, each faction striving for such recognition by the administration at Washington, as would give them control of the political patronage of the territory and put the seal of approval on their party legitimacy. It was one of those factional differences that were a feature of the political machinery of all the territories, and have become very much in vogue in many of the states.

Doctor Burleigh was by far the strongest personality in either faction and had numerous influential friends at Washington. Chief Justice Bliss was effectually supported by Hon. Salmon P. Chase, secretary of the treasury, afterwards chief justice of the United States; Secretary Hutchinson had been appointed on the recommendation of Hon. Wm. H. Seward, secretary of state; Attorney General Gleason was backed by Sen. Henry Winter Davis, of Maryland, himself a powerful leader of a faction in the national party considered ultra radical.

While the Burleigh faction had the regular republican organization, the recalcitrants and new party men who were federal office holders, owing to their strong political backing, were in little danger of being ousted from their positions through the influence of the regulars. Whenever the Washington authorities referred to Dakota politics, they were accustomed to end the discussion with the comment that "one faction was just as bad as the other." This union party, however, did not progress to the point of holding a nominating convention, their plans having been frustrated completely by the unexpected candidacy of General Todd.

We now come to the final chapter of the proceedings of this factional contest. Yesterday the members of each faction were bitterly denouncing one another as political fiends incarnate; today they are greeting each other as old friends do when meeting after a long separation, with hearty handshakes and other evidences of cordial friendship. The supposedly impossible has come to pass, and the factions have disappeared—they are now united and invincible. This sudden and harmonious blending of these hitherto hostile elements was not occasioned by any proposal for peace from either faction, but was the effect of General Todd's announcement that he would be again a candidate, he having in the meantime been given the seat in Congress occupied by Governor Jayne. Soon after this declaration had been made public, the citizens of the territory were treated to a surprise in the form of the subjoined call for a new republican territorial mass convention:

TERRITORIAL MASS CONVENTION

Whereas, Differences have arisen among the friends of the administration in the Territory of Dakota; therefore the undersigned members of the central committees of the parties known as "the republican and union party" and the "union party" of said territory, with the view of adjusting these differences and more thoroughly organizing a union party in this territory, do cordially invite all those who are in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war until the roar of rebel artillery is forever silenced and the supremacy of the Constitution and Government of the United States is established in every state and territory thereof, and who are in favor of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States blotting out slavery—the cause of the rebellion—to assemble in mass convention at Vermillion on the 10th day of September, 1864, at 12 o'clock M., and unite in an unbroken political column, thereby forming a national union party in the Territory of Dakota. It is sincerely and earnestly hoped that all loyal and patriotic citizens of this territory will heartily unite in supporting those great principles for which our Government is contending, and in burying at once and forever those differences which have been so detrimental to the Union cause in Dakota.

J. R. HANSON,
Chairman of the Central Committee of the Republican and Union Party of the Territory of Dakota.

P. BLISS,
Chairman of the Central Committee of the Union Party of the Territory of Dakota.

This call was responded to by a numerous gathering at Vermillion on the date announced, when the following proceedings were had:

Vermillion, Dakota Territory, September 10th, 1864.

Agreeably to published call, members of the "republican union party" and of the "union party" of the Territory of Dakota, assembled in mass convention at Vermillion, Dakota Territory, on the 10th of September, 1864, for the purpose of amicably adjusting past differences of opinion and forming a national union party within the territory.

At 2:30 o'clock P. M., the convention was called to order by J. R. Hanson, when on motion of George M. Pinney, Maj. St. A. D. Balcombe, of Buffalo County (United States Indian agent at Fort Thompson), was chosen permanent chairman, and Messrs. A. W. Puett and J. R. Hanson were chosen secretaries.

Mr. Pinney then offered the name of Samuel Grant, of Bon Homme County, for territorial auditor in place of Charles LaBreche, who had declined the nomination of the first convention, and Mr. Grant was unanimously nominated.

A committee of one from each county was then, on motion, appointed to draft a platform and party name, to wit: Yankton County, George M. Pinney; Union County, J. W. Seward; Clay County, Hans Gunderson; Bon Homme County, Laban H. Litchfield; Buffalo County, E. J. Dewitt; Charles Mix County, Charles E. Hedges. After a brief session the committee reported the platform adopted by the republican and union convention, omitting all reference to the factional differences that had divided the party, and adopting for the name of the united organization, the "national union party of Dakota," "national union" being the title adopted at the Baltimore convention that renominated Abraham Lincoln, and nominated Andrew Johnson for vice president. The platform was adopted. The following resolutions were then presented and adopted:

That the nomination of Hon. Walter A. Burleigh, as candidate for the office of delegate to the Forty-ninth Congress of the United States, and the nomination of L. F. Gots, Esq., as candidate for the office of territorial treasurer, made on the 27th day of July, 1864, are hereby approved and declared to be the unanimous nominees of this convention. Dr. Abram Van Osdel, of Yankton County, then introduced the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the thanks of this convention are justly due to Hon. Platenon Bliss, chief justice of the territory, for the able and impartial manner in which he has discharged the duties of his office, and for his earnest and efficient efforts in advancing the Union cause in this territory, and that we cheerfully and heartily commend him to our Union friends in Missouri, where he will be engaged during this presidential campaign, in behalf of the cause of our common country, as an upright, consistent republican and patriot, one who will be honored where he is known for the purity of his principles and character.

On motion, the following named persons were then selected to form a territorial central committee: Yankton County, J. R. Hanson, chairman; A. Van Osdel; Clay County, Ole Bottolfson, H. C. Buckley; Union County, D. Ross, Captain LeGro; Bon Homme County, C. Wood, L. H. Litchfield; Buffalo County, St. A. D. Balcombe, F. J. Dewitt; Charles Mix County, J. V. Hamilton; Todd County, Joel A. Potter.

The convention was then addressed by Hon. Walter A. Burleigh.

The following letter was then read, and on motion of Mr. Pinney, ordered spread on the minutes of the convention:

Gentlemen: Urgent business prevents me from being with you upon this commendable occasion of the reunion of the republicans of Dakota. Having participated in a slight degree in the dissensions of our party, it may not be out of place to give my hearty affirmation of the course now taken. This I most cheerfully do, and hope that henceforward the onward march of the united national union party of Dakota may be one of triumph, guided by integrity and wisdom. The past has surely vindicated this truth, that in union is there strength and victory, and only by many sacrifices of feeling and forbearance, can we hope to perpetuate a united party, and thus contribute towards strengthening and sustaining the million loyal hearts—men now periling their lives for the preservation of our national Government.

G. W. KINGSBURY.

On motion, the convention then adjourned.

St. A. D. BALCOMBE, Chairman.

A. W. PUETT and J. R. HANSON, Secretaries.

Maj. St. A. D. Balcombe, who was chairman of this convention, was the United States Indian agent at the Winnebago Agency at Crow Creek; he was appointed from Minnesota, and had been a member of the constitutional convention of that state representing in part the district of which southern portion of Dakota Territory formed a part. He left Dakota a year or two later, removed to Omaha, where he established the Omaha Republican.

Chief Justice Bliss, who had retired from the field as a congressional aspirant, and was a party to the amicable arrangement which united the republicans of Dakota, had already arranged to leave the territory and resign his judgeship. He left Yankton August 10th, on the Steamer Tempest, accompanied by Mrs. Bliss and a daughter, for St. Joseph, Missouri, where he intended to take up editorial work on one of the daily papers of that city. He never returned to Dakota, but remained in Missouri, became somewhat prominent as a lawyer and was a candidate, a few years later, for supreme judge, on the republican ticket, and was unsuccessful. He died at St. Joseph.

General Todd, having concluded to be a candidate, had no difficulty in rallying a numerous body of his old friends to his support, though there was considerable disappointment felt by many of them, that he had not pursued such a course as would have continued the factional division in the republican ranks. It was a presidential year, however, and the democrats were sanguine that McClellan would be elected, in which event General Todd, even if defeated in the race for delegate, would be in a position of influence at Washington, and the roster of Dakota officials would be changed. This argument was unanswerable, and led to the calling of a people's convention, without much formality. It was called by a committee of the general's friends, and was attended by representatives from all the organized counties, to-wit: Union, Clay, Yankton, Bon Homme, Charles Mix and Todd. After the convention, the following brief announcement was gleaned from the Vermillion Republican:

The territorial people's union convention met at Vermillion on Saturday, September 3, 1864, and placed in nomination Gen. J. B. S. Todd as a candidate for delegate to Congress.

This convention was only briefly referred to by the two newspapers published in the territory—the Dakotian at Yankton and the Republican at Vermillion. The proceedings or the names of the delegates were not given. The people's or democratic party had no representative newspaper in the territory during the '60s and the proceedings of their conventions sometimes failed of publication in the opposition press, owing at times to the difficulty of securing such proceedings; but generally due to the peculiar complexion given to political matters by the armed conflict then raging between the Government and the seceded states.

forbidding in great measure any desire for courtesies on the part of the members of either political party, especially as the issue in the nation at large was no less momentous than was announced in the platforms of the opposing national parties, substantially as follows: By the republicans or unconditional union party—"For a vigorous prosecution of the war until the rebels lay down their arms and return to their allegiance to the Government." And by the democrats, who likewise declared for the Union, but also declared substantially, "That the war for the preservation of the Union is a failure." Which was regarded as equivalent to an announcement that the democratic party, if successful, would stop the war so far as the Government had the power to stop it, and enter upon negotiations with the rebellious people for peace by concessions that would give to the insurgents ample justification for their armed efforts to destroy the Union. To what extent a policy of this kind was intended by the democratic leaders was never known, as Mr. Lincoln was re-elected; a result loudly regretted by the leaders of the Southern Confederacy, and their northern sympathizers.

The campaign following in the territory was brief and energetic. There was general confidence in Burleigh's success, now that he had the united support of his party; notwithstanding that gentleman and his supporters insisted upon a liberal canvass of the territory as a courtesy due the voters and to enable many stump orators to become acquainted with the people whose suffrages they might have occasion to solicit in the future.

The people's party also made an energetic campaign, led by General Todd, aided by M. K. Armstrong, of Yankton; Hon. John H. Shober, of Bon Homme; Hon. J. W. Turner, of Clay; Austin Cole, of Union; and Maj. W. P. Lyman, of Yankton.

It may not be amiss, by way of explanation, at this day remote from the time of the Burleigh and Bliss compromise, to state that the ending of the rupture between the republican factions was due to the unexpected position taken by General Todd and his supporters. It had been understood that the democratic or people's party would make no nomination, leaving the democratic voter free to support Judge Bliss because of his position in the Jayne-Todd contest. There was no formal agreement to this effect simply a strongly implied understanding and sufficient to encourage Bliss's friends to organize as has been seen.

This organization of the Bliss wing was afterwards thought to have been premature, and an unwise political move, for it conveyed to the democratic mind evidence that the republicans were hopelessly divided, and could not unite, hence an excellent guarantee that a democrat would win. The organization by the friends of Bliss would have been longer delayed but for the supposed importance of electing a delegate to the national convention, which was to give the Bliss faction standing in the national party. Judge Bliss was keenly disappointed when he was compelled, finally, to acknowledge that he could expect no support from the Todd party, for it was apparent that at least two-thirds of the republicans were supporting Burleigh. Bliss's republican friends were no less disappointed and chagrined at what they declared to be the insincerity and ingratitude of the democrats. This feeling of disappointment coupled with an ingredient of wrath and revenge, led the way to a harmonious patching up of the difficulties in the republican party.

Judge Bliss was not satisfied with his judicial position in the territory, and but for the inducement of a seat in Congress, he would have returned East at an earlier day and given up his judgeship. This factional compromise made a consolidation of the newspapers, The Dakotian and the Dakota Union, necessary. The Dakota Union ceased until after the election, the Dakotian continuing under Mr. Gore's management until that event, which occurred in October, soon after which the consolidated Union and Dakotian appeared with Mr. M. K. Armstrong as editor, and Mr. G. W. Kingsbury as publisher.

The election came off on Monday, October 11th, and resulted in the election of Doctor Burleigh and the republican legislative ticket by a fair majority. The tor Burleigh receiving 386 votes, and General Todd 222, out of a total of 608 votes cast and canvassed for delegate.

After the vote had been canvassed, and Burleigh declared elected, General Todd served notice upon the successful candidate that he would contest his right to the seat on the grounds

First. That Burleigh was not a resident of the territory.

Second. That the votes cast on the Indian reservations were illegal.

Third. That the election was characterized by bribery and fraud.

Fourth. That the Board of Canvassers proceeded to canvass the votes from the different precincts before they were all in, and that the secretary of the territory did not send for other returns as the law requires; that the Fort Laramie votes were not counted and that Mr. Todd received 107 votes there; that there were illegal votes cast, and that adding the Fort Laramie vote to Todd's and deducting the illegal votes from Burleigh, it would leave him, Todd, with a majority of the votes cast.

The Jayne and Todd contest, revealing so much disregard of law in conducting Dakota elections, and the factional differences in the republican party of the territory which were very obnoxious to the republicans in Congress and the President and his advisors, had awakened a resentful feeling among congressmen and others, and there were intimations given of a move to annex Dakota to Nebraska and repeal the Organic Act. This suggestion was as unpopular among the democrats of the territory as among those of the other party. Todd's contest, therefore, even if based upon tenable grounds, was disapproved in Dakota because of the fear that it would arouse such an antagonism in Congress that the threat of disorganizing would be attempted, at least, which would prove very detrimental to immigration and practically destroy the credit of the territory. While it was apparent that Burleigh would in all probability be able to retain his seat, the sentiment of the people apprehended that Congress might conclude to repeal the Organic Act rather than be annoyed with the factional and sectional quarrels of the handful of people in the territory which at this time was looked upon by the great majority of congressmen as an experiment station in the great American desert, and its value as an agricultural region was regarded with many misgivings.

This matter of contest was made the subject of non-partisan investigation by the Legislature of 1864-5, following the election, and the result was the adoption of a joint resolution declaring that Todd had begun the contest without the "slightest grounds for so doing." The resolution recited the facts that the election was openly and fairly conducted; that no precinct was established at Fort Laramie and no returns of any election there had been received by the board of canvassers; and also that an election had been held at St. Joseph and Pembina on the Red River and 135 votes cast for Burleigh, which were not counted by the board, no precincts having been established there. That Burleigh was an actual resident of Bon Homme County, where his family resided in a very comfortable home.

A minority report was submitted, or rather a substitute resolution was offered by the minority, which conceded the fairness of the election and the regularity of the canvass; that no just grounds of contest appeared, and substantially disapproving of further proceedings in the contest.

The majority report was adopted by a vote of eleven to two, in the council, and twenty-one to five in the House. This legislative action may not have dissuaded the contestant from further prosecuting his case, but there were no further steps taken by him in contest proceedings. It was understood, however, that General Todd and Major Burleigh had held a council of amity where it was arranged that Burleigh would not endeavor to prejudice the interests of Frost, Todd & Co., in their disputed townsite and land cases then pending before the department of the interior, and the general would desist from further hostilities.

Regarding the matter of residence, the two candidates occupied similar positions. Mr. Burleigh, in the eyes of the law, resided on the Yankton Indian Reservation, as the United States agent of that Indian tribe; and General Todd, with his family, had from the time he entered civil life, resided at Fort Randall on the United States Military Reservation, and he had his residence there at this time. Neither party may have never gained a residence in the territory, under a strict construction of the law; but it was not definitely settled that a delegate in Congress must be a resident of the territory. The decision in the Minnesota case, after that state was admitted, rather favored the claim that a non-resident could be elected and would be awarded the seat.

The national convention of the democratic party was held in Chicago, August 27, 1864, when Gen. Geo. B. McClellan, of Illinois, was nominated for President, and Hon. Isaac Pendleton, of Indiana, for vice president. The delegates from Dakota were John H. Shober, of Bon Homme County, and Hon. James McHenry, of Clay County.

The national convention of the national union party was held in Baltimore, Maryland, June 25, 1864, and nominated Abraham Lincoln for President, and Andrew Johnson for vice president. George M. Pinney and William E. Gleason represented the Territory of Dakota; the former from the Burleigh wing and the latter from the Bliss pinion.

CHAPTER XXXV

THE FOURTH SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE

1864-65

ITS MEMBERSHIP—SKETCH OF NEW MEMBERS—A HARMONIOUS SESSION—THE GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE—REPORT OF THE TERRITORIAL SUPERINTENDENT OF SCHOOLS—TERRITORIAL AUDITOR'S REPORT, INCLUDING REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER TO AUDIT THE MILITIA ACCOUNTS—GENERAL TODD'S GROUNDS OF CONTEST.

The fourth session of the Legislative Assembly of Dakota Territory convened at the capitol building in Yankton, on Monday, December 5, 1864. The council was composed of the same members that constituted the Council of 1863, namely:

Union County—John Mathers, M. M. Rich and J. O. Taylor; Clay County—Franklin Taylor, Lasse Bothun and F. W. Thompson; Yankton County—Enos Stutsman, James M. Stone and George W. Kingsbury; Bon Homme County—Daniel P. Bradford; Charles Mix County—John J. Thompson; Todd and Gregory counties—J. Shaw Gregory.

Mr. Kingsbury called the council to order, and nominated Hon. J. Shaw Gregory for temporary president, who was duly elected and took the chair. The president then called the roll of members, which was responded to by the councilmen as above given. Mr. Kingsbury was then elected temporary secretary. And the council proceeded and permanently organized by electing the following officers: President of the council, Enos Stutsman, Yankton County; secretary of the council, George N. Propper, Yankton County; assistant secretary, James B. Gayton, Todd County; sergeant-at-arms, Carlos Kingsley, Union County; messenger, Mons Bothun, Clay County; fireman, William H. Werdebaugh, Yankton County; chaplain, Rev. L. P. Judson, Bon Homme County.

The house was composed of new members elected at the general election held October 11, 1864, namely: Union County—Peter Lemouges, Geo. W. Kellog, Archibald Christy, George Stickney, Helge Mathews; Clay County—William Shriner, G. W. Pratt, J. P. Burgman, B. M. Collar, J. W. Turner, Knut Weeks; Yankton County—W. W. Brookings, John Lawrence, Washington Reed, J. R. Hanson, M. M. Mathieson; Bon Homme County—John W. Owens, John Rouse; Todd County—Francis McCarthy, Peter Kegan; Charles Mix County—E. W. Wall, Felicia Fallas. W. W. Brookings was elected speaker; Geo. I. Foster, of Yankton, chief clerk; Leonidas Congleton, of Yankton, assistant clerk; R. P. Raimie, of Union, sergeant-at-arms; Erick Nelson, of Clay, messenger; Peter Nelson, of Clay, fireman; Rev. Melancthon Hoyt, chaplain.

There were two seats held by Clay County members that were contested. Halver Burgess was contestant for the seat of J. W. Turner, and Aaron Carpenter gave notice through Mr. Shriner that he would contest the seat of Knut Weeks; also through Mr. Stickney, of Union, E. M. Bond gave notice that he would contest the election of Knut Weeks.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE

On the third day of the session the annual message of the governor was received by the two houses in joint convention, and read, as follows:

To the Honorable the Council and House of Representatives:

Gentlemen—Since the assembling of the last Legislature, a year ago today, important events in our country's history have been of almost daily occurrence; among the most noteworthy of which is the rapid progress which has been made toward the suppression of the most gigantic rebellion which the world ever saw, and I think we may now confidently anticipate that the end will soon come.

Our first duty is to return thanks to the Great Ruler of the Universe for the preservation of our lives and health; for the return of seed-time and harvest in their due season.

Progress of the Indian War—Since the breaking out of the Indian war in Minnesota, two years ago last August, but little progress has, in my opinion, been made towards its extinguishment. I believe this fact to be owing to the extent of the country over which these hostile Indians roam, rather than a want of appreciation on the part of the officers placed in charge of the various expeditions, of the magnitude and extent of the difficulties to be overcome in order to so punish the Indians as to bring about a speedy and permanent peace.

Of the three campaigns made against these hostile Indians, one under General Sibley, of Minnesota, in 1863, and two under General Sully, starting from Sioux City, Iowa, one in 1863, and one in 1864, I am fully convinced that little if anything has been accomplished towards the subjugation of them. These expeditions have been immensely expensive to the Government, and ought, in my opinion, to have brought about more decided results. I am not prepared to say why they were failures; I leave this subject to the war department where it properly belongs.

The effect of the continuance of this war upon the prosperity of this territory has been most damaging and deleterious. It has retarded its settlement and development to an extent unprecedented in the history of the early settlements of any of our Northwestern territories. It has confined our settlers to narrow limits bordering the Missouri River; and those of necessity have had to confine their operations, for mutual safety and protection, to little towns at intervals of a few miles, in order to retain possession of the country, it not being safe at any time for the past two years to reside at a distance from the towns by reason of the prevalence of roving bands of hostile Indians, who seem ever present and ready to steal the horses and stock of our settlers, and kill the owners in cases where resistance is made. Our various settlements can but be looked upon as a picket guard to hold this country until such time as peace can be restored between the Government and these Indians. I believe that a chain of small military posts crossing the country from Lake Shetek, in the State of Minnesota, intersecting the Missouri River at or near the Crow Creek Agency, located at such convenient distances as to enable the country to be daily patrolled between these posts, will not only afford ample and perfect protection to our settlers, but is all that is required to bring about a speedy and permanent peace; provided, disloyal and unscrupulous men are barred from visiting these Indians, and carrying into their country whiskey, powder and lead, and all articles made contraband by the laws of Congress. Five hundred cavalry, properly distributed at the various posts indicated, under command of officers who are desirous of protecting the settlements, I believe to be sufficient to afford perfect protection.

Should this course be adopted by the War Department, and be found to answer the purpose, the immense expense attending the sending of the large expeditions into the hostile country may in the future be avoided. At any rate there seems to me to be propriety in making a change of some kind, by which we may, if possible, avoid taxing the government with another of these unwieldy and immensely expensive expeditions with no adequate results towards bringing about a peace, judging by the past. I would therefore recommend that you memorialize the secretary of war, urging upon him the importance of the early establishment of the chain of military posts indicated.

Route to the Gold Mines. In my last annual message I took occasion to call the attention of the Legislature to the importance of securing a route to the gold mines of Idaho through the settled or southeastern portion of this territory. The importance of opening such a route has not in any way diminished since that time. On the contrary the organization of the new Territory of Montana and the new discoveries of rich deposits of the precious metals in the vicinity of the eastern base of the Rocky Mountains clearly indicate the importance and point to the necessity of the speedy opening of the route indicated. The last session of Congress, foreseeing the importance of this route, from a desire to promote and foster the development of this section of the country, appropriated $200,000 towards the opening of the route indicated, to be expended under direction of the war department. Unfortunately for the interests of this section of the country, the expenditure of this sum was committed to Major Maynadier, who from some cause, best known to himself, after entering upon the discharge of his important trust and expending a portion of the appropriation perhaps all of it did not even get onto the ground or commence the examination of the route. It is unfortunate that the war department could not have better consulted the interests not only of our citizens, but also the citizens of Montana, in the selection of an officer to expend this appropriation who, either from motives of pride or a sense of duty, would at least have got onto the route and given the eastern portion of it, for 150 or 200 miles at any rate, a personal examination, which could have been done without any risk to that officer, even though he had been entirely unattended by a personal guard; the contemplated route for this distance passing through a section of country having been infested by hostile Indians the past two years. The first 200 miles of this route contemplated by Congress could have been pretty thoroughly examined and reported upon at an expenditure of $1,000, and in my opinion had a fair comparison been made in the report between this route and the route known as the Captain Fisk route, which passed through Central Dakota, the result would have been the abandonment by Congress of the Central or Fisk route, and the placing of all future appropriations on the Southern Dakota or Niobrara route. Indeed, it is not improbable that this may be the case, upon the report of Brigadier General Sully, who was specially instructed by the war department to report upon the practicability of the Central Dakota route, and who, I am informed, reports the route entirely impracticable.

The influence which the early opening of this route through Southern Dakota to the gold fields of Montana and Idaho, and the securing of the immense through travel (the large portion of which now passes up the Platte River, through our neighboring Territory of Nebraska) on it, by reason of the distance saved and its proximity to abundance of good wood and water, towards securing the location of the northern branch of the Pacific Railroad, cannot be overestimated by our people. Indeed, I believe it to be the first and most important step to be taken in securing this first very important branch road to our territory. I would therefore recommend that you early memorialize Congress on this subject, with a view to securing a liberal appropriation to aid in opening this important line of wagon road, via Niobrara or Fort Randall, and the foot of the Black Hills, to Montana and Idaho.

Black Hills.—It is believed by persons familiar with the country in the vicinity of the Black Hills that the country abounds not only with the precious metals (gold and silver), but that copper, iron and coal exist to an unlimited extent. Indeed, rich specimens of iron and copper have been brought into the settlement by friendly Indians from this section of the country, and the bed of the Niobrara River abounds with specimens of stone coal. It is believed that a thorough geological survey of that portion of our territory will establish the existence of large and rich deposits of the minerals above named, and not only this, but that this section of the country is capable of supplying for all time to come, not only our own settlers, but all Northwest Iowa, with all the pine lumber needed for the future development and improvement of the country. This fact is abundantly established by explorations already made.

Appropriation for Military Road.—Congress at its last session generously appropriated $15,000 toward the opening of a military road from Sioux City, Iowa, to Fort Randall. It is believed that this sum, if properly expended, at such points along the line of road as most need improvement, will be sufficient to open a road which may be traveled at all times of year with facility, and will not only vastly aid the Government in its military operations, but will also be a permanent benefit to our citizens, and inasmuch as the appropriation is placed at the disposal of Capt. S. Bagg, chief quartermaster of this military district, who is familiar with the country over which this road passes, I have thought it would not be improper for the Legislature to suggest to Captain Bagg the improvement of such points along the line as may be deemed of most importance and likely to secure to the people a good thoroughfare at all seasons of the year.

Taxes.—I wish especially to call your attention to the very lax manner in which, in many cases, the various county officers in the territory have discharged their public duties. The first Legislature passed a law creating certain county offices and defining their powers and duties, and it was undoubtedly the design of that Legislature that the persons appointed by the governor, as well as those subsequently elected to fill these various offices, should faithfully discharge their duties during the time for which they were appointed or elected. This in very many instances has not been done, and our citizens have been subjected to great inconvenience on this account, and in some instances these officers have entirely neglected their duties. I attribute much of this negligence to the fact that no means have as yet been provided by the different organized counties to pay current expenses, and the feeling on the part of some of the officers that it would be long before they would be paid for their services, that they would not devote the necessary time to discharge their public duties. The consequence has been that in many instances the people have been unable to get these officers to act. I submit to you whether it would not be well, in view of the embarrassments which have heretofore been experienced on this account, to pass a law compelling not only the discharge of official duties by all civil officers in the territory, but also providing by law for the levy and collection of a sufficient tax to meet these necessary expenses at the time they are incurred. The day cannot now be far distant when all the county offices will not only be self-sustaining, but will be sought for with avidity by our citizens for the emoluments there are in them. It seems to me that the time has now arrived when we should take steps to perfect and put in running order our internal machinery, even though to do so we have to submit to be lightly taxed for that purpose. The burdens of government have thus far fallen lightly upon us as a people and it appears to me that we can now afford to come forward and assume our share of the necessary burdens, for the sake of the satisfaction of feeling that we are paying our way as we go. I feel confident our citizens are not only willing, but desirous, that all who labor for the public weal should be remunerated for the time necessarily devoted to the discharge of their public duties.

During the year last past important acquisitions have been made to the territory by the arrival and permanent settlement of an intelligent, industrious and hardy population from the eastern and middle states, and the rapid improvement made in the settled portions of the territory gives us a sure indication that we have not only passed the crisis in our territorial affairs, but that from now on our march will be onward and upward in the acquisition of population, wealth and improvement, until ere long we shall be knocking at the door of the Union, fully prepared to take our place in the line of loyal and free states so rapidly being formed under the auspices of our beneficent, liberal and enlightened general Government. Should peace and confidence soon be reestablished between the Government and our red brethren, we may, I think, confidently anticipate such an influx of immigration at no distant day as to forever set at rest all apprehensions of a renewal of hostilities on the part of our red neighbors—a result most ardently desired by all who are permanent settlers in Dakota.

It would appear from examination of the laws, passed at first session of the Legislature, chapter 9, section 164, that that Legislature contemplated calling to its assistance the judges of the Supreme and District courts of the territory, for the purpose of securing their aid in harmonizing disagreeing provisions of the statutes. I believe this to be not only a good but a very wise provision, though the judges heretofore have not seen fit to present their views to the Legislature on this very important subject. I have no doubt that, should you desire it, the services of the only judge we have in the territory can be secured to aid in perfecting and harmonizing existing laws.

Education.—The last Legislature enacted a school law, which is believed to be ample in its provisions to put into operation in every neighborhood in our territory, a good common school, if its provisions are complied with in every particular by the people. Within the past year many new schools have been opened, and there is every indication that the subject of education is receiving that attention from our citizens that is deemed necessary from its primary importance. The services of a very able superintendent of public instruction have been secured, in the person of James S. Foster, who has had much experience in teaching in Central New York, and it is hoped that our various county superintendents will heartily cooperate with him in perfecting and putting into operation our common school system.

Conclusion.—I have endeavored, as is my duty, to call your attention to the consideration of such matters as are deemed of the first importance, with a view of aiding you, so far as in my power, in the discharge of your public duties. I deem it to be my duty to urge upon your consideration the importance of exercising the most rigid economy in the expenditure of public funds over which you have control, believing it to be a duty we all owe, as good and loyal citizens, to the general Government, when we call to mind the struggle in which it has been engaged for the past four years against traitors, for its overthrow, to economize in every possible manner, that it may be the better able to maintain itself against the insidious efforts of these traitors.

I assure you I shall at all times take pleasure in furnishing you all the information within my reach that will in any way aid you in the discharge of your onerous and laborious duties.

NEWTON EDMUNDS.

The session was quiet, orderly and very harmonious. There did not seem to be the least disturbing factor, although there was a memorial and resolution passed endorsing the election of Walter A. Burleigh as delegate in 1864, notice of a contest for his seat having been given him by his unsuccessful opponent, General Todd.

The principal ground upon which General Todd based his contest was that Mr. Burleigh was not a resident of the territory, and was required by law to reside upon his agency, hence under the Organic Act could not have gained a residence in the territory, a point that was decided in the contest of Jayne vs. Todd two years before, and had the present Congress held to that position, Todd's chances for winning seemed to have the backing of a precedent. Notwithstanding this there was an almost unanimous sentiment among the voters, of opposition to a contest, which was shared very largely by Todd's political friends and which was occasioned by the series of unfortunate events that had marked the career of the territory from its organization and which had given to Dakota an unsavory reputation abroad, and prominent among these misfortunes was the scandalous features of the election in 1862; the Indian troubles, the drouth and the grass-hopper plague. It was this sentiment, coupled with a general confidence in Burleigh's ability and his popularity, that induced the general to waive his claim.

A number of new members appear in the list of representatives at this session, some of whom were destined to become conspicuous figures in the field of territorial politics for several years to come. These were George Stickney and Geo. W. Kellogg, of Union; John W. Turner, of Clay; John Lawrence, of Yankton. Speaker Brookings was the influential character in the House, and his influence, with that of President Stutsman, of the council, controlled the legislation, and the wishes and desires of these leaders with Governor Edmunds, were substantially reflected in the work accomplished.

Hon. John W. Turner, a staunch democrat, was a man verging upon three score and ten at the time. He had been active in political affairs in Michigan, to which state he removed from New York, coming from the democracy of the Wolverine State to Dakota. He was a good speaker, very courteous and always self possessed, a man of good information. He was a millwright and a farmer. He followed up the valley of the Vermillion and became the pioneer settler of Turner County, which was named for him. He was popular with the members of both political parties and also with the people.

Mr. George Stickney, of Union County, became very prominent at home as a leader in public affairs of a local character. He was for a great many years one of the prominent representative men from Union County in the halls of legislation and at the territorial conventions. By profession a lawyer, he practiced occasionally, but gave most of his attention to politics and to the fine farm which he owned near Elk Point. He was a good speaker. He was classed as a democrat, but did not always work in harmony with that party. He was appointed receiver of the United States land office at Vermillion by President Johnson, and served four years.

The work of the Legislature at this session was all well digested. The penal code underwent a thorough revision under the supervision of Chief Justice Ara Bartlett, Hon. Enos Stutsman, president of the council, and Hon. W. W. Brookings, speaker of the House. As a rule the new legislation was directed to curing defects in existing laws. Territorial roads received a great deal of merited attention. The memorials and petitions to Congress were all of a good class, designed to promote the development of the territory and the best interests of its inhabitants, such as mail routes; wagon roads; the construction of bridges; a geological survey; and praying for an amendment to the Union Pacific Railway law that would require the northern branch to be built up the Missouri Valley and out on the Niobrara route, crossing the Missouri at or near the old Town of Niobrara.

In general the proceedings of the Legislature were marked by a sincere desire to promote the general welfare, and the social relations of the members were most cordial. It was a session remarkable for the absence of all partisanship and conspicuous for the general harmony and good feeling that prevailed. When final adjournment came the members separated with good wishes for each other, much as brothers would express when leaving home for different destinations.

REPORT OF TERRITORIAL SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENT

A law creating the office of territorial superintendent of public instruction was enacted at the third session, and Governor Edmunds had appointed James S. Foster, the leader of the New York colony, to that position, more as a matter of recognition of that gentleman's good qualities as an educator, than because of any necessity existing for such an official. Mr. Foster, however, made good use of the office by collecting statistics and information which enabled him to make some important recommendations to the Legislative Assembly regarding the school district system. There were no organized school districts in the territory up to December, 1864, when the Legislature convened for the fourth session. Four counties had elected county superintendents at the general election held October 11, 1864. These were Union County; Sidney Goucher, Brule Creek; Clay, J. W. Boyle, Vermillion; Yankton, Enos Stutsman, Yankton; Bon Homme, James Dickey, Bon Homme. None of these officers made reports. They could only report that they had nothing to report, unless it would be with regard to private schools. Through personal interviews and by letter Mr. Foster ascertained that there were about six hundred school children in the territory of the age required by law, which at that time fixed the age of pupils at four years and up to twenty-one. Neighborhood schools had been kept irregularly in Union, Clay, Yankton, Bon Homme and Todd counties, and school privileges had been extended to about three hundred pupils. There had been no school tax laid and no school moneys of any kind collected. A per capita tax of $1 had been authorized by the school law of '63-4, but no attempt had been made to collect it, and the fines imposed for illegal sale of intoxicating liquors were not collected by the prosecuting officers of the various counties. From these two sources Mr. Foster states that a very respectable fund could be realized and the system of common schools set in motion. Mr. Foster makes some comments and recommendation regarding text books. With a very able and timely presentation of the subject of schools as bearing upon the question of immigration to the territory, he concludes the first report of the territorial superintendent of public instructions for Dakota Territory which is here given:

To the Territorial Board of Education:

In compliance with the requirements of section 3 of the school law of this territory, the superintendent of schools would respectfully submit his annual report:

Section 3 of the school law passed at the last session of the Legislature makes it the duty of the superintendent of public instruction to make a report of his official doings for the preceding year to the board of education at their annual meeting, to give a statement of the condition of the common schools of the territory, of the expenditure of school money therein, and such suggestions for improving their organization and modes of instruction, together with such other information with regard to the systems of schools in other states and countries as he shall deem proper.

Since my appointment as clerk of the board of education in August last, nothing has been attempted to be done in the way of organizing the public schools of the territory. I have, therefore, no "official doings" to report.

I have to offer, as an excuse for my seeming want of interest in the cause of education, that I had no official assistants, and deemed it proper to wait until the office of county superintendent in the several counties was filled, which it was hoped would be done at the general election held on the 11th of October. At that election the following counties elected superintendents of schools, viz.: Union County, Sidney Goucher, Brule Creek; Clay County, John W. Boyle, Vermillion; Enos Stutsman, Yankton County; James Dickey, Bon Homme.

These officers were elected for the school year commencing November 1, 1864, and ending October 31, 1865. I have received no reports from county superintendents, for the reason, I presume, that there are no organized school districts in the territory. I have no statistics, therefore, to show the number of children in the territory between the ages of four and twenty-one. But on careful inquiry I am confident that there are over six hundred children claiming the privileges of school at this time, and it is but reasonable to expect this number to be greatly increased by immigration during the coming spring.

Although there are no organized school districts in the territory, there have been numerous private schools in successful operation.

In Union, Clay, Yankton, Bon Homme and Todd counties these schools have been quite liberally patronized, showing that the people of the territory are willing to make whatever sacrifices are necessary that they may educate their children. About three hundred people have attended these schools within the last school year. Owing to the fact that most of the children of the territory have been kept a long time from school in consequence of living on the frontier, our schools are rather backward, and the teaching required mostly primary. But it is encouraging to see the eagerness of the pupils to overcome all difficulties and make the best of their opportunities for acquiring an education.

There has been no appropriation for the support of schools as yet, consequently I have no "expenditures of school moneys" to report. It is important that steps be taken by the school officers as early as practicable to secure to each county a school fund.

There is no enterprise connected with the interests of this territory that would pay so large a dividend on the capital invested as an assessment for school purposes. Without taxation we can have no successful school system. The general Government accordingly pays all the expenses of the territorial government in order that the people may be relieved of the heavy burden of taxes which such expenses would necessarily impose upon the settlers of sparsely settled territories. But since the general Government relieves us from a heavy burden of taxation, shall we refuse or neglect to raise a light tax for the support of so vital an interest as that of common schools? Without schools we shall make but very slow progress in all that pertains to the improvement of society and the attainment of that social and political importance which with a good school system we have a right reasonably to expect. Without schools the valuable homesteads in our healthful and fertile valleys would have no value in comparison with the rugged farms among the hills and rocks of New England where schools abound. The hardy New Englander gives many an unrequited day of toil in cultivating his rugged fields for the purpose of supporting his family, but he has the pleasing consciousness of knowing that his children are acquiring day by day an education that will prepare them to fill almost any station in life they may be called upon to occupy, with credit to themselves and honor to their parents. But the heart of the honest pioneer of the West often sickens when he realizes that his children are growing up to man's and woman's estate without even the rudiments of an education, and yet, strange as it may appear, some people discountenance taxation even for school purposes. Can nothing be done to break the spell which binds the people of this territory and makes them cry out against all taxation?

It is remarked that we have an ample school fund in prospective, which we are happy to admit is true, but it avails us nothing now. We want schools for the education of our children, and we want them now. If we wish for an enterprising and intelligent people to come to this territory and settle among us, to bring their families with them and make this their home, we must provide them with means of giving their children at least a good common school education. If the existing laws were enforced, we should be provided with a considerable sum yearly for the use of schools. I can see no good reason why the $1 per capita tax authorized by section 52 of the school law of 1863-4 should not be enforced. This tax could easily be collected and would form the basis of a school fund. An act passed by the Legislature of 1863-4 to prevent the sale of spirituous and vinous liquors to minors and for other purposes places all fines for the violation of the same to the credit of the school fund, and there may be other laws, the forfeit money for the violation of which accrues to the school fund, but for the want of any prosecuting officer, these laws when violated are not prosecuted.

I would recommend that the board of education communicate with the Legislature now in session and ask for the enactment of a law making it obligatory upon county assessors to levy and collect the per capita tax authorized for the support of schools, and also to pass a law requiring county attorneys to prosecute for violations of all laws of which the forfeit money will accrue to the school fund. Also to amend section 11 of the school law, by making it the duty of the county superintendents to divide their county into school districts in the same manner as is now required of the board of county commissioners. It seems to be the legitimate duty of the county superintendent to do this work, and certainly it would greatly facilitate the formation of new districts. I would recommend that the board ask for a law appropriating all moneys received for licenses for the support of schools. These sums would create a fund which would materially aid the common schools of the territory and which would gradually increase from year to year.

Uniformity of textbooks is essential to the success of public schools in any state or territory. From the best information I can obtain from the teachers in the private schools, I conclude that there is the usual variety of textbooks in use in the schools of the territory. This multiplicity of schoolbooks perplexes the teacher, retards the advancement of the school, and is continually a source of annoyance and expense to the patrons, and should never be allowed. There will never be a better time to take the steps necessary to avoid the difficulties than the present. Section 7 of the school law makes it binding on the board of education to select a list of textbooks for the use of public schools, which list they shall cause to be published in all the newspapers of the territory, and after such publication no other textbooks shall be used in the public schools of this territory. Full one-half of the schoolbooks now in use are published by Barnes & Burr, and known as the National School Series, and kept on sale by Mr. A. F. Hayward of Yankton. During the last summer these books have been extensively, and in some counties almost universally, introduced into the schools. Having been for a long time acquainted with the National Series and knowing their merits, I therefore recommend that this board select the series of schoolbooks published by A. S. Barnes & Burr, and known as the "National School Series," as the list of textbooks to be used in the public schools of this territory. This series is justly popular and has been adopted by a majority of the state boards of education.

Section 8 of the school law required the superintendent of public instruction to furnish copies of his annual report to the members of the board of education and the members of the Legislature. From the performance of this task I most respectfully ask to be excused, unless there is some means of printing the same, in which case I would cheerfully comply with the requirements of the statute.

One great hindrance in the work of organizing the public schools of the territory is the non-performance of the duties of school officers who get no remuneration for the time spent in the performance of their official duties. School officers should be willing to devote the necessary time required to promote the interests of schools in the territory without pay, but if territorial and county orders should be promptly issued in payment for their services, I think it would have a tendency to insure greater promptness on the part of school officers than will be likely to exist otherwise.

I have further to ask that this board take such measures as it shall deem proper to provide the necessary books, papers, stamps, and stationery for conducting the official business of the "office of the board of education."

In conclusion let me express the hope that ere another year has passed away the machinery of our school system will be harmoniously at work and that every neighborhood in this valley will have a public school in which to instruct their children and prepare them for future usefulness.

JAMES S. FOSTER.

AUDITOR'S REPORT

At the election in 1862 a territorial auditor and a territorial treasurer had been elected as provided by law. These were Justus Townsend, auditor and P. H. Jewell, treasurer. Subsequently it was discovered that this procedure was not lawful, the Organic Act providing that the governor should appoint all territorial officers created by the Legislature. In compliance with this requirement Governor Edmunds, appointed J. R. Hanson, of Yankton, auditor, and J. O. Taylor, of Union, treasurer, in the winter of '63-4. Up to this time no attempt had been made to put the territorial machinery in motion, as no assessment of property had been made and no tax collected.

The Indian troubles of 1862 and the consequent calling out of the militia, and the confiscation of large amounts of private property for the general defense and welfare, made it incumbent on the Legislature to devise some means of liquidating the indebtedness created, and as the territory had nothing to pay with and because the indebtedness had been created in defending the settlements of the territory from Indian invasions, it was properly held that the general government should foot the bill, and acting upon this view of the matter the Legislature of 1862-3, the first session that was held after the troubles, took the matter into consideration, and enacted a law, as follows:

An act appointing and authorizing a commissioner to audit the military accounts against the Territory of Dakota:

Section 1. That James Tufts is hereby appointed and constituted a commissioner to audit all the military accounts outstanding against the Territory of Dakota.

Sec. 2 That all persons having military claims against the territory are hereby required to present them to the said James Tufts on or before the 1st day of March, 1863, and he, the said James Tufts, shall have the same audited and presented to the auditor by the 18th of March, 1863.

Sec. 3. When the claims audited and certified to by the said James Tufts shall be presented by him to the auditor, the auditor shall forthwith issue territorial warrants to the person entitled to the same as per amount designated by said commissioner, said warrants to be redeemable when the general Government appropriates and furnishes the funds for the redemption of the same.

Sec. 4. That the deputy auditor is hereby empowered to perform all the duties herein given to the auditor.

Sec. 5. All persons having claims audited by the commissioner herein designated shall pay the said commissioner 1 1/2 per cent for auditing the same.

Sec. 6. This act shall be in force from and after its passage

Approved January 9, 1863.

Under this law James Tufts performed the duties of commissioner that were imposed upon him, and there is no doubt that he performed them conscientiously and faithfully. He was a competent man to discharge an important duty of that nature in a satisfactory manner, but he must have been crowded with the work for the time given him was not sufficient to permit of such care as many of the claims demanded. Mr. Tufts, however, as well as Mr. Hagaman, the deputy auditor, had both arranged to leave for Montana as early in the spring as they could get a steamboat passage. The territorial auditor-elect, Justus Townsend, was now a surgeon in the army and stationed at Fort Pierre, and there seemed to be a necessity that the claims should be examined and audited at this time, as many claimants were leaving the country, others were in debt and could use their claims to pay old scores and it was generally thought best that the claims should be put in shape as early as possible, as they would then have greater weight with Congress than would be the case if the process of adjustment was delayed. Under this state of affairs Mr. Tufts audited the claims and Mr. Hagaman issued the warrants amounting in the aggregate to $28,137.17. A few weeks later both these gentlemen, carrying out a year old plan, left for Montana to take up a new residence.

A great deal of dissatisfaction and acrimonious criticism grew out of the adjustment and audit of these accounts most unjustly so far as Tufts and Hagaman were concerned, but that fact was not known at the time and could not be readily substantiated.

To such an extent was this unfriendly criticism carried that the Legislature of 1863-4 declared that all that had been done under the first enactment to be null and void, and passed a new law, appointing a new commission to do the same work over again. But the same work could not be done over again. Scores of claimants who had their claims adjusted by Tufts knew nothing of the second commission, hence did not file a claim. Others sold their warrants or had paid debts with them. Many had left the territory; and the brief time allowed this second commission for their work was insufficient in which to ascertain the whereabouts of these claimants. However, it is presumed the new commissioners did their duty so far as they were able to reach the claimants, and the result of their work cut down the aggregate allowance to $19,325.05, or about $10,000 less than the aggregate of the Tufts findings. With the submission of this second report to the Legislature of 1864-5, the matter rested for ten years, when Mr. Armstrong being the delegate in Congress, procured the authority from Congress to have the claims adjusted and paid, and this was done through an army officer, General Hardie, who visited the territory, made an investigation and adopted substantially the awards made by Commissioner Tufts.

It is now proper to give the findings of the Tufts commission, because that was finally accepted as the most reliable by the Government although 30 per cent greater in amount than the second audit. And that there would be nothing learned by the reader from perusing the second finding because it is nearly all contained in the first, the difference being caused by the second commission failing to audit many of the claims audited by the first; not refusing or neglecting to audit, but as it was afterwards learned the claims were not presented to the second commission, and in explanation of this it was shown to the satisfaction of all, that the claimants knew nothing about the second commission. They had appeared before the first commission, had their claims audited, and knowing that they must wait until Congress appropriated money to pay the claims, they had supposed the auditing and examining closed and had gone about their business, which possibly had led them to the various forts and Indian agencies in the upper country, and as afterwards proved to be the case some of them had never known of a second commission and a second audit until ten years later. Delegate Armstrong, in 1872, succeeded in procuring an appropriation to pay the claims, after the war department had made a most rigid investigation and virtually endorsed the first steps taken and the first findings made under the authority of the territory.

By an act of the Legislature entitled "An act appointing and authorizing a commission to audit the military accounts against the Territory of Dakota," approved January 9, 1863, James Tufts, Esq., was appointed such commissioner, whose duty it was to receive, examine and audit the military accounts of the territory. And said act further provides that "when the claims audited and certified to by the said James Tufts shall be presented by him to the auditor, the auditor shall forthwith issue territorial warrants to the person entitled to the same, as per amount designated by said commissioner. On the 18th day of March, 1863, the said commissioner presented the following report:

COMMISSIONER'S REPORT

Office of Commissioner of Military Accounts,
Yankton, Dakota Territory, March 18, 1863.

To Justus Townsend, Auditor, Dakota Territory.

Sir: In compliance with an act of the Legislature entitled "An act appointing and authorizing a commissioner to audit the military accounts of the Territory of Dakota," approved January 9, 1863, I submit the following report:

Section 1. That James Tufts is hereby appointed and constituted a commissioner to audit all the military accounts outstanding against the Territory of Dakota.

Sec. 2. That all persons having military claims against the territory are hereby required to present them to the said James Tufts on or before the 1st day of March, 1863, and he, the said James Tufts, shall have the same audited and presented to the auditor by the 18th day of March, 1863.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S ORDER NO. 12

To Captains F. M. Zeibach, A. W. Puett, Daniel Gifford, A. J. Bell and Mahlon Gore, Dakota Militia:

By order of the commander-in-chief, I am directed to instruct all captains of militia companies raised in the territory under the proclamation of the governor issued August 30, 1862, for protection against Indians, to report themselves without delay to the Hon. James Tufts at Yankton, who, by an act of the Territorial Legislature, approved January 9, 1863, has been appointed a commissioner to audit the military accounts of the territory, and you will then and there present for adjustment the properly authenticated accounts and claims of your respective companies for services and material furnished for the public defense. By order of the commander-in-chief.

C. P. BOOGE, Adjutant General.

In pursuance of said act and in conformity to the above order, I entered upon the discharge of the duties of the responsible trust confided to me. It will be observed that the enactment conferred plenipotentiary powers upon the commissioner in discharge of the duties imposed, without enjoining any special directions, or providing for the defrayment of such expenses that might be incurred in obtaining evidence, or examining witnesses necessary to a just and equitable adjustment of the claims presented. In the absence of all directionary provisions, the commissioner established as a rule that all claims presented, whether for material furnished, labor performed, or service rendered, should be authenticated and duly certified to by the commander-in-chief of the militia, or by the captains or some commissioned officer in command of the county or district where the expense was incurred. Under this rule the commissioner has acted, and in auditing the claims herewith presented he has in no instance sought to obtain testimony beyond the authentication of the commanding officer.

The few claims that have been presented for material and labor have in nearly every case, in the opinion of the commissioner, been marked by moderation and justice, and this class of accounts have, with perhaps an exception or two, been allowed in full. The accounts of militia companies for military services rendered were in most cases unavoidably conflicting and irregular. The names of the same individuals, in several instances, appeared on different rolls, but in all cases duly certified by the proper officer. This clashing in the returns of the various commanders is attributed to the unfitness and incongruity of our own present militia law, together with those conspiring circumstances incident to an unsettled and alarmed state of the public at the time the several companies were ordered into service, and in the opinion of the commissioner such collisions were inevitable and therefore excusable.

The proclamation under which the militia of the Territory was organized and called into active service was issued on the 30th day of August, 1862. The order has not been revoked at the present writing, nor has the militia been discharged from service by any official order or otherwise. Under these circumstances the captains could not do otherwise than present their claims for pay from the time they entered the service to the first day of the present month. Though not in constant service they were obliged, under the law, to hold themselves in readiness, subject to the orders of the commander in chief, and by virtue of the existing orders they are entitled to the presumption of uninterrupted active service. While the commissioner, therefore, deems the accounts of the militia men for four months' pay as reasonable and justifiable by the outstanding orders of the executive of the territory, he is quite aware that the term of actual service would fall considerably short of the period named above, and the commissioner has therefore endeavored to approximate, in auditing these pay accounts, as nearly as in his power, to such time as would be warranted by the law, paying due regard to the interest of claimants, and according these the benefit of any uncertainty or margin of doubt existing. The commissioner believes that some companies have performed more actual service than others, but as there was no evidence before him to show the length of time which any of them had been in actual service, other than the muster rolls, he resorted to a uniform rule of allowance, as may be seen by the schedule hereto appended. In conforming to this rule it may be that slight injustice has been done in some cases, but the commissioner is confident that no other rule could have been pursued whereby more exact justice could have been accorded.

The commissioner trusts that the incompleteness of our territorial militia system, and the complications and embarrassments consequent thereto, together with the meager provisions of the law creating this commission, and a desire to award to the yeoman militia of Dakota their full and just deserts will furnish a plenary excuse for his shortcomings and pardon to him those errors into which he may have unconsciously fallen.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES TUFTS, Commissioner.

JUSTUS TOWNSEND, Esq., Auditor of Dakota Territory.

Grand total, $28,137.17.

This expense was necessarily incurred in defending the lives and property of our citizens from the numerous bands of hostile Indians which infested our territory during the fall of 1862, before adequate protection was afforded by the Government.

I would therefore recommend that you memorialize Congress for an appropriation of $28,137.17 to refund the territory the amount expended for the defense of the frontier of Dakota, which was also affording protection to Northern Nebraska, Northwest Iowa, and Western Minnesota.

JUSTUS TOWNSEND, Auditor.

In January, 1873, Congress took the first steps toward providing for the payment of these claims of the territory. The Committee on Military Affairs of the House, Mr. Armstrong being the delegate from the territory at that time, reported a bill, entitled "A bill to authorize the secretary of the treasury to refund to the Territory of Dakota the sum of $28,137.17, for expenses incurred in protecting the frontier settlements during the Indian Rebellion of 1862." The committee's report says: "The committee find that prior to the 30th of August, 1862, and during the summer of that year, the Sioux Indians in Minnesota and Dakota made war upon the whites, perpetrating many outrages and threatened the entire border in that state and territory. Thereupon the governor of that territory issued his proclamation to the citizens of Dakota, ordering all male citizens in the territory, between the ages of eighteen and fifty years to at once enroll themselves into companies to be formed for home defense in their respective counties, with such arms as they may have had in their possession. They held themselves in readiness to march and engage in active service for the remainder of the year 1862.

The citizens, in pursuance of the proclamation of the governor, organized into five companies, in which were enrolled in all 266 men, and assembled and elected their officers, and prepared hastily made fortifications for their defense.

In the absence of United States troops, the calling of the militia by the governor, and their enrollment and service were, in the imminent danger from hostile Indians, the only defense for the people.

The committee then recites the proceedings of the Dakota Legislature of 1863, in providing for the auditing of the war expenses and states that "the action of the governor in calling out the troops, and of the citizens in responding promptly in the emergency seemed to be all that could be done and the only thing that could be done for the defense of the people of the territory, since no troops of the Government could come in time for the rescue, and it seemed madness to wait until the authorities at Washington could be reached and could furnish military aid.

The accounts appear to have been carefully examined by the commissioner, and to have met the approval of the auditor, and are set out in full with the items. The sum seems to be reasonable and a fair one, and we feel justified in recommending its payment, and for that purpose report the following bill:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the secretary of war be, and he hereby is, authorized and required to ascertain, or cause to be ascertained, the amount of expense necessarily incurred by the territorial authorities of Dakota, for arms, equipment, military stores, supplies, and all expenses of the volunteer forces called out to suppress Indian hostilities in the Territory of Dakota in the year 1862, and report to Congress at the next session the names of the persons entitled to relief, together with a statement of the facts and claims upon which such report may be based.

This bill passed the House forthwith, but did not reach the Senate before adjournment, and laid over until the following winter, when it became a law; and the war department in March of 1874 dispatched Gen. James A. Hardie, inspector general of the United States army to Dakota, "for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of expense necessarily incurred by the territorial authorities of Dakota, for arms, equipments, military stores, supplies, and all other expenses of the volunteer forces called out to suppress Indian hostilities in the Territory of Dakota in the year 1862. (See report of the territorial auditor and commissioner to the Territorial Legislature of 1863-4.) General Hardie was also directed to make a full report to the war department, "setting forth particularly the names of all parties equitably entitled to relief and the amounts justly due each case, taking into consideration the quantity and quality of supplies actually furnished and the prevailing scale of prices for such articles at the time they were furnished."

General Hardie made an exhaustive investigation. In his report he says in part:

I proceeded to Dakota, visiting Yankton, Vermillion and Elk Point, the principal centers of the militia operations in 1862, and conferred with claimants and the old settlers generally. I examined many witnesses, among them some of the principal actors in the events connected with the history of the claims. I visited the governor of the territory, William Jayne, who called out the militia in question, the special commissioner, Mr. James Tufts, who had audited the claims under authority of the Legislature, and Col. R. M. Hagaman, who had issued the warrants in payment of the awards. These gentlemen, who are no longer residents of the territory, cheerfully gave me all the information they could on the points brought to their notice. Every assistance was cordially rendered by Governor Pennington, Secretary Whitney, Adjutant General Pound, and other prominent persons in Dakota. I also elicited much oral testimony of a valuable character. Besides, I obtained the affidavits of the mass of the claimants, together with important corroborative evidence. From the above sources and from the papers transmitted to me with my instructions from the adjutant general's office, I have collected such information as enables me to frame a report which I think may be taken as a safe basis of adjustment of these claims.

The general's report, which is quite circumstantial, and discusses the former investigation of the claims by the territory, substantially approving and accepting the investigation of Commissioner Tufts, goes further than that authority and allows the territory the sum of $33,980.30, which was an increase of $5,843.13 above the total amount allowed by the territorial commissioner. Nothing further need be said to sustain the justice of the claim made by the territory, nor need there be anything added to show the dire necessity which at the time called forth the efforts of the pioneers to save the territory from being abandoned by its white population.

In 1874 Congress made the appropriation of $33,986.30 as recommended by General Hardie, and this sum was paid directly to the beneficiaries in 1875. They were paid by treasury draft direct from Washington, each claim being properly certified and sent either to the department or Delegate Armstrong who remained in Washington and gave his attention gratuitously to the collection and forwarding the proceeds direct to the party entitled thereto. The Government was extremely cautious and painstaking in seeing that no fee for collecting the claims was secured by claim agents. Over three hundred members of the old militia in Bon Homme, Yankton, Clay, Union and Minnehaha counties received pay for the two months military service in the fall of 1862 (it should have been six months); and in addition a considerable sum was disbursed to merchants for supplies confiscated for the use of the troops, and to hotel keepers for rations furnished those who were kept on the firing line. A list of the names of the militiamen, and those who voluntarily (and involuntarily) furnished supplies, will be found in the report of James Tufts, territorial commissioner, to audit the accounts which appears in this chapter.

The national Government should make some further reward and provision for those old defenders of Dakota's homes and firesides, especially in view of the rapid progress the territory has since made in agricultural production, the most important and indispensable of our national industries. The militia took the place of Government troops which at that time were needed south, not only for two months but for two years, more or less, and it would seem appropriate that their services, amid much privation and danger, many of them with families, should be recognized by having their names on the national pension roll. But for the militia the territory would have been entirely abandoned by its white population, as was advised at the time by officers of the volunteer army who foresaw years of war and tumult on these frontiers before the contest would be closed. The pension roll is open to those who served ninety days in the volunteer service, and though but sixty days were allowed the Dakota militia, this measure of time was inferred by General Hardie from the report of the territorial commissioner who was advised to keep the claim a reasonable one safely on the side of the settlers and claimants, as an inducement to Congress to make an early reimbursement of the amounts due. Had the commissioner allowed ninety days, there is little doubt that Hardie would have advised accepting his action without protest; but in the face of the commissioner's finding and in the absence of any protest on the part of the parties interested, the general did not feel warranted in increasing that item in the bill of the territory, but he did increase the aggregate sum found due by the commissioner, over five thousand dollars.

Should Congress decline to make an appropriate recognition of the loyalty and valued services rendered by this small but intrepid band of Dakota's early defenders, the honor of a suitable recognition in some suitable form, will fall to the sons of that old guard, who as the sovereigns of a great state should testify their regard for those in that critical time who saved the territory from utter abandonment.

The territorial auditor, J. R. Hanson, made the first formal report of the financial situation of the territory to the Legislature of 1864-5. Dr. Justus Townsend had been elected auditor, but had removed from the territory and Mr. Hanson was appointed to succeed him. There had been no assessment of property made, the returns of which had reached the auditor's office, and there was nothing to formulate a report about except certain recommendations for the enforcement of the revenue laws. Hanson's report follows:

To the Honorable Council and House of Representatives:

By the requirement of section 2, chapter 8, of the general laws of 1863-4, it was the duty of the governor "to appoint and commission a territorial auditor to fill the unexpired term of Justus Townsend." In compliance with this law, I was so appointed and commissioned by his excellency, Gov. N. Edmunds, on the 21st of January, 1864, and immediately entered upon the duties of the office.

In submitting this, the second annual report of this office, it is the source of much regret that I am not able to present to you a more favorable condition of the territorial finances. The state of the treasury remains the same as when I took charge of the office—empty. The indebtedness of the territory is increasing steadily of fact pertaining to its existence, and small debts are constantly accruing in the various counties as a matter of necessity if any portion of the laws is to be enforced. For the liquidation of outstanding claims, and for the ready adjustment of such as will be unavoidably incurred in the future, some action should, in my opinion, be taken by the Legislature. The revenue laws appear to be just and wise and applicable to our youthful state. The wrong necessary to be righted exists with the county officers of the several counties, in whose hands the administration of these revenue laws is placed. There has come to my knowledge but one exception to a general evasion on the part of these county officers of their official duties. The remedy for this evil is simply some stringent enactment compelling such officers to a faithful compliance with all the requirements of the law by assessing property and levying and collecting taxes. I attribute this neglect of duty not to a willful and culpable determination to violate the law or shun the responsibility attached to their office. I believe public sentiment has exerted the influence to which they have yielded. I am aware of three popular objections to the inauguration of a regular system of taxation. One is the youth of the territory, and the hitherto rather unsettled and vacillating condition of the population; another is a reluctance on the part of many to contribute to the public revenue, having been sorely pressed by heavy taxation in the states from which they emigrated to Dakota, believing that here their property would be free for several years to come, and the third is the almost general opinion that all the taxable property of the territory, if properly assessed, taxed and collected upon, would be no more than sufficient to pay the expenses incident to such assessment, taxation and collection.

To these three objections I desire to reply briefly. First, if the youth would become a respectable member of society he must conform to its habits and customs, and it is well to take frequent lessons from his nearest neighbors. Settlements in Dakota, based briefly upon the experiment, have ceased to be made. Farmers, mechanics and merchants have surrounded themselves with much personal and real property, and being freed by generous military protection of all dangers from hostile Indians, nothing less than an actual disruption of the territorial organization can effect any general or material change. Second, he is neither a wise nor a valuable citizen who is unwilling to contribute to such necessary and righteous objects as the safety of persons, property and society. Redress from outrages against either can only be secured through the channels of law, and laws will not and cannot be enforced if no revenue be raised for the payment of such officers as are necessary to enforce them.

Third, so far as I am advised, an assessment of property has been made in Yankton County only. These assessment rolls show the value of taxable property in the county for 1864 to be a little less than $100,000. The counties of Clay and Union will average almost equal with Yankton County, though the kinds of property differ somewhat from it. The County of Bon Homme contains property of the value of $50,000. The counties of Todd, Charles Mix and Buffalo combined, including stocks of goods for the purpose of trade with the Indians and soldiers, all of which are subject to taxation, contain property of the value of about one hundred thousand dollars. The law provides that "Government lands shall not be taxed for the year in which the entry, location or purchase is made." It is not to assume that the increase of taxable property from the influx of immigration, and also from many of these Government lands becoming subject to taxation, which are not so the previous year, will not be less than one-quarter in the counties of Union, Clay, Yankton and Bon Homme, by the close of the fiscal year 1865. According to this calculation, the results for 1865 will be at the highest rate of taxation provided by law, and including a per capita tax of $1, as follows:

Yankton County: Total value of property, $125,000. Territorial tax, $187.50; county tax, $250; per capita tax $165. Total, $415.00.

Clay County: Total value of property, $125,000. Territorial tax, $187.50; county tax, $250; per capita tax, $150. Total tax, $406.50.

Union and Bon Homme Counties: Total value of property, $50,000. Territorial tax, $75; county tax, $100; per capita tax, $35. Total, $135.

Todd, Charles Mix and Buffalo Counties: Total value of property, $100,000. Territorial tax, $150; county tax, $200; per capita tax, $100. Total, $450.

Total value of property in the several counties, $525,000. Total territorial tax in the several counties, $787.50. Total county tax in the several counties, $1,050. Total per capita tax, $790.

The above exhibit indicating the probable amount of property in the territory for 1865; the territorial, county and the per capita taxes accruing to the revenue of the territory, were the laws properly complied with in the various counties, show a result sufficiently satisfactory to allay all fears of poverty and place the fresh and young Territory of Dakota in a position of respect and honor in the financial world. While the above amount of tax would fall so lightly upon our citizens as to be scarcely perceptible, they would be largely rewarded by the consciousness of having contributed toward the redemption of the territorial credit and the enforcement of the laws so essential to the undisturbed enjoyment of all their possessions.

Since taking possession of this office no territorial warrants have been issued by me, and therefore the total amount issued outstanding remains the same as reported by my predecessors to the last Legislature, to wit:

No. 1, May 8, 1863. James Tufts for extra pay as secretary of the council, general laws 1862, $120.

No. 2, May 8, 1863. William Goodfellow, for total pay for services rendered as engrossing and enrolling clerk of council as per general laws of 1862, $44.

No. 3, May 8, 1863. J. R. Hanson, for extra pay as chief clerk of the House of Representatives as per general laws of 1862, $120.

No. 4, May 8, 1863. William Goodfellow, for total pay for services rendered as engrossing and enrolling clerk of council as per general laws of 1862, $196.

Total outstanding warrants, $480; for the payment of which there is no money in the treasury.

Up to and including the last day of the fiscal year ending November 30, 1864, there will be claims against the territory (exclusive of warrants issued), as follows:

Salaries of auditor from May 20, 1862, \$129.16 $\frac{2}{3}$.

Books and stationery for auditor, which have been furnished, $25.50.

Salaries of treasurer from October 1, 1862, $112.50.

The account of Daniel Gifford for services rendered as the engrossing and enrolling clerk of the House of Representatives as per general laws of 1862, \$180. Total, \$446.66 $\frac{2}{3}$.

Total indebtedness of territory December 31, 1864, \$926.66 $\frac{2}{3}$.

The following estimate will indicate the probable increase of liabilities up to November 30, 1865:

Salary of auditor from November 30, 1864.....	$ 50.00
Salary for treasurer from November 30, 1864.....	50.00
Books and stationery for auditor's office.....	50.00
Books and stationery for treasurer's office.....	50.00
Seal for auditor's office.....	10.00
	<hr/>

Total indebtedness December 31, 1865, \$1,136.66 $\frac{2}{3}$.

To meet the liabilities I would earnestly recommend some action on the part of the Legislature compelling county officers in the various counties to a strict compliance with the requirements of our territorial statutes. And I would further recommend an increase of one-half mill on the dollar on the amount of territorial tax now allowed by law. This would, in my judgment, raise sufficient revenue to liquidate all demands against the territory.

J. R. HANSON, Territorial Auditor.

CHAPTER XXXVI

THE ASSASSINATION OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN

1865

LINCOLN'S INAUGURAL ADDRESS—ASSASSINATION OF THE PRESIDENT—THE NATION GRIEF STRICKEN—MEMORIAL EXERCISES IN DAKOTA—PRESIDENT JOHNSON'S PROCLAMATION—FEDERAL APPOINTMENTS—MUSTERING OUT—GENERAL SULLY CONGRATULATES DAKOTA CAVALRY—COUNTY GOVERNMENT INAUGURATED—HIGH PRICES THE RULE.

On the 4th of March, 1865, Abraham Lincoln was inaugurated President of the United States for the second term. On that occasion he delivered a brief inaugural address, reviewing the great events of the past four years. It was quite manifest at this time that the Rebellion was nearing the end, and Mr. Lincoln's words were the frank expression of a heart overflowing with kindness and charity for the misguided and impoverished people who had endeavored to destroy the Union. He wished to offer them bread not a stone; something which would convey to them an assurance that in the overthrow and destruction of their ill-starred Rebellion, no enmity remained on the part of the triumphant nation; no rancor was felt by the victor for the vanquished. The concluding portion of the address, which is here given, exhibits such faith in God, such complete resignation to his will and purpose, and such magnanimity of soul, that it must forever have a place among those words that were described by the wisest of men, as "apples of gold in pictures of silver." But a few weeks before his death, on the occasion of his second inaugural, alluding to the great war between the Government and the rebellious states, which was just on the eve of terminating, Mr. Lincoln concluding, said:

Neither party expected for the war the magnitude or the duration which it has already attained; neither anticipated that the cause of the conflict might cease before the conflict itself was brought to a close; each looked for an easier triumph and a result less fundamental and astounding.

Both read the same Bible, and prayed to the same God, and each invoked his aid against the others. It may seem strange that men should dare to ask a just God's assistance in wringing their bread from the sweat of other men's faces, but let us not judge that we be not judged. The prayers of both could not be answered. That of neither has been answered fully. The Almighty has his own purposes. "Woe unto the world because of offenses, for it must needs be that offenses come, but woe to that man by whom the offense cometh." If we shall suppose that American slavery is one of these offenses which in the providence of God must needs come, but which having continued through the appointed time, he now wills to remove, and that he gives to both North and South this terrible war as the woe due to those by whom the offense came, shall we discover that there is any departure from those divine attributes which the believers in a living God always ascribe to him?

Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet if God wills that it may continue until all the wealth piled up by the bondman's 250 years of unrequited toil, shall be sunk; and until every drop of blood drawn by the lash shall be paid by another drawn by the sword, as was said 3,000 years ago, so still it must be said that the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.

With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the nation's wounds, and care for him who hath borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphans, to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations.

Six weeks later, on the 14th of April, 1865, Abraham Lincoln was slain by the bullet of an assassin. He was in attendance at Ford's Theatre, Washington, witnessing the play of "Our American Cousin" when John Wilkes Booth, a celebrated actor and secession sympathizer, entered the private box where the President, his wife and some friends were seated, placed a pistol close to the President's head and fired. The assassin then leaped to the stage, and with a flourish of his arms shouted "Sic Semper Tyrannis" and made off through the back door of the building, mounted a horse which had been placed there to aid his escape, and rode away with all speed, crossing the Potomac by the long bridge into Maryland. The whole affair was accomplished so suddenly and dramatically that it seemed to paralyze the numerous audience, including the President's company, who remained, for a few seconds, apparently stupefied and speechless. But the alarm went forth and not many minutes elapsed before a troop of cavalry were on the track of the murderer who had about an hour's lead, crossing the Potomac by a ferry below Long bridge. The President was removed across the street from the theatre to comfortable quarters, where skillful surgeons did all that could be done to revive him, without avail. He breathed his last on the morning of April 15th, about 5 o'clock.

Intelligence of the assassination was known the same morning in every city and village of the Union and created a profoundly solemn impression upon the public mind. No calamity of the entire war affected the masses of the people as did this. Men and women temporarily lost their reason and ran frantically about wringing their hands, waving their arms and shouting incoherently. Others swooned; thousands wept aloud, sobbing piteously. The nation seemed like one great family, grief stricken at the death of its most favored and beloved member. The emblems of death's visitation draped the household and the marts of trade all over the land. The grief was more intense, impatient, sullen and pathetic than when Washington died, owing to the manner of Lincoln's "taking off," which was so sudden and unexpected, so violent, cruel and cowardly. The affliction probably was felt more acutely in the case of Lincoln, he being the great leader of the hosts of liberty and Union, whose shattered though victorious armies were just emerging from the long sanguinary struggle. The people loved and revered him; many may have idolized him. He was a shining mark and in the hour of his greatest triumphs, the fruition it might be said of his fondest prayerful hopes, death took him. Not only in our own country, did overwhelming and universal grief prevail, but the people of the old world felt the great sorrow. Lincoln had been so wise and true; so unselfish, forgiving, kind and patient; so grand and good in his great office, that civilized humanity the world over, appeared to bear for him the deepest homage and sincerest affection. But a few weeks before his death he had been inaugurated President for the second term; the Rebellion that had withstood the storms of terrible and unrelenting war for four long bitter years, had been suppressed or had spent its force, and the greatest war ever waged, all things considered, was practically at an end. The leading rebel general, Lee, had surrendered his army to Grant, at Appomattox. Richmond, the capital of the Southern Confederacy, had capitulated, and Jefferson Davis, the prime instigator and leader of the secession movement, and president of the confederate states of America, was a fugitive with a reward offered for his capture. It was an hour when Lincoln was receiving the homage of the loyal people of the nation as no man had ever before been offered it save Washington at the close of the Revolutionary war. Lincoln had performed his full part in bringing about the results which saved to the people of this great republic and of all the world, the nation that had been leading humanity for scores of years out of the slavery and darkness of despotism and monarchy, into the brilliant sunlight of individual freedom—the nation to whose guardianship it would seem God had entrusted the keeping and preservation of the sacred ark of human liberty. His fame was secure, but it did not appear to the perception of the people of this country, that his life work was completed, for still in front, in the tomorrow of the nation there loomed the mass of ruined state governments that needed to be rebuilt and restored; the disposition of three or four million black people from whose limbs the chains of life-long slavery had just been severed, and all the problems a little later met with in the momentous work of reconstruction.

On the same night another would-be assassin named Payne, entered the chamber of William H. Seward, secretary of state, who was confined to his bed with a serious illness and attempted to assassinate him with a knife. He cut and slashed the venerable statesman frightfully, inflicting wounds of a very dangerous character, and severely injured his son, Frederick Seward, and Mr. Robinson, a nurse, who grappled with the desperate villain and prevented the complete execution of his murderous purpose. The ruffian escaped from the house and eluded detection for some time, but was finally captured. Mr. Seward though sadly disfigured for life as the result of his wounds, finally recovered and resumed the duties of his office.

When the Assassin Booth leaped upon the stage at Ford's Theatre he broke one of his ankle bones. This gave him such intense pain that he was forced to stop in his flight at the house of a friendly surgeon in Maryland and have it treated. He was anxious to reach the rebel lines, where he supposed he would be safe from capture. This halt and delay at the surgeon's proved his undoing, for it furnished an early clue to his pursuers who were following him up, and finally succeeded in driving him into hiding in a barn on a place called Garrett's farm near Port Royal, on the Rappahannock. Here Booth made a stand, refusing to surrender, and being well armed and disposed to resist to the death, his pursuers fired into the barn hoping to wound him and capture him alive; but their fire was too effective and he was killed. One of his accomplices, Harrold, who had accompanied him was not injured and was secured.

As in every part of the United States outside of the rebellious country and in some portions of that section, so the citizens of Dakota sincerely shared in the all prevailing sorrow and nightly gloom that seemed to have wrapped the world in a shroud. Business was practically suspended and nothing else was spoken of but the hideous crime and the virtues of the great victim.

Governor Edmunds issued a special proclamation naming Thursday, the 27th of the month as a day of fasting, humiliation and prayer; and the people of the territory generally appropriately observed the occasion. The citizens of Yankton assembled at the capitol building on the 24th for the purpose of giving public expression to their sorrow and to pay tribute to the virtues of the great martyr. G. C. Moody called the meeting to order; James M. Stone was elected chairman and Albert P. Hayward, secretary. The proceedings were opened with prayer by Rev. Melancthon Hoyt. Joseph R. Hanson presented the following resolutions, which were adopted:

Resolved, That now as under former occasions of national disaster and gloom, we bow with true faith and humility to this last and most mysterious, startling, and profoundly solemn decree of God. Recognizing in this terrible blow which sways our whole nation with woe, as the tempest rocks the giant oak, still firmly believing that he who holds the life of nations as individuals, in the hollow of his hand, "doeth all things well," will, in his own good time, say to the waves of intestine war, "Peace, be still."

Resolved, That we regard the assassination of President Abraham Lincoln as the direct and natural result of a disgraceful northern sympathy with treason against the republic, and while we view the latter as taking rank with the most revolting and heinous crimes known to mankind, the position of the armed traitor is touched with a semblance of nobleness when compared with that of him who is imbued with the foul spirit of the former.

Resolved, That amid the scenes of woe which tonight veils the whole North in weeds of mourning, that our nation's pilot has been murdered while still holding the helm of the old ship of state as she was safely plowing the waves of internal discord and strife, and just nearing the haven of peace and repose, it is our firm belief that we can safely entrust the helm to the hands of Andrew Johnson, having the most unfaltering faith that his wisdom, his statesmanship and his devotion to our country's cause, are adequate to the great duty with which the present is pregnant, and that he will bring the rebellion to a speedy and successful termination, and we do hereby pledge him our unwavering support of his administration.

Appropriate addresses were made by the Rev. Dr. Hoyt, Colonel Moody, Mr. Brookings, Mr. Stutsman, Doctor Bardsell and Mr. Foster, and the meeting then adjourned.

In accordance with a general order, the military authorities stationed at Yankton caused a salute of twenty-one guns to be fired on the 20th of April, in token of respect to the martyred President whose interment at Springfield, Ill., occurred on that day.

President Andrew Johnson issued a proclamation in words following:

Whereas, By my direction, the acting secretary of state, in a notice to the public on the 17th day of April, requested the various religious denominations to assemble on the 19th of April on the occasion of the obsequies of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States, and to observe the same with appropriate ceremonies; and,

Whereas, Our country has become one great house of mourning, where the head of the family has been taken away, and believing that a special period should be assigned for again humiliating ourselves before Almighty God, in order that the bereavement may be sanctified to the nation.

Now, therefore, in order to mitigate that grief on earth which can only be assuaged by communion with the Father in Heaven, and in compliance with the wishes of senators and representatives in Congress communicated to me by a resolution adopted at the national capitol, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby appoint Thursday, June 1, 1865, to be observed wherever in the United States the flag of the country may be respected, as a day of humiliation and mourning, and recommend my fellow citizens then to assemble in their respective places of worship, there to unite in solemn service to Almighty God in memory of the good man who is gone, so that all shall be occupied at the same time in contemplation of his virtues and sorrow for his untimely end.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed. Done at Washington, April 25th, A. D. 1865, and of the Independence of the United States of America, the 89th.

By the President,

ANDREW JOHNSON.

W. HUNTER, Acting Secretary of State.

President Lincoln made a number of federal appointments for Dakota in March, 1865; these were Laban H. Litchfield, of Yankton, to be United States marshal in place of Geo. M. Pinney, resigned to take a similar position in Montana; Ara Bartlett, of Vermillion, to be chief justice, vice Philemon Bliss, resigned; W. G. Gleason, of Yankton, to be associate justice vice Joseph L. Williams, term expired; Jefferson P. Kidder to be associate justice vice Ara Bartlett, promoted. Litchfield had been a deputy United States marshal for nearly three years. He lived in Bon Homme County and was originally a Pennsylvanian, coming here for his health. He was a young man; was highly esteemed and the situation was everywhere approved; the fact that he was taken from the territory was a very popular feature. Bartlett had been associate justice for nearly a year in the Vermillion District. Gleason was the United States attorney, and Mr. Kidder was a Minnesotan, originally from Vermont, and one of the party who settled in Sioux Falls from St. Paul in 1857. William Tripp was appointed surveyor general and John Hutchinson was re-appointed secretary. Patrick H. Congar, of Dubuque, was appointed United States agent of the Yankton Indians to succeed Mr. Burleigh who had been elected delegate to Congress and was at this time acting in that capacity at Washington.

President Johnson, who succeeded Mr. Lincoln, made a number of appointments, to-wit: Dr. Joel A. Potter, of Micksville, was appointed United States agent of the Ponca Indians, and James M. Stone, of Yankton, was appointed agent of the Santee Sioux at Crow Creek. It will be observed that nearly all these appointments were bestowed upon citizens of Dakota Territory, some of them former officials and some new men. This was acceptable to the people of Dakota, and added largely to the popularity of the new delegate, Major Burleigh, who was an ardent supporter of this policy.

Capt. Nelson Miner, late of Company A, Dakota Cavalry, was appointed register of the United States land office at Vermillion in June in place of James M. Allen, whose term had expired. The old soldiers were preferred thereafter for federal offices.

President Johnson also made appointments to federal offices in Dakota as follows:

William B. Tripp, surveyor general, in May, 1866, in place of George D. Hill, whose term had expired. General Tripp was captain of Company B, Dakota Cavalry, during the late Civil war.

George H. Hand was appointed United States attorney for the District of Dakota, in May, 1866. Mr. Hand was a resident of Dakota and a Civil war veteran.

William E. Gleason, associate justice of Dakota, was appointed United States consul at Bordeaux, France, in June, 1866, resigning his judgeship.

John W. Boyle, register of the United States land office at Vermillion, was appointed associate justice to succeed Mr. Gleason.

George Stickney, of Elk Point, was appointed successor to Mr. Boyle.

Joseph R. Hanson, of Yankton, was appointed United States Indian agent of the Upper Missouri Tribes in March, 1866, in place of Samuel N. Latta, whose term had expired. Hanson's headquarters were at Fort Thompson.

Dr. Henry F. Livingston, of Yankton, was appointed physician and surgeon at Crow Creek Indian Agency, May, 1867.

Phil K. Foulk was appointed transcribing clerk in the office of the surveyor general of Dakota, in June, 1866, succeeding James S. Foster.

Two new federal offices were made for Dakota in 1866, assessor and collector of internal revenue. E. C. Collins, of Union county, was appointed assessor, and Wm. Shriner, of Clay, collector.

Carl C. C. P. Meyer, of Yankton, was appointed emigration commissioner for Dakota in Germany and other countries in Europe, in March, 1866, and left for his post of duty on the 13th of March.

David M. Mills, of Union County, was appointed assessor of internal revenue for Dakota Territory in December, 1867, in place of E. C. Collins, removed for political reasons.

Gideon C. Moody was appointed, under the new national bankruptcy law, register in bankruptcy for the District of Dakota, in July, 1867.

The mustering out of the military service of the United States of Company A, Dakota Cavalry, was an event of importance to the members of the company and of great significance to the people of the territory, for it signified that war had been banished from the land. Peace reigned to the utmost bounds of the nation. It was a happy occasion, and occurred at Vermillion, the home of Capt. Nelson Miner, on Wednesday, May 9, 1865, after three years of honorable and arduous service. The members of the company had been recruited from Clay, Yankton and Bon Homme counties, but nearly all of them were young, single men, who had no particular point in view for a settlement and occupation.

The Dakota Cavalry had made an excellent military record, receiving frequent and earnest commendation of their commanders, both volunteer and regular, and acquitting themselves on all occasions with great credit. Their discipline, valor and efficiency were observed and commented upon by the troops of our neighboring states who served in the same campaigns, and their soldiery accomplishments were fitly recognized by General Sully in his general orders on the occasion of their leaving the service, and more directly when he selected Companies A and B as his body guard for the campaign of 1864.

Company B was mustered out at Sioux City, November 15, 1865, on which occasion General Sully issued the following general order:

Sioux City, Iowa, November 5, 1865.

General Orders, No. 6

Company B, Dakota Cavalry, being under orders to muster out, will in a few days leave the service of the United States.

They having been under my command for nearly three years, I take the occasion of the mustering out of the last organization of Dakota troops, to thank both officers and men for the good service they have rendered the country and the cordial support they have rendered me.

In this including Captain Miner's Company "A" as well as Captain Tripp's Company "B."

Although the service will be the loser by the muster out of these troops, the Territory of Dakota will be greatly the gainer by the return of such a valuable body of men.

ALFRED SULLY, Brigadier Major General.

There was no earnest attempt to put the machinery of the Government of the counties of the territory in operation until the year 1865. In the early days of Dakota's settlement there was very little attention given to the public affairs devolving upon a county government. No taxes were levied and as a matter of course none were paid. A small amount was occasionally collected from retailers of intoxicating liquors in payment of license, but this was all. An occasional case in justice's court was the extent of legal proceeding under the territorial laws; the district courts being held at the expense of the general Government. There were no places set apart for the transaction of public business. As there was no deeded property, except the half-breed scrip lands, and the lands awarded to certain persons, all Indians, under the Yankton Treaty, the recorder of deeds, leases, and bonds for deeds, etc., was able to look after his duties and keep his record at his place of business without inconvenience. An occasional meeting of the board of county commissioners was held to make provision for elections, and to enable the other county officers to qualify. There was so little taxable property that it was claimed the expense of assessment and collection of the tax would not pay the expense incident to the work. The first and one of the essential inducements to county government was lacking, to-wit: the means to defray the expense. The sheriff's authority as a peace officer was seldom called for, the law and order sentiment in all the Dakota settlements being sufficiently predominant and cheerfully willing to suppress any manifestations of lawlessness, and more apt to visit summary punishment upon an offender than would have been the case under legal formalities. Public opinion held the lawless in restraint, in nearly every community.

With the year 1865, however, there came the demand, induced by increasing population and varied interests, for attention to all departments of public affairs, and provision was made for the convenient and methodical transaction of the public business.

Very high prices for everything in the line of merchandise prevailed during the war not only in Dakota but throughout the United States; and although the price of everything had been "sky rocketed," as it was termed, labor was also well paid, and the people of the northern states were never so prosperous. Money was plentiful, the disbursements of the Government alone being in the neighborhood of two million a day. At the beginning of the war the amount of money in the country was given as $17 per capita. It rose rapidly after the Rebellion broke out and had soon reached the unparalleled amount of $50 per capita. Population in the United States at that time, however, was about one-third the present number. The money used was exclusively Government notes called greenbacks. Special payments had been suspended at the beginning of the war in 1861, and were not resumed until 1879, a period of eighteen years. Gold and silver were not in circulation as money, and the old state bank currency that existed prior to the war had been discredited and largely retired. The day of a national currency had dawned, forced upon the country by the exigency of war. The Government notes were issued in denominations of $1 and up to $1,000. There was also a fractional paper currency called (popularly) "shin plasters." These the Government issued in denominations of 5, 10, 15, 20, 25 and 50 cents. Gold became a commodity, the same as sugar and flour, and was bought and sold at prices varying with supply and demand. It was at a premium at the beginning of the war, and rose in value until it sold as high as $2.65 in greenbacks for $1 in gold. It was principally used in transactions with foreign countries, the Government requiring large amounts for the purchase of ships, ammunition for war, and stores for the navy and army. The price of all merchandise and labor was based on paper money. Flour went up to $12.50 a barrel during 1863-64. The army consumed enormously of flour and meats, and large quantities of these were imported. Prices in Dakota were in keeping with those which prevailed throughout the country. Flour at one time sold at $7.50 per 100, and all other provisions and groceries in proportion, except fresh meats, which were really cheaper then than now. Such an article as good butter, eggs and poultry, however, while comparatively plenty for ordinary times, were in such demand at the military camps and forts that very little was offered to civilians who would object to paying 75 cents a pound for the butter and $1.50 per dozen for the eggs. The soldiers on the other hand made no objection to the price. Potatoes at different times sold for $4.50 and $5 a bushel.

The financial lessons taught by the Civil war in the United States were of the greatest value to the people and particularly to the student of the economic science, and brought about an entire change or revolution in the methods of furnishing a circulating medium for the needs of the American people. There were a number of wise and patriotic men in control of the Government during the war, and their work and its results were marvels of able and honest statesmanship. The federal currency first, and the national bank with its currency, are among the financial fruits of the great Rebellion. Salmon P. Chase, the eminent Ohio jurist and statesman, was secretary of the treasury during Lincoln's first term, and was called the "father of the greenback."

PEACE TREATIES WITH HOSTILE INDIANS

KIDDER APPOINTED U. S. JUDGES.

Congress at its session in 1864-5 appropriated a sum of money for the construction of wagon roads and bridges in Dakota as well as other parts of the West, to accommodate the rapidly growing travel to Montana and Idaho. One of the roads started from Omaha and ran along the west bank of the Missouri to Niobrara, thence out that valley to the mountains. Another started from the Big Sioux River at Paquette's Ferry, and ran by the way of Vermillion, Yankton, Bonhomme, and on up the river to Fort Randall. Still another started from a point on the Minnesota state line south of Big Stone Lake, thence west across Dakota to the mouth of the Big Cheyenne, and thence up the Cheyenne to point of intersection in the mountains with the Omaha road. Col. G. C. Moody, of Yankton, was appointed superintendent of the road from the Big Sioux up the Missouri Valley via Yankton, to Fort Randall. He had $25,000 to expend on the work which included bridging the Big Sioux, Vermillion and James rivers, and some small streams above. Hon. W. W. Brookings was appointed superintendent of the Minnesota and Cheyenne Road, and was given $30,000 to expend. J. A. Sawyer, of Sioux City, was appointed superintendent of the Omaha highway and was given $50,000.

Colonel Moody began operations the first of June, his initial work being the construction of a bridge across the Big Sioux River near Paquette's Ferry, Mr. B. M. Smith, of Yankton, being the engineer in charge of construction. The bridge was constructed of wood with timber posts on good foundation. It was 500 feet long, 16 feet wide, supported by 7 piers 50 feet high. Each pier was barracked with 20 cords of stone to protect from floating ice.

At the same time, June 1, 1865, Superintendent Brookings started out with his work of laying out a road from the foot of Big Stone Lake to the Big Cheyenne, thence up that stream. The work east of the Missouri was left until the western portions up the Cheyenne had been completed owing to the number of emigrants who were waiting to take this new road to the gold fields. Brookings had a large outfit as he was required to take supplies for all his employes including tents and bedding. Accompanying the Brookings' expedition were George N. Propper, as engineer; Charles F. Picotte, as interpreter; Charles de Way, as guide; J. B. Greenway, John Rouse, Geo. Buell, Fred Edgar, Aaron Carpenter, James McGort, John Gray, George Falkenberg, S. Minde, Amos Shaw, J. M. Maskell, John McClellan, Charles Wright, of Yankton, Larsen Bothun, Erick Nelson, of Clay, and Kund Larson and Kund Severson, of Gayville, J. R. Hanson went as clerk. The expedition proceeded without incident to Fort Sully where it was to be joined by General Sully and his military escort of 600 men who were going along with the wagon road expedition, not solely as an escort but incidentally so; the purpose of Sully being to locate and build one or two military posts, one of which would be near the Black Hills. Brookings waited three weeks for his military companion and not meeting him started his expedition up the Cheyenne about July 1st, and was able to lay out a good road and bridge it where necessary as far as the forks of the Big Cheyenne, where he ceased operations in that direction, returned to the Missouri River and laid out the road to the Minnesota state line, establishing the eastern terminus on the eastern boundary of the territory near the Red Pipestone Quarry at Flandreau, a distance of 250 miles from the mouth of the Cheyenne. He returned on the 15th day of August, having done a good season's work, but not as complete or as extensive as contemplated because of the failure of the military to co-operate which was due to a radical change in the army establishment in every military department of the nation, and not to neglect or indifference. The Minnesota portion of the road starts from opposite the mouth of the Cheyenne River, running southeast along the Valley of the Missouri to the Crow Creek Agency, a distance of 100 miles, thence east across the territory to Pipestone, Minnesota, 160 miles. The route was substantially marked, and bridged where fords could not be found, but a larger appropriation would be necessary to put it in good condition for travel. Near the head of the Vermillion River the party encountered a herd of about one hundred buffalo, and enjoyed an exciting day's hunt, capturing three of the animals, and losing one horse or Indian pony, who got away and joined the herd, and defied all efforts at capture. The party had no trouble whatever with Indians. "Brookings Crossing" on the James, was near the modern Town of Forestbury.

A part of Colonel Sawyer's expedition, designed to build the road from Omaha, came from Sioux City by way of Yankton at this same time, and crossed the Missouri at that point. This cavalcade consisted of thirteen wagons, fifty yoke of cattle and twenty men. The main party went up on the Nebraska side to Niobrara where the Yankton party joined them. Sawyer had a military escort numbering twenty-five soldiers of Company B, Dakota Cavalry, and a large number of emigrant teams had joined his train in order to get the advantage of the military protection afforded. Mr. Sawyer passed up the Niobrara following it for about two hundred miles, passing by the southern base of the Black Hills, thence struck across the plains to Fort Laramie where he halted for a time. The expedition was constantly annoyed by hostile Indians who were aware that one purpose of the expedition was to explore as much of the Black Hills as was practicable. In the party were a number of miners who would overlook no opportunity to prospect. At one point about one thousand Indians coralled the train, severe fighting took place and Nathaniel Hedges, and Newell Sawyer were killed. The former was a brother of Charles and Daniel Hedges, two of the leading merchants of Sioux City, and the latter a brother of the commander of the expedition. There were also other casualties.

A change was made in the superintendency of the Sioux City and Fort Randall wagon road, February, 1866, G. C. Moody retiring. He was succeeded by an attache of the Interior Department, residing at Cincinnati, A. B. Miller, a professional engineer, who came on to Dakota and took charge of the work, the most important part of which was the construction of the bridges over the Big Sioux, Vermillion and James rivers, the Big Sioux bridge being the only one on which a beginning had been made, and was yet in an unfinished condition. There had been considerable delay in securing the iron work for the superstructure, and it had been found that the appropriation was not sufficient to complete it. An additional appropriation of $10,000 was made at the same rent session of Congress. The work upon which Mr. Miller engaged, the construction of the bridges over the Big Sioux, Vermillion and James rivers, progressed satisfactorily though not rapidly, under his superintendency, the delay being chiefly attributable to the tardiness of contractors in supplying material and damage from the spring floods. Work on the bridge over the James River had been going forward in a desultory manner since the summer of 1865. Mr. Miller was an excellent superintendent and doubtless had pushed the work as rapidly as circumstances would admit of. He had practically completed the Big Sioux and Vermillion bridges, which were first in order, and in 1867 had made some progress with the James River structure. He was taken ill at Sioux City early in November, 1867, and died at the Northwestern Hotel on the 9th of that month. His malady was called dyspepsia. He left a widow and two children who at the time of his death were in New York. His sudden death interrupted the work. He had ordered a large proportion of his material for the James River bridge from Chicago, shipping it to Council Bluffs thence up the Missouri by steamboat and delays in the reception of these supplies had prevented the rapid progress of the work. This bridge had been seriously damaged by the high water in the stream in the spring of 1867. The unfinished superstructure was lifted from the piers and floated off some distance, but was grappled in time to preserve a part of it. The remainder of the season was expended in returning it to its proper position and in supplying the material that had been damaged or floated off beyond recovery. And to add to the discouraging situation it was found that the appropriation was well nigh exhausted, and nothing further could be done by the Federal Government until a further appropriation was made. Under these circumstances the commissioners of Yankton County, supported by the unanimous sentiment of the people, submitted a written proposition to the secretary of the interior, Mr. Browning, to turn the entire matter over to Yankton County, including all material and whatever funds might be remaining, and the county would guarantee to complete the work forthwith. The secretary declined this proposal for the reason that he had no authority to enter into such an agreement, but authorized the county to take charge of the uncompleted bridge and material, and care for it until Congress should make the needed appropriation to complete the work, which it did at the next session and the bridge was completed in 1869 under the superintendency of Hon. John Lawrence.

The interior department ordered work suspended on the Big Cheyenne Wagon Road in the spring of 1866. The survey and a portion of the construction work on the road had been completed the year before, and the appropriation for the improvement had not been exhausted, and no cause for the discontinuance of the project was apparent. An explanation came out later, when it was found that the directors of the Union Pacific Railroad had, through General Curtis, a member of the peace commission and also a director in that company, represented to the department that the opening of the Cheyenne Road would be fraught with grave consequences owing to the uncompromising opposition of the Sioux Indians, who regarded the improvement as a pretext on the part of the whites to get into the Black Hills; on the other hand it was stated on the authority of men familiar with the Indians interested, that they desired the road built and traveled, because it would be the means to bring a class of whites through the country who would be generously disposed to the Indians, and whose sugar, coffee and flour were given out to them liberally by the emigrants; that the road would not jeopardize the safety of the Black Hills because its route would lead to the north from the forks of the Cheyenne.

In February, Mr. Brookings, who was superintendent of the Big Cheyenne Road, was relieved of his office and directed to turn over the public property in his possession to Colonel Sawyer, superintendent of the Niobrara Road. This action terminated operation on the shortest and most practicable route from the Missouri to the gold fields of Montana and Idaho, and caused great surprise and indignation among the people of the territory. The Government was committed to the opening of this route, and valuable interests in Montana as well as Dakota would be detrimentally affected by its abandonment. An authentic statement giving the reasons for abandoning the project was given out from Washington a few weeks later, as follows:

The secretary of the interior has directed the suspension of surveys for certain wagon roads in the territories. This has been done upon the recommendation of L. B. Taylor, of Nebraska; Maj. Gen. S. R. Curtis, General Sibley, and Henry W. Reed, of Iowa, a majority of the commissioners appointed to treat with the hostile Indians of the Upper Missouri last autumn. In their judgment it would be highly impolitic and dangerous to make any further surveys of routes through a country inhabited by felon bands of Sioux Indians before the negotiations contemplated with the bands and tribes, as well as those already negotiated, have been fully completed and the annuities under the latter fully paid as stipulated.

There were reasons for believing that this recommendation of these gentlemen connected with the Indian peace commission was not given solely because they apprehended any objection from the Upper Missouri Indians, but in response to the influence of the Union Pacific Railroad then being constructed, whose policy was to discourage the opening of the Upper Missouri routes, and to direct emigration to the gold fields along and near the line of the great railway. In evidence of this, an article from the treaties made in 1805, to which these objecting gentlemen were a party, is here quoted:

Article 4th. The said band represented in council shall withdraw from the routes overland already established or hereafter to be established through this country, and in consideration thereof, and of their non-interference with the persons and property of citizens of the United States traveling thereon, the Government of the United States agrees to pay the said bands, etc., here giving the consideration, time of payment annually, to extend for twenty years.

This article fourth was a part of all the treaties with the Missouri tribes; and a significant fact is that the Sawyer's Wagon Road from Sioux City via the Niobrara, and the Big Cheyenne Wagon Road were the only Upper Missouri roads then authorized by Congress. It is clear that these commissioners, who had induced the secretary of the interior to suspend the work, had forgotten this treaty stipulation or were guilty of gross misrepresentation in order to assist a rival route at the great expense of the emigrant in time and money. The Union Pacific Route, from the nearest point to the gold fields of the Northwest on their line, was greatly inferior in every essential feature for a wagon road and nearly double the distance of the Cheyenne Route.

Colonel Sawyer, who had charge of the Sioux City and Niobrara Valley Wagon Road to Idaho, went out in 1866 to complete his work begun in '65. He was provided with a military escort consisting of twenty-five men, and had great need of a larger force, for much of his time was consumed in counseling and fighting with the hostile bands of Indians, who looked upon his expedition as a Black Hills crusade. The conflict known as the Battle of Crazy Woman's Fork was fought by Sawyer's military and civilians, in which five soldiers and one lieutenant were killed, and a number of whites wounded with arrows. The expedition was most continually harassed by Indians, which made its progress slow, and for 100 miles in the country south of the Black Hills region, the command encamped in the neighboring Sand Hills, where, though exposed to many privations and discomforts, they were exempt from the stealthy attacks of the savages. The expedition finally passed beyond the Black Hills country and were no longer molested by the Indians, and finally reached Fort Reno and Piney Fort, on Powder River, Montana, and from that point went on to Virginia City. Owing to the Indian difficulties this expedition was prevented from making such an examination of the country as was necessary to determine whether a practicable highway could be found through that region, and the route was never opened or traveled, at least that portion of it along the Niobrara. The strenuous opposition of the Indians which Sawyer encountered did not spring from opposition to the wagon road to Idaho nor from any feeling of hostility to the Government, but grew out of their suspicions that their cherished Black Hills were to be invaded and taken from them.

ARMY VS. CIVIL CONTROL OF INDIANS

The harmonious relations between the civil authorities of Dakota and the military authorities of the department of Dakota commanded by Gen. John Pope, Milwaukee, began to be disturbed during and after the campaigns against the Indians in 1864. There was a feeling on the part of our civil authorities that more could be accomplished by treaty with the Indians than by fighting them, and at less expense; and Governor Edmunds, of Dakota, was quite in earnest in his efforts to induce the Washington authorities to give his treaty plan a trial. On the side of the governor were about all the influential whites in the Indian country, including the missionaries, the traders, and many prominent and influential civilians at Washington and Philadelphia, and also to some extent, the business interests of the territory which felt the injury done to immigration, and desired a return of peace when eastern people could feel secure in coming here and taking up the land.

In his message to the Legislative Assembly of 1864-5 and in his official character Governor Edmunds had taken a position in favor of abandoning Indian expeditions and war as a means of securing peace with the Indians, affirming that peace could be had for only a fraction of the cost of an army, and without the sacrifice of human life by means of treaties properly entered into and judiciously observed. The governor was ex-officio superintendent of Indian affairs in Dakota, and was therefore in a position to speak advisedly and authoritatively on the subject. The two campaigns under Sibley and Sully in 1863, and the campaign under General Sully in 1864, had cost a number of lives, both whites and Indians; had been attended by an immense outlay of Government money, and though the Indians had been beaten, their property destroyed, and their organized fighting forces broken up, they were regarded as still hostile and a serious menace to the peace of the frontier, and to the continuance of immigration, and the military power was still depended upon to protect the settlements and control the enemy.

It was presumed that all parties wanted peace; but the official avenue through which this peace movement had been inaugurated was looked upon by a portion of the military people in authority as an unwarranted interference with their prerogatives. The army, they claimed, had found and subdued the hostile savages, and now if the latter wanted friendly relations restored, let them sue for it to the military power. Thus would they be taught to respect that authority; while the policy of interference by the civil authorities would tend to belittle the influence of the army with the savages. The army they claimed was entitled to the moral as well as legal support of the Government. This difference of opinion raised a serious question that was not finally disposed of for a number of years, and gave rise or rather contributed to the peace policy of the Government. The question became an issue in the politics of the territory in 1865, and the people of the towns were divided in sentiment, but the contention seemed to be governed largely by the selfish motive as to which policy was best for the material interests of the white people of the territory, and had little regard for the welfare of the Indian; one side contending that military control meant a large army of consumers in the territory and the expenditure of large sums among the farmers for grain and cattle; while their opponents insisted that there would be greater gain to the farmers in the more rapid influx of immigrants who would take up the vacant lands, establish schools, pay taxes, improve roads and build bridges, and from this source more substantial benefit would be gained to the whites, than from a prolongation of the frontier troubles which would tend to drive immigration to other territories and imperil the safety of those already settled in the territory. The sequel proved that the whites in the territory by a large majority favored a peace policy.

The governor's proposed policy was not approved by the military people; and those acting with him, including several prominent civilians within as well as without the territory, were indirectly accused of throwing obstacles in the way of the army that only served to encourage the Indians in their hostilities, but strengthened them for conflict.

On the other side and in retaliation, the military were accused of prolonging the troubles that they might continue to hold high positions and control immense patronage and great authority. The Civil war had made marvelous changes in the personnel of the United States army. From a small body of 28,000 men, with little duty, except to garrison a few military posts and protect the public property, it had suddenly become a mighty army of nearly a million men. Military training and education had been at an exalted premium, and many of the young officers had gained a higher rank in the few years of the war than would have been gained in a life time of service under the ordinary conditions of peace. The Civil war closed in 1865, late in the spring and early summer and there was no time lost in mustering the Union soldiers—the enlisted men—out of service, and returning them to their homes and the industries of peace. And this left a number of officers of the regular army without a command, or other suitable employment. The military departments were reduced in number by consolidation, and some were altogether discontinued. In some few very distinguished instances, the country desired to reward its greatest heroes by special marks of its gratitude. It was therefore not a difficult matter for the captains to discover a selfish motive on the part of the military authorities of the department to keep up the campaigning against the Indians, even when there did not seem to be a longer necessity for it, for the great bodies of hostile Indians had been thoroughly subdued and weakened by the disastrous defeats they had suffered in 1863 and 1864, and their condition in 1864 was discovered to be that of an enemy incapable of making a stubborn resistance. The military gentlemen, however, were strongly intrenched in the war department, and had powerful friends in Congress, while they had also the support of the no-good Indian sentiment throughout the country. The verbal and written conflict went on between the two authorities, and took on more bitterness with age. The newspapers discussed the matter and the majority largely favored the civil side and as war had grown unpopular the advocates of peace treaties as a substitute for force had the popular breeze with them.

In August, 1865, in response to a very general and respectable sentiment prevalent in the country, President Johnson appointed a mixed commission, composed of eminent military men as well as civilians to visit the Indian country and make treaties with all the Indian tribes in the Northwest who had recently been engaged in hostilities. Congress at its late session had appropriated $20,000 to defray the expenses of such a commission body. The commission consisted of Newton Edmunds, governor of Dakota; Gen. S. R. Curtis, commanding the Dakota military division; Gen. H. H. Sibley, Minnesota; Edw. B. Taylor, north-western superintendent of Indian affairs of Omaha; A. Guernsey, Janesville, Wis.; and Rev. Henry W. Reed, of Dubuque, Ia. This commission met at Yankton on the 20th of September and elected Governor Edmunds, chairman, and spent several days arranging their plans. They got away for the Indian country on Monday, the 25th of September, taking the Steamboat Cylipso, which they had chartered for their use. The season of navigation was drawing to a close but word had been sent to all the hostile tribes and there was no doubt they would meet the commissioners, so that the board felt it all important not to disappoint them. The usual delays in river navigation were encountered, but in spite of all difficulties, treaties of peace and amity were made with the representatives of nine different tribes of the Sioux, all of whom had been engaged in the hostile ranks in 1863 and '64; these were the Minneconyoux, Brules, Lower Brules, Two Kettles, Blackfeet Sioux, Ogalalas, Uncpapas, Upper and Lower Yanktonnais and Sans Arcs. The lateness of the season prevented as full an attendance at some of the councils as was desired, and there were some of the Black Hill bands that did not come in, but it was discovered that the sentiment of the Indians was overwhelmingly for peace at any price, and the work of the commission was also timely as it satisfied the Indians that the Great Father was still friendly disposed; that he was willing to overlook their past hostile conduct, and would extend to them a helping hand as rapidly as they exhibited a disposition to receive it in good faith. The entire Indian population of the Northwest learned of these peace movements in a short time and there was a noticeable change for the better in the conduct of all the tribes. It was one of those victories that give force to the axiom that "peace hath her victories no less renowned than war," and the entire cost or expense to the Government of the commission was less than would have been required to maintain a company of cavalry on the frontier for a year. There was no change in the disposition of the troops because of these peace measures and none was expected for several months, at least until the new routes to the mines in Montana were opened and other treaties made with the remainder of the Sioux Nation. The Minneconyoux and Sans Arcs were the owners of the soil over which the Brookings Wagon Road was laid along the Big Cheyenne, and they were given about twenty-five thousand dollars for the right of way for that thoroughfare.

The Indian commissioners did not complete their work with all the hostile tribes in 1865 and another expedition for a similar purpose was undertaken in 1866 with the expectation of going to the head of navigation on the Missouri. Commissioners Sibley and Taylor were detached to conclude a treaty with a tribe in Western Nebraska, the others named constituting the Missouri commission. They left Yankton on the Steamboat Ben Johnson, June 11, 1866, Hon. M. K. Armstrong accompanying the party as clerk. At Fort Rice the commission found about five hundred and seventy lodges, or 3,000 Indians belonging to the Upper Yanktonais, Blackfeet, Sans Arcs and Ogalalas, with whom they arranged terms of peace. A treaty was also made with 188 lodges of Santees who had sent a delegation to Rice for that purpose, claiming that at no time had they engaged in war against the whites, and had been in the company of hostile Indians only under compulsion.

At Fort Berthold a council was held with the Rees, Gros Ventres, Mandans and Cheyennes, all independent nations and all occupying a friendly position toward the Government except the Cheyennes. These Indians had not been engaged in hostilities against the Government, but were at constant war with the Sioux which it was desired to terminate in the interest of civilizing both combatants. A cession of lands was also made part of the agreement. The treaty obligated the Arickarees and their associated tribes, the Gros Ventres and Mandans to perpetual peace and friendship by abstaining from all hostilities; the Indians also agreed to the construction of roads, highways and telegraph lines through their country; they agreed to surrender to the United States lawless persons guilty of criminal acts; that they would not make war upon other Indians; and that no intoxicating liquors shall be introduced among their people. The United States agreed to expend for the benefit of said Indians, in goods, provisions and implements the sum of $10,000 annually for twenty years, in purchasing such needed supplies; in employing farmers and mechanics and school teachers to instruct them and their children. Further:

And the chiefs and headmen of the Gros Ventres and Mandan tribes, associated with the Arickarees, do agree as follows:

It being made known to all the tribes thus associated that the United States may desire to connect a line of stages with the Missouri River, at the salient angle thereof, about thirty miles below Fort Berthold, and may desire to establish settlements and mechanical structures to accommodate the growing commerce and travel, by land and river, the chiefs and headmen of these several tribes do hereby convey to the United States all their right and title to the following lands, situated on the northeast side of the Missouri River, to wit:

Beginning on the Missouri River at the mouth of Snake River, about thirty miles below Fort Berthold, thence up Snake River and in a northeast direction, twenty-five miles; thence southwardly, parallel to the Missouri River, to a point opposite and twenty-five miles east of old Fort Clark; thence west to a point on the Missouri River opposite to old Fort Clark; thence up the Missouri River to the place of beginning.

As a further consideration on the part of the United States it was agreed to pay to the Gros Ventres and Mandan tribes the sum of $5,000 annually, in goods, at the discretion of the President.

A more formidable enemy than Indians was encountered by the members of the commission in the myriads of hostile mosquitoes above Fort Berthold, bred from the carcasses of thousands of decaying buffalo which lined the banks on either side. The insects would attack the people on the boat at sundown, and thereafter gave them no opportunity to sleep. On one occasion the attack was of such a serious character and so prolonged that it caused a panic among the women and children who had taken passage for some points in the upper river, and fatal results were apprehended as the result of their sufferings. The boat was tied up as was usual during the hours of night, and not a person on board made any effort to sleep. Mosquito bars were no protection, and in desperation the captain weighed anchor and started the Ben Johnson up-stream through the gloom at 1 o'clock in the morning, piloted by a small boat. Once out in the channel a refreshing breeze was encountered, and the plague largely disappeared.

At Fort Union the commission found about five thousand Indians, three-fourths of whom were not Sioux but were among the hostile tribes. These were the Crows, the Assinaboines, Black Feet and Bloods. Treaties were effected with all these people with very little difficulty. They were opposed to further hostilities and desired to be again restored to the Great Father's favor and receive his counsel and rations. The Indians generally accepted the proposition of the Government that they should, as far as possible, abandon their savage mode of life and make a beginning in a settled and industrial career.

All the foregoing treaties were nearly identical in their provisions and related to the maintaining of peaceful relations; the Indians to receive certain annuities and protection; their reservations to be respected; and a sum of money was granted to each amounting in most instances to ten thousand dollars, to be expended for them under direction of the President as a consideration for certain overland wagon roads from the Missouri River to Montana, which pass through the Indian country. The Indians were also to be given substantial assistance whenever any of them desired to enter upon a civilized mode of life and cultivate the soil by being furnished with a farmer, blacksmith and school teachers at the expense of the United States. These treaties, with their provisions further elaborated, were in large part superseded by the Laramie treaty of 1869.

A treaty was negotiated with the Lower Brule band of Sioux Indians in 1865, which provided that in consideration of the Brules becoming and remaining friendly and withdrawing their opposition to the overland routes already established or to be established through their country (west of the Missouri), the Government of the United States would pay them $6,000 annually for twenty years, and also set apart for the tribe a reservation near the mouth of White River to include Fort Lookout, twenty miles in a straight line along the Missouri River and ten miles in depth, and when fifty lodges or families should occupy said reservation the United States would furnish to each the sum of $25 a year for five years to be expended for live stock and agricultural implements.

As has been stated the peace commission on their first visit to the hostile Indians in 1865 found the Indians anxiously prepared to make peace; but the hostile spirit had been actively manifested during the summer and but a few weeks before the Great Father's commission came with the olive branch, numerous small war parties continued their depredations and kept the frontiers in continual excitement. Troops were kept busy. The steamboat traffic had grown immensely owing to the gold discoveries in Montana and Idaho. The steamers Sam Gaty, Benton, Welcome, Silver Heels, Roanoke, J. H. Lacy, David Watts, Fannie Ogden, A. Majors, Magill, Mars, Prairie State and Spray were all in the upper river before the end of May, 1865, and all were more or less armored as a protection against the bullets and arrows of the savages who held the steamboat in deadly aversion. The Steamboat Benton reached Yankton on her return trip from Fort Benton in August, 1865. She had been in the upper river between three and four months, having been impressed into Government service to transport supplies and troops from point to point, and had been frequently attacked by skulking war parties. Her captain estimated that the craft had been the target for at least one thousand shots but no man had been hit. There were thirty-three bullet holes in the upper portion of the boat where the armor had failed to protect it, and the chimneys were decorated with scores of indentations where the bullets had struck them.

There was a radical change in the military program early in the summer. The original design was to send a small expedition of about one thousand men under General Sully up into the Black Hills and Yellowstone country, for the purpose of constructing a fort near the forks of the Cheyenne and another on Powder River. The military forces consisted of one battalion of the Seventh Iowa, Colonel Pottee; four companies of Brackett's Minnesota Battalion, and five companies of the Sixth Iowa Cavalry under Lieutenant Colonel Ten Broeck; all under command of Brigadier General Sully. The expedition got away from Yankton on Tuesday the 13th of June, intending to proceed up the river to the mouth of the Big Cheyenne and accompany Brookings wagon road expedition up that stream to the forks. A number of changes had taken place during the summer in various military departments, many of them no longer rendered necessary owing to the termination of the Civil war; and the Department of Dakota, which had not been before disturbed, was made a part of the Department of the Northwest, headquarters at St. Louis, with the famous Gen. W. T. Sherman in command; and about the same time General Pope was superseded by General Curtis. Two days after General Sully left Yankton Major Weed, of General Curtis' staff, reached that point bearing dispatches from headquarters, and pushed on the same night to overtake Sully. The effect of these dispatches was to cause a change in the destination of General Sully, who was ordered to proceed to the Devil's Lake country and select a site for a fort. This explains why Mr. Brookings failed to get his military escort for his wagon road expedition to the forks of the Cheyenne. General Sully therefore did not cross the Missouri, but continued up the east side of the Missouri to a point above Fort Rice, and then marched his command across to Devil's Lake, and selected the site for the new army post, Fort Totter, and constructed some log barracks, enclosing them with a stockade. He left a sufficient force to protect the public property and defend the post and returned to Fort Sully in the fall with the Iowa troops. As the three years of service of the Iowa Volunteers expired that fall, they were sent to Sioux City and mustered out. No difficulty was met with from the hostile Indians on the trip. The comparatively few unrepentant and warlike ones that had infested the Devil's Lake region retired into British America. These were Inkpaduta's band of Santees, and another band of the same tribe under Standing Buffalo, and two or three hundred Yanktonais who had fought against Sibley and Sully in 1863. (See Pope's order in 1866.)

While General Sully was engaged in his work of establishing Fort Totter he was apprised that a large body of Indians who had been engaged in hostilities against the Government forces the year before would meet him at Fort Rice and sign a treaty of peace. The general's orders would not permit of his engaging in making treaties, the Government having appointed commissioners for this purpose, who were then about to start on their mission. This was the Edmunds peace commission. The Indians who had signified their desire to make a treaty were largely the Yanktonais who had belonged to Big Head's forces and Santees who had remained in the hostile camp.

FORT DAKOTA AND FORT JAMES

The military authorities of the District of Dakota were busily employed during the season of 1865. Measures to protect the settlements of Dakota against any future hostilities were adopted, the prominent feature being the erection of military posts at Sioux Falls and near the mouth of Firesteel Creek, on James River. These posts were built during the summer and garrisoned by 100 men each. The troops were employed in patrolling the country between the forts, the same system being employed between Firesteel and the fort at Crow Creek, thus making a patrol guard along the frontier from Sioux Falls across to the Missouri at Crow Creek. No hostile body of Indians could slip through the lines undetected and they seldom made this attempt. The site of the fort at Sioux Falls was located by Lieutenant Colonel Pottee of the Seventh Iowa. The fort was built of stone, and was of sufficient capacity to accommodate 100 men, a year's supply of provisions and stabling for 100 horses. It was first named Fort Brookings, but later, by order of the War Department, it was officially called Fort Dakota. That section of Dakota had been abandoned in August, 1862, and no attempt at settlement had been made there in the meantime owing to the Indian troubles. In the summer of 1865 there was not a sign of white man's habitation between James River and Sioux Falls along the section of country usually traversed in going from Yankton to that place, and no settlement was attempted in Minnehaha County until late in 1867. A. F. Hayward, of Yankton, who was a member of the New York colony, was the first sutler, assisted by Christopher Brookings, a nephew of Judge Brookings, who had come out from Maine during the spring.

The site for the fort on the James River was also selected by Pottee. It was on the west bank of the stream about sixty-three miles from Yankton and fifty-seven miles from Sioux Falls. Its dimensions were 152 by 200 feet, intended to accommodate eighty men and animals. The materials used in the construction was stone and hewn timber. It was named Fort James and was garrisoned by one company of the Sixth Iowa. Maj. W. P. Lyman, of Yankton, was appointed sutler.

Notwithstanding the success of the peace commission in effecting treaties with the hostile tribes, the realignment of the Indians on the Dakota reservations caused a great deal of commotion and gave the appearance of serious disturbance at some points where a large population of Indians were gathered. At and in the vicinity of Fort Thompson there were several thousand natives of the untamed and untutored class. Dr. H. F. Livingston, who was the surgeon at Fort Thompson, visited the settlements about this time, and commenting upon the Indian situation, explained that while the Indians were not manifesting any unusual unfriendliness toward the whites in the country there was a continual state of war between the Sioux and the Indians of other tribes. One serious cause of trouble that was apprehended would grow out of the removal of Southern Indians to that country which already had more than it could well subsist. The increase of Indian population was a heavy tax on the natural resources of the country in the line of fish and game, and there was a good deal of complaint about the lack of subsistence. Even the aid extended by the Government was not sufficient to keep the wolf from the door, and the authorities at Fort Thompson, which was under the supervision of Major Hanson, were making every legitimate effort to feed and clothe the savages, in order that they might have no pretext for committing depredations. The Indians in time of plenty are prone to be improvident, and not at all like the proverbial ant who in summer lays by a store for winter. And where an Indian does exercise summer frugality for winter's use, his poor indigent relations will consume it all before the winter is half over. An Indian's hospitality toward his kindred is limited only by his last crust.

Gen. William Tecumseh Sherman was placed in command of the military Department of the Mississippi in the fall of 1865 with headquarters at St. Louis.

Dakota was in this department. In January, 1866, Governor Edwards applied to Sherman for military protection for the settlements, there being a general apprehension that the new Indian policy of the Government had resulted in exposing the settled portions of the territory to imminent danger from Indian depredations. Sherman, in replying to the request of the governor, said:

I assure you that the care of the interests of the emigrants and the people who choose to cast their fortunes amid the Rocky Mountains, shall ever have all the protection which the military can give, but no people know better than you of Dakota, that the volunteer army is now substantially out, and that our regular army is too small to do more than guard key points in that vast region known as the plains.

This was equivalent to saying that there were not troops enough in the regular army to do more than garrison the widely scattered forts, leaving the settlements to their own defense. The Dakota settlements were not, however, entirely without military protection. There was a small force at each of the border posts, to-wit: Fort Randall, Fort James and Fort Dakota, but these troops were not employed in patrol duty, and bands of Indians could reach the settlements without detection. Later in the season the settlers on Brule Creek, represented by W. W. Frisbie, Joseph Collins, Caleb Cummings, Alva Hubbard, Albert Gore, R. L. Shattuck, Harvey F. Fairchild and Henry E. Hyde, sent a petition to the governor asking that a detachment of troops be stationed in that neighborhood as a measure of precaution against lawless Indians. Their fears had been stimulated by a band of Santees, hunting and fishing in that vicinity, and they recalled the tragedy of the killing of LaMoure and the wounding of Watson, in that vicinity the summer before. Secretary Spink, who was acting governor at the time, took the matter up and secured a detachment of troops from Fort Dakota, and had them stationed on the Brule during the farming season. This led to a more rigid enforcement of the regulations prohibiting Indians from leaving their reservations, and special messengers were dispatched to gather in the Indians who had left the reservations for the hunting grounds and fishing pools.

An order from headquarters of the Northwest military division, issued in February, 1866, designated the fort at Sioux Falls as Fort Dakota instead of Fort Brookings; and the fort near the mouth of the Firesteel Creek as Fort James instead of Fort LaRoche. An order issued in March assigned the second and third battalions of the Thirteenth Infantry to General Sully's department of the Upper Missouri, and he was instructed to station the different companies at Forts Union, Berthold, Rice, Sully and Randall; also one company at Fort Dakota and one at Fort James. Three companies were set apart to construct a military post on the north side of the Black Hills on the Belle Fourche or the north fork of the Big Cheyenne. This was the first step toward the establishment of Fort Meade.

There was an annual election held in the Territory of Dakota in 1865 when a full legislative membership was chosen, but for some cause there was much less discussion of the subject than is usually the case. The Johnson-Congress difficulty had not assumed such proportions in the territory as to cause much comment in political circles; but the peace policy which it was proposed to inaugurate for the control and management of the Indians, and dispense with the military, was quite generally discussed and partisans for both the civil and military control were not only numerous but were quite equally divided without regard to their party predilections.

The close of the Civil war had aroused an expectation of numerous immigration of the ex-soldiers who had been given valuable inducements to settle on the public lands being allowed all of the time of their service in the army to apply on that required by homestead settlers before they would be entitled to prove up; and the subject of immigration was considered of the first importance to the welfare of the territory in its then sparsely settled condition, and it was believed that one of the greatest aids in securing a greater population was the proposed peace policy in governing the Indians. On the other hand the Government had been expending hundreds of thousands of dollars annually in the territory to support the army and maintain the forts. A surprising proportion of the active business men of the towns were interested in profitable contracts; merchants shipped largely of supplies to the population of the posts and Indian agencies; and the wagon transportation which employed the owners of teams, and which was in evidence every month in the year but more noticeable when the Missouri River was closed with ice, was a wide-spread industry that distributed money to all the settlements and nearly every farmer's home. Therefore there was a strong sentiment which favored preserving "the goose that laid the golden eggs."

It appeared to be a prevalent though erroneous opinion that military control meant a continuation of Indian hostilities, which would operate to discourage the settlement of families on the open prairies, and thus retard the growth of the territory; while the peace-by-treaty sentiment would quiet all such apprehensions; families would venture out and occupy the fertile valleys, thousands in number; railroads would seek the territory to get the traffic which the thousands of cultivated farms would produce, and thus a permanent and growing prosperity would be established, roads would be opened, churches and schools organized, and Dakota would flourish.

It was recognized that the influx of lucre from the army establishment must of necessity be only temporary—a few years at most—and in the meantime the substantial interests of the people would be neglected and immigration would seek other fields. And inasmuch as the Legislature to be chosen was expected to be a powerful factor in deciding the issue through the influence of memorials to Congress and the President, expressing the sentiments of the people, a candidate's view of the questions involved became a matter of public concern; and for the reason that at this time and for many years thereafter, Dakota Territory was the theater of the republic where the Indian race was the most numerous and the most warlike—the most barbarous—and where the solution of the problem of civilizing the savage was to have its initiative and its final failure or triumph.

There were at this time but six completely organized counties in the territory, each one having one or more unorganized and uninhabited counties attached for "judicial and election purposes," and for its influence upon newcomers, who were expected to scrutinize the map closely and select a home within the protecting aegis of well defined boundary lines. In most of the counties mass conventions were held and legislative tickets nominated harmoniously by selecting one republican and one democrat alternately until the nominations were made. In others, notably Yankton, a convention was called and assembled, but there was such radical disagreement over the Indian control question (Yankton having a large interest in military contracts), that the convention adjourned without making a nomination, and independent tickets were made up two or three days before the election, which occurred October 9th. The membership of the Legislature chosen proved to have suffered little in point of ability and probity, in comparison with former law-making bodies. It was made up of good citizens, who were inclined to be moderate in their partiality, preferring more than anything else to retain the patronage of the troops and secure immigration also by the promise of the ready market afforded and the high prices paid by the military people and the inhabitants of the Indian agencies, for the luxuries and necessities produced by the Dakota farmers.

The political sentiment of the members, measured by the test of Johnson vs. Congress, was discovered to be favorable to the President, who controlled the appointments; and was nearly equally divided between old-time republicans and "Old Hickory" democrats.

A detachment of troops from the Fiftieth Wisconsin Infantry whose term of service had not expired, having been enlisted and mustered in 1864, for three years, reached Yankton on the 8th of September, 1865. They were on their way to Fort Rice, a distance of 700 miles, and had to make the journey by land, as the steamboats that would be sent up were almost certain to be delayed and possibly unable to get through owing to the lateness of the season and low water in the Missouri. About seventy-five of the troops had been so favorably impressed with the country after passing the Big Sioux that they concluded to become citizens and residents of Dakota, and while at Vermillion, where the United States land office was located, filed on seventy-five homesteads in Union County, upon which they intended to locate upon the expiration of their terms as soldiers. They were nearly all farmers' boys. At the land office the officials and clerks worked the entire night filling out the necessary papers, in order to accommodate the soldiers' colony. Under the law they could take their homesteads and were not required to reside upon them until six months after their term of service expired. The years spent in the military service were counted as part of their residence. The boys were lost sight of in later years and how many of them fulfilled their declaration to return and complete their residence is not known to the writer.

A distressingly tragic affair was reported to have occurred during the march of these troops across the Yankton Indian Reservation two or three days later, being the fatal shooting of one of the soldiers by a civilian who was traveling with the troops. As unofficially reported the story was that a private soldier, while in camp, discovered upon a distant bluff a man whom he took to be an Indian and so remarked to the captain, adding: "I'm going to take a shot at him." Suiting his action to the word, he raised his gun and fired—the man fell. Going up to the place with the captain it was discovered that the ball had struck with fatal effect, and there before them was stretched out the dead body of the captain's brother, who had strayed away from the command and mounted the bluff to view the country.

A grand jury of the Third Judicial District afterwards sifted the affair very thoroughly at its session in October following. Horatio H. Larned, the young man who did the shooting, had been arrested and placed under guard at Fort Rice after the company reached that post. The name of the man killed was Theodore Putnam. The prisoner was not a soldier, but a civilian whose father resided at Fort Rice, and he was going up to join him. The grand jury investigation brought out the following facts:

While in camp on the Yankton Reservation, near twilight in the evening, some of the soldiers discovered the form of a man on a bluff three-quarters of a mile from camp, and supposing it to be that of an Indian (as strict orders had been given that no soldier should leave camp) prowling around for the purpose of stealing stock, proposed to fire upon him and scare him away. Larned, who was sitting by the fire reading, jumped up, seized his gun, aimed and fired, and the man fell, though it was not thought in camp that he was hit. No further attention was paid to it that night. The following morning Putnam was missed and a search was made, revealing his lifeless body near the spot where the supposed Indian stood the night before. Under this statement the grand jury refused to find a bill and Larned was discharged.

An all-day battle took place in August, 1865, between Company G, Sixth Iowa Cavalry, Captain Moreland, at Fort Rice, and a large number of mounted hostile Indians, possibly five hundred. It was something of a novelty in the way of a battle, as it occurred on the plain, back of and adjoining the fort, and within full view of civilians inside the fortifications. The Indians had nearly surrounded the post except on the river side, and advanced to attack, forming a semi-circle. The troops were ordered out and the first battle raged for about three hours on the level plain, the Indians occasionally retreating behind a ridge of hills a mile away, from whence they would emerge and charge in force and with persistent courage upon the troops, who always met them with a galling and deadly fire and were supported by two field pieces that seemed to possess more terror for the Indians than all the soldiers. The Indian weapons most dreaded by the soldiers were their bows and arrows. An arrow wound is much more severe than a gunshot wound, and although it may be but a slight one it is apt to leave a legacy of pain and sickness and possibly prove fatal. In this battle the arrow inflicted all the injury, although many of the redskins were armed with guns. One soldier was mortally wounded by an arrow that was buried in his side; the surgeon extracted the arrow but could not save the poor fellow's life; another was killed outright by an arrow penetrating his breast, which reached his lungs, and a gunshot very close to it; another was severely cut in the head, and still another caught a barbed arrow in the fleshy portion of his thigh which hung there until the injured man could be carried into the fort and the missile cut out. Scores of Indians were seen to fall. Their companions would throw the dead and wounded upon the backs of their ponies and run them back behind the ridges. The Indians were superbly mounted and seemed to be a part of the animals they bestrode. Scores of them were flying across the plains at the same time in some instances, shouting, firing as they flew, and sending out volleys of arrows. The troops, however, had orders to remain near the fortifications, as they were certain to be surrounded and cut to pieces if small bodies got off beyond the reach of the company. The Indians were described as magnificent riders and were frequently seen going at full speed standing upright on the back of the animal and sending their arrows out promiscuously among the troops. They seemed to have an inexhaustible supply of ammunition. The first battle lasted three hours, beginning before breakfast in the morning. It was the principal affair of the day, but the Indians continued to harass the fort the entire day, and troops were kept in the field until sundown, the Indians making occasional sallies in small bands.

The combatants on both sides were afterwards highly extolled, the Indians for their superb horsemanship, and the troops for their courage and skill, and the successful direction of the affair. The Indians finally withdrew after hanging about the fort for a week—taking with them a few good cavalry horses that had strayed away from the herd. This brief account of the battle was had from an ex-army officer who was an eye witness and sutler at the fort. He had spent years on the frontier and he pronounced it the nearest approach to a battle between soldiers and Indians he had any knowledge of.

The farming settlements of the territory were thrown into a condition of wild and dangerous excitement by the boldest kind of an Indian raid made by four well armed Indians upon some Brule Creek settlers who were employed in the hay field near Brule Creek and within a half a mile of the Big Sioux River in Union County. The settlers attacked were Thomas C. Watson, E. B. La Moure, and Mr. Fletcher and his wife, who was assisting her husband. The raid occurred in the evening of Thursday, October 10, 1865, about 6 o'clock, just as the hay-makers were getting ready to quit work and return to their homes. The Fletchers were at work about eighty rods from Watson and La Moure. Watson was driving the team hitched to the mower and La Moure was following, when suddenly an Indian sprang out of the grass not twenty feet distant, and poured a rifle ball into La Moure's breast, killing him instantly. He then rushed out at Watson with his bow. Watson was not armed and concealed himself behind his horses. The savage poured a volley of arrows at him, and finding nothing to do but run for it, Watson started for the cabin, the savage following and firing at him with his arrows, one of which struck him in the shoulder, causing a very severe wound. Watson managed to escape, and the savage returned and made off with the team. The Fletchers were attacked by two Indians at the same time who were armed with bows and arrows. Mrs. Fletcher prevailed on her husband to save himself by flight, telling him that the savages wouldn't harm her. Fletcher started to escape, but turned back, and received an arrow in his arm, inflicting a painful wound. Mrs. Fletcher shouted to him to run, knowing that he would be killed if he couldn't get out of the way, and he started the second time and made good his escape. Mrs. Fletcher was on top of a load of hay, and the savages came up and detached the horses from the wagon, not offering to molest the woman. Mrs. Fletcher, however, showed fight, and attacked an Indian with the pitchfork, striking one of them a severe blow, when he grabbed the implement, wrenched it from her hands and struck her a blow with it in retaliation. The other then attacked her with his arrow, shooting once through her dress and skirts, and leaving a mark across her body. He would have killed her, but his companion interfered and told him she was a brave woman and ought to be spared. Mrs. Fletcher understood the Sioux language, and then gave the Indians to understand that if they only wanted the horses to take them and leave, which they did as rapidly as they could, striking across the Sioux into Iowa, thence to the Rock River. They were followed soon after, and their trail was not lost until they reached the Minnesota state line, when it disappeared. One of the Fletcher horses was found with a rifle bullet in his brain about twenty miles from the scene of the massacre. The Indians were never discovered, but they were Sioux and probably a fragment of the Santees who had left the reservation. The E. B. La Moure who was killed was an elder brother of Judson La Moure, who has since been quite prominent in the affairs of the territory and of North Dakota. Judson was living with his brother at the time and was one of the first to reach the scene of the massacre. He also joined the pursuing party of nine settlers, who followed the trail of the Indians a distance of seventy miles. Governor Edmunds received intelligence of this affair a few hours after it occurred by a courier who rode up from the Brule settlement. Governor Edmunds made immediate preparations for visiting the alarmed neighborhood and set out about midnight for Brule Creek, reaching there early the next morning. He immediately communicated with the military authorities at Yankton, Sioux Falls and Sioux City, urging prompt pursuit of the Indians, and requesting that a detachment of troops then at Vermillion be ordered to the Brule Creek settlement as a means of quieting the apprehensions of the settlers and discouraging any feeling of deserting their homes. The killing of La Moure was deeply deplored. He was one of the best citizens of the county and as a matter of course was warmly esteemed, but the injurious effects of the raid were of the most serious kind in stirring up a feeling of alarm throughout the settlements of the territory, and in putting an effectual stop to immigration. The atrocity was the act of four Indians acting on their own diabolical motion, and did not mean that Indian troubles were impending or that the safety of the settlers was threatened except in this stealthy way by small bands who could creep into the settlements unobserved, steal and do murder, and escape. There were no further raids that fall, and that was the last of the bold incursions which the Indians made upon the settlements.

Mr. Watson did not witness the attack on the Fletchers, as they were off about a quarter of a mile and were attacked by another party of Indians, but he had a very clear knowledge of the details of the tragedy in which he came near losing his life. His statement was to this effect:

For two or three days E. B. LaMoure and myself had been cutting and making hay near the Sioux, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles from home. On the afternoon of August the 10th, the sun about an hour or an hour and a half high, I was running my mowing machine with E. B. LaMoure, having a horse team hitched to the same. Mr. LaMoure had been cocking hay and had just finished and dropped in some two or three rods behind me with a pitchfork in each hand, walking leisurely along. The savage lay behind a hay cock, directly in rear of us, or nearly so. At this juncture he shot Mr. LaMoure with a rifle, the ball striking the back bone opposite the heart, seemed to range toward the heart, and did, in all probability, hit that organ. I did not realize that it was the report of a gun at that time, as my machine was making a good deal of a noise which drowned the report, but supposed it to be the breaking of a sickle tooth, which did occur a day or two previous to this, the report being the same to my ear, and in consequence did not look around at once, but probably went nearly a rod before looking around, and when I did, imagine my surprise to see LaMoure lying on the ground quivering in death, and the savage foe rushing on to me with gun, bow and arrow, and war clubs, with all the fury of the devil. I had not so much as a ten penny nail. My only hope was an axe which lay on the wagon some twenty rods distant, so I let go the lines and did not stop the team, but made for the wagon as fast as possible, at the same time watching the savage as well as I could, and dodging his arrows as best I might. I succeeded in dodging his two first shots, the second one going under my hat brim and brushing the hair on the back of my neck. The third he succeeded in putting into my left shoulder; it struck far enough from the back bone to catch the outside of the shoulder blade instead of under it, which was very fortunate for me. It did not go quite through, but had to be cut in front and pushed through as the only way to extract it, coming out above the collar bone. As soon as the savage succeeded in hitting me he turned his attention to the horses, which had gone out to the corner of the square on which I was cutting, and then started toward home, cutting as they went. The savage became alarmed for fear he would not get them, so I escaped with life barely.

I have suffered intense pain, and have barely escaped gangrene or mortification, but am happy to say to my friends that my wound is discharging freely and the inflammation pretty well subdued, and with care I hope to recover and to live long enough to see a few "top nots fall and to see certain orphan children avenged."

The above statement was written out by Mr. Watson on the 21st, ten days after the raid. He does not appear to have seen but one Indian, but in his statement the morning after the attack he mentioned hearing a signal before the shot was fired, and this is believed to have been given to both the attacking parties at the same time by a fourth who remained concealed.

Brule Creek settlement contained some sixteen or eighteen families, who were settled within a couple of miles of the creek, distant about forty-five miles from Yankton and within eighteen miles of Sioux City. It was the most daring raid yet perpetrated, and showed the recklessness and desperation of the outlawed Indians, who seemed to take a peculiar delight in a hairbreadth adventure that would arouse widespread alarm. Out of this affair and some others of like bold and desperate character in Minnesota grew a plan to train a number of bloodhounds to follow the marauders who committed these atrocities, and the Minnesota authorities secured about fifty of these animals from Southern states. It was not learned that they were of any practical benefit.

John Gleason, employed as trader by the Northeast Fur Company, and having a trading post on the Kcha Paha about sixty miles from Fort Randall and forty miles from the Ponca Agency, was killed by the Brule Sioux Indians on the 14th of October, 1865, and his stock of goods carried off by his murderers. There was a detachment of soldiers stationed a mile from the scene of the atrocity and pillage, but a dense grove intervened and the troops knew nothing of the affair until a day or two later, when they visited the place for the purpose of trading. As the outrage occurred so remote from the settlements, it failed to create alarm.

For the first time since the territory was organized "a full bench" of the Supreme Court of the territory was convened at Yankton on the 6th of July, 1865. There were present His Honor Ara Bartlett, chief justice; Jeff. P. Kidder and W. E. Gleason, associates; Laban H. Litchfield, United States marshal; Geo. P. Waldron, acting United States attorney; Moses K. Armstrong, clerk, and John Lawrence, crier. The United States marshal was directed to procure a seal with a device to be prepared by Judge Gleason, also a docket. A number of rules governing the practice in the lower courts were adopted, relative to the formation of juries, time of notice before trial, and prescribing the number of challenges allowed in capital cases. The court reappointed the same dates as those fixed by law for holding the term of court in the various districts, there being a question whether the organic act had not reserved this authority to the court exclusively. In the Third District, in which Fort Randall and Bon Homme were the only settlements, the judge was given discretion to hold court at such times as he might select. The court then addressed itself to the solemn duty of making appropriate Lincoln memorial addresses, after which it adjourned.

The seal as designed by Judge Gleason for the Supreme Court of the territory was two inches in diameter. In the center the Goddess of Justice blindfolded sits enthroned—holding the scales in equipoise in her left hand, her right hand resting upon the hilt of a sword. Encircling the goddess are thirteen stars and the words "E Pluribus Unum—Supreme Court of Dakota."

Ara Bartlett, of Kankakee, Illinois, was appointed associate justice of Dakota about the 1st of July, 1864, to succeed Judge Williston of the First District, who had been promoted to the chief justiceship of Montana. Judge Bartlett presided in the Vermillion district.

Jefferson P. Kidder, of St. Paul, Minnesota, who had been appointed associate justice of the Territory of Dakota to succeed Judge Ara Bartlett, who had been promoted to the chief justiceship, reached Yankton on Sunday, the 10th of June, 1865, coming up the river from St. Louis on the steamboat Graham. Mr. Kidder was a native of Vermont, a portly gentleman, about forty years of age, with an intellectual head and a good-humored face. He enjoyed excellent health, and was delighted with the western country and the western people. He had been in Sioux Falls in 1858 as a member of the Dakota Land Company. His wife and one son Silas were left in the St. Paul home, where they remained until the judge had prepared a dwelling house, which he did very soon after, at Vermillion. The judge's other son, the oldest, was a graduate from West Point, and was stationed at Fort Laramie.

In the First District, Judge Kidder held a term of court at Vermillion in October, 1865, when a number of cases against the former register of the United States Land Office, James M. Allen, in the matter of extorting illegal fees, were tried, but the accused secured an acquittal in every instance. He was defended by the secretary of the territory, Hon. S. L. Spink.

THE FIFTH SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE

1865-66

THE FIFTH SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE—GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE—THE EXEMPTION LAW—PUBLIC LANDS IN MARKET—THE LEGISLATURE SOUNDED—LEGISLATIVE DIVORCES—THE WAGON ROAD INQUIRY—SUPERINTENDENT MOODY REPORTS—MOODY SUPERSEDED—TERRITORIAL BONDS—VARIOUS LEGISLATIVE ENACTMENTS—GEORGE H. HAND—THE TIMBER SUPPLY.

The fifth session of the Legislative Assembly of Dakota Territory convened at the capitol building in Yankton on Monday, December 14, 1865. The House was composed of twenty-four members, as follows:

The Council organized by the election of George Stickney, president; J. H. Hanson, Yankton, secretary; H. B. Vinton, Clay County, assistant secretary; James D. Prentice, Yankton, sergeant-at-arms; Benton Fraley, Bon Homme, messenger; Joseph Brouillette, Union, fireman; Rev. M. Hoyt, chaplain; James M. Allen, enrolling clerk.

The annual message of the governor was delivered the second day of the session.

The message opens with an appropriate expression of the nation's grief over the tragic fate of Abraham Lincoln; pays a sincere tribute to the patriotism and ability of the martyred President; and believed that President Johnson, his successor, would faithfully endeavor to carry out the policies already partially formed by the new administration.

PROGRESS OF THE INDIAN WAR. It has for some time been the opinion of persons somewhat familiar with the controversy, that could the hostile Indians be seen by persons disconnected with the military operations of the Government in this country, thus enabling them to explain their position and state the grounds of their grievances, that peace would be the result of such explanation; by this means relieving our border settlements from the murderous and thieving raids of these savages, and the Government from the enormous expenses incident to the prosecution of a war so remote from the general thoroughfares of the country. Entertaining these views, just at the close of the last session of Congress, the attention of the Committee of Indian Affairs in the Senate was called to the subject, and for the purpose of making an effort in this direction with a view of bringing about a permanent peace with these hostile Indians, Congress saw fit to make an appropriation of $20,000 for the purpose of making the experiment. It was discovered when the effort was about to be made, that owing to a military order in this department on the subject, no such effort would be permitted by the military commander, because, forsooth, it was not in accordance with the views entertained by the commander of the department. So an order was promulgated prohibiting any treaties to be made "except such understanding as was had with them by the military authorities." This was the position of affairs when the new secretary of the interior, Hon. James Harlan, came into office. He took hold of our Indian difficulties with an energy and determination hitherto unknown in that department, and by his energy and perseverance soon made himself master of the position. As the result of his labors on this subject, there is now every prospect that an early, permanent and lasting peace will speedily take place between the Government and these hostile Indians, and the millions heretofore squandered in fostering and prolonging this needless war will either be left in the United States treasury or devoted to the reduction of our large national debt, necessarily created in the prosecution of the war against the people of the revolted states. I am advised that the commission appointed by the President and sent to the Southwest has succeeded far beyond the expectations of the most sanguine in negotiating treaties, not only with rebel, but with very nearly every band of hitherto hostile Indians, and that an early and lasting peace may be expected to follow at once as the result of these negotiations.

The commission sent to the Northwest to treat with the Indians of this and adjoining territories, I fully believe would have been equally as successful could they have got into the Indian country at a time of year when it was possible for the Indians to meet them. So far as they have been able to see the Indians, they have succeeded equally as well as the other commission and it now, in my opinion, only remains for them to meet the other bands of Indians to re-establish friendly relations with all these tribes; indeed, the Indians themselves stated repeatedly in council that it was the universal desire of all to make peace, and live hereafter on friendly terms with their white brethren.

I see no cause to apprehend a renewal of this controversy next season, unless forced upon us by the heedlessness or recklessness of persons residing in or passing through the Indian country; and I sincerely hope that persons in passing through the country will exercise the utmost discretion and circumspection, and give no cause for a renewal of this struggle which now seems so near a satisfactory solution.

IMMIGRATION.—The subject of fostering and promoting immigration into our sparsely settled territory is one of vital importance, and on this account should receive at your hands prompt, earnest and careful consideration, in order that you may, if possible, devise some means by which our broad acres of hitherto unsettled, unimproved, uncultivated, rich, virgin soil, may become settled, improved and cultivated, thereby contributing to render security doubly secure in our border settlements, adorn and enrich our common country, enable us to establish all over our territory churches, schools and seminaries of learning, through which, and by which, our children are to be made good, useful and respected citizens of this great country. So important has this question been deemed in a national point of view, that the last Congress passed a law, approved July 4, 1864, establishing a bureau of immigration in the state department, and appropriated $25,000 to put the machinery in operation, for the protection and encouragement of emigration from the Old World. The effect of this law, under the wise and judicious management of the commissioner of immigration, has been to more than double the number arriving in this country from the Old World.

I know of no other territory or state presenting as great inducements and advantages as are now to be found in this territory, in the immediate vicinity of fine, flourishing towns, on a navigable river, contiguous to good and reliable markets for every species of produce raised in this country, with thousands upon thousands of acres of as fine, rich, productive and arable lands as the sun ever shone upon, not yet in market, but surveyed and subject to settlement and entry under the Homestead Law, so generously provided by a beneficent Government, by which every settler who desires it may secure a farm of 160 acres, every foot of which is equal in productiveness to the best land to be found in the valleys of the Connecticut, Mohawk or Ohio, for the insignificant sum of $12. It appears to me that you have only to lay these matters before the people of the eastern states, or those coming from the Old World, in such a light as to show all these advantages, to secure such an influx of immigration as will in one or two seasons fill the valleys of the Missouri, Big Sioux, Vermillion and James rivers, with an enterprising, intelligent, frugal and industrious population, who will ever after be showering blessings upon your heads for having called their attention in this direction. Many of our western states have for years had in practical operation a system for the encouragement of immigration, which I believe has been attended with satisfactory results. Quite recently, I think within the past year, the State of Missouri has passed a law authorizing the appointment, by the governor, of commissioners for the encouragement of immigration to that state and secretary and acting governor, 1874 to

by the selection of three of its prominent citizens, whose duty it is made to lay before the public the advantages presented for settlement in that state; and I notice by the recent message of the governor that their efforts in this direction have been attended with marked and very decided success.

I would therefore recommend the enactment of a law creating one or more commissioners of immigration in this territory, whose duty it shall be to lay before the commissioner of immigration at Washington, his agent in New York, and such other persons as will cooperate in promulgating the advantages, by the immigrant, from settling in this territory. For the purpose of showing you the interest the Government proposes to take in seconding your efforts in this direction, I transmit herewith the correspondence which has taken place between the honorable commissioner of immigration and myself, to this time, together with copies of the law of Congress, and copies of a circular issued to consular agents in furtherance of this object.

TERRITORIAL EXPENSES.—No adequate provision has yet been made by the legislative assembly for defraying the expenses of the territorial officers, or liquidating present indebtedness. At the last session of the Legislature I took occasion to refer to this subject, and suggested that steps ought to be taken to raise, by taxation, a sufficient sum to meet our present indebtedness and provide for the current fiscal year. I regret to inform you that no such provisions were made at that time, consequently the indebtedness still remains, and the salaries of our territorial auditor and treasurer still remain unpaid. By a recent law of Congress, each state and territory is entitled to receive from the Library of Congress a certain number of copies of the journals and documents of Congress, upon such state or territory defraying the necessary expense attending the delivery of such documents at their respective capitols. Several boxes of such documents were some time since forwarded by the secretary of the interior, by express from Washington, for our territorial library, upon which there are charges to the amount of about one hundred and sixty dollars. These have now been lying in the express office at Sioux City for some months, for the reason that no provision had been made by the legislative assembly for paying the charges on them. It would seem to me that adequate provision ought at once to be made for receiving these books and documents, and means provided for defraying the expense of transportation. For your information I transmit herewith copies of correspondence with the secretary of the interior on this subject. The states and territories have generally adopted the practice of exchanging the laws, journals and Supreme Court decisions with each other, which is a very important matter, as by this means in each state and territorial library are to be found a copy of the laws and Supreme Court decisions of each. Such exchanges are necessarily attended with some expense, which must be provided for by their respective legislatures.

I therefore regard it as the imperative duty of the present Legislature to provide by law a sufficient fund to meet these expenses. This should not only be done, but means should at the same time be provided for defraying our current and contingent expenses. I recommend therefore the prompt levy and collection of at least two thousand dollars for this purpose.

In case the Legislature should see fit to adopt some measure for the encouragement of immigration, involving the expenditure of money or the creation of a debt, it would seem to be your duty to provide a fund for the liquidation of such debt. In such case I would recommend a law authorizing the issue, by your auditor and treasurer, of territorial bonds, drawing interest, having not less than five nor more than ten years to run, with the prompt levy and collection of a sufficient territorial tax to meet the accruing interest. Means may very properly be provided in this way in furtherance of this object without imposing an impressive burthen upon our present settlers. I am clearly of opinion that one or two thousand dollars per annum, judiciously expended in promoting this object, will be amply compensated in the increased flow of immigration into our territory. In connection with this subject, I would suggest for your consideration the propriety of providing a suitable building for an armory and powder magazine in which to store the territorial arms and fixed ammunition. Thus far storage has been furnished by our citizens, free of expense to the territory; and it seems to me that the time has now arrived for the territory to provide the necessary buildings and defray the expense of taking care of property sent here by the general Government for mutual protection, and for the common benefit of all.

GOVERNMENT WAGON ROADS.—Congress, at the close of its last session, provided by law for the opening of three very important wagon roads across the territory, and made liberal appropriations to secure the prompt laying out and opening of these lines. One of the routes, commencing at Niobrara, Nebraska Territory, running thence through the southern portion of this territory to Virginia City, Mont., has, I am informed, been explored throughout its whole length by the energetic efforts of the superintendent selected by the secretary of the interior to look out and establish the route. Having very recently returned to his home in Sioux City, in the absence of information on the subject I am not able to inform you of the results of his explorations.

The general character of the country from Sioux City to the mouth of the Big Cheyenne, over which the second road is now being surveyed, which may properly be called the middle route, is such as to require but little outlay to make a good road, with the exception of building three very important streams, the Big Sioux, Vermillion and Dakota rivers. I am informed by the superintendent of this road that owing to the scarcity of suitable timber for bridge building along this line, the improvement contemplated by Congress in making the appropriation is going to be much more expensive than was at first supposed. As this road runs for a distance of 150 miles through our best and most important settlements, it may very justly be considered at the present time the most important of the three routes to our citizens. It is therefore hoped that Congress will early take such action as to insure the speedy opening of this entire line of road.

The third road or route commences on the Minnesota state line, and terminates at or near Fort Conner, on Powder River, where it is expected this line will intersect the road from Niobrarah, Neb., to Virginia City in Montana Territory. A preliminary examination of this route, I am informed, has been made, by the superintendent, from the state line of Minnesota to the forks of the Big Cheyenne River, and the general character of the country is such as to require but small outlay in the way of improvement to make a good road the whole distance. Too much importance cannot well be attached to the early opening of these lines of thoroughfare, and it is hoped that should it be found necessary, in order to secure their speedy opening, that Congress will make further appropriations upon any one of them, I trust you will cordially lend your aid in this direction. They may, in my opinion, justly be considered as the forerunners of a railroad on each line, if by their speedy opening the travel to the gold fields of Montana and Idaho is thrown over these routes. I confidently anticipate that the day is not far distant when a daily line of post coaches, leaving one of the numerous towns in this vicinity, will be unable to carry the passengers desiring to take some one of these routes to the gold fields of the Northern Rocky Mountains, by reason of the great distance saved by taking these lines over that now traveled by Omaha, Fort Laramie and Salt Lake City, thence to Montana and Idaho. It is well settled that the distance saved on either of these lines will not be less than six hundred miles, or six days' constant travel by stage.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.—The location of the northern branch of the Pacific Railroad is doubtless a question of far greater importance than any to which I can at this time call your attention, and when presenting, as we do, for the consideration of the President of the United States, by far the shortest and most practicable route up the valley of the Missouri and Niobrarah rivers to intersect the trunk line in the vicinity of Fort Laramie, thus forming almost an air line from the passes of the Rocky Mountains to Chicago, the great railroad center of the Northwest; our claims, it appears to me, are paramount to all others, which have been heretofore contemplated or even spoken of for this line of road. I call your attention to this subject at the present time for the reason that it is reported that a company has already been designated to construct the line under consideration, and that it is contemplated by this company to construct the road from Sioux City down the valley of the Missouri River, in a southeasterly direction, for a distance of one hundred miles or more, to intersect the branch of the Pacific Railroad running west from Omaha. How long will it take, I beg leave to inquire, to reach California by traveling in this direction? Is it probable that Congress in making such liberal appropriations to encourage the early construction of this line of road, contemplated or expected the funds of the Government would be used for constructing a railroad running southeast from Sioux City in order to form a railroad connection with the Pacific Coast? I think not. I have no doubt that Congress, when legislating upon the subject, expected the persons or companies selected to construct the several branches, would at least try to shorten the distance and time to California by constructing the roads in that direction. Believing this to be the case, I recommend that you early call the attention of the President to this subject, and memorialize him to reconsider the action of his predecessor, President Lincoln, in designating the company to construct this branch of the Pacific Railroad and in case this cannot be done, that you lay the matter before Congress and solicit from that body such legislation as will require the company designated to construct this branch in starting from Sioux City, towards California, by the most direct and practicable route. The memorial passed by the last legislative assembly on this subject, approved January 12, 1865, clearly sets forth not only many of the advantages gained in selecting the Niobrarah route, but also some of the disadvantages in adopting the route southeast from Sioux City. I respectfully submit this subject for your consideration, hoping that you will, by prompt and judicious action, secure to our constituents the advantage to be derived from having this road constructed through the southern portion of this territory, fully believing this to be in accordance with the views of a large majority of Congress in making the appropriation to encourage the construction.

PRIVATE LAWS.—I beg leave to submit whether it would not be better to pass some general laws on the subjects most frequently presented for your consideration by individual citizens, such as ferry charters, town sites, etc. On reference to our existing laws I find that we have already upon our statute books sixty-one chapters of private laws. A large majority of these are, I think, ferry charters, many of them entirely useless and utterly worthless. In all cases where the franchises granted have not been improved, I recommend the repeal of the law, and in lieu of special privileges to individuals in future, the enactment of a general ferry law, under which any person desiring to run a ferry may do so upon complying with the provisions of the statute made for the protection of the public in all such cases. It occurs to me that this may also be done very properly in the case of town sites, bridges, etc. The enactment of such general laws, early in the session, will preclude the introduction of a large number of private bills on these subjects.

CONCLUSION.—I have endeavored briefly to call your attention to matters deemed important, and such, it has seemed to me, as first ought to occupy your attention. While many subjects of importance have doubtless been overlooked in this communication, still, as it will be my privilege and duty to make suggestions from time to time to your honorable bodies, such omissions may hereafter be supplied. And now, in conclusion, allow me to express the hope that the different branches of our territorial government will work together in harmony, with an unselfish desire to promote the general interests of all sections of our territory, by which means we shall not only best satisfy our own feelings in the consciousness of duty well performed, but advance the cause of religion, liberty and free government—in thus contributing our mite towards ameliorating the condition of mankind.

NEWTON EDMUNDS.

The subjects treated by the governor's message were of the first importance to the territory. The Progress of the Indian War states the attitude of the peace-by-treaty people, of which the governor was a recognized leader. Immigration is well discussed, but the members of the Legislature could not be induced to authorize the issue of territorial bonds for any purpose. Territorial expenses throw light upon a subject that the members of the Territorial Legislature regarded as a little less distasteful than the subject of bonds. Any measure that called for taxation was considered as one that would impose a burden upon the people, who were already overburdened with the demands of their homes and families. The Pacific Railroad, the northern branch, touches a matter which in its day interested a number of leading men not residents of the territory, who stood ready to construct the northern branch on lines indicated in the message if accorded the aid which Congress had already voted in the Union Pacific charter. It should have been the route selected. John I. Blair, the railroad king at that time, when the country was convulsed with the Civil war and the President had no time or inclination to investigate the routes, was able to secure the appointment to build the northern branch. He was then just completing the Northwestern to Council Bluffs and Omaha, and conceived the plan of the Sioux City and Pacific from Missouri Valley to Sioux City, and from Missouri Valley to Fremont, Nebraska, which he was able to convince the President would be a suitable route for the northern branch of the Union Pacific. The message shows the absurdity of the route, but it was successful nevertheless.

This session of the Legislative Assembly was made up of republicans and democrats, who, as a rule, had been elected on the same ticket. The Civil war and the attitude of President Johnson on the matter of reconstructing the rebellious states, had unsettled political parties, and although the war had been over for half a year, all men had not concluded just where they were to line up in the future. The national union party of Dakota had elected the Legislature and the nominations had been made with the view of getting about an equal number of republicans and democrats on the tickets, and electing them. This had been done. The Legislature was, therefore, very equally divided between the two old parties, and there was no reason, except former party affiliations and prejudices, that would prevent the members from working together harmoniously: still there was more or less of the old rivalry.

A law was enacted for the admission of attorneys to the bar of Dakota Territory.

The Legislatures of the earlier years in Dakota were vigilant in protecting the welfare and interest of their constituents, by giving them liberal exemptions. At the first session in 1862 a number of laws were enacted on this subject, and under the provisions of one of these enactments all real and personal property belonging to any citizen was exempt from all legal process for all debts owing to parties outside the territory or contracted prior to the removal of the debtor to Dakota. At the present session of the Legislature a bill was introduced by Mr. Michael Ryan, of Union County, to amend the exemption laws, which had been criticized by some of the attorneys within the territory, and by parties outside who had claims against the citizens of the territory. This bill reduced the amount of exemption materially, but it passed the House, though stoutly opposed by the minority, but was ably supported by a lobby made up of home attorneys and an active and resolute outside interest. When the bill reached the Council it met with a cold reception. It was referred to the Committee on Judiciary, of which Mr. Stutsman was chairman, who reported the bill on the twenty-fifth day, December 28th, recommending its rejection for reasons thus stated:

The object of said bill was to reduce the amount of property exempt by law from execution, which in the judgment of the committee would under existing circumstances operate most injuriously to the people of the territory. The moment you break down a liberal and well guarded exemption you open the door to the credit system, which encourages extravagance and finally results in a financial crash, and the inextricable ruin of many families, that under the existing laws would be prosperous and happy. The committee has, therefore, instructed me to report the bill back with the recommendation that it be rejected.

This report was not adopted, but the bill was recommitted to the judiciary committee, which reported a substitute bill, changing some of the provisions of the existing law, but not lessening the total amount exempt; recommending its passage. The bill received an unanimous affirmative vote on its final passage.

Up to about the time of the organization of Dakota, 1861, it had been the policy of the Federal Government to dispose of the public lands at private sale, after they had been offered as preemptions for a reasonable time. During the administration of President Buchanan, which was the administration preceding the Civil war, large bodies of land in both Nebraska and Iowa were offered at private sale. Under these sales one person could purchase a township of land if he so desired. The consequence was that a great quantity of the land in those states found its way into the hands of capitalists and speculators; and there had grown up in the minds of the border settlers a sentiment that the policy was detrimental to the settlement, growth and improvement of the western country.

This policy, it was discovered, led to the accumulation of large tracts of the best lands in the hands of speculators, who had purchased with no intention of improvement. In some sections of the new West, notably in Iowa, nearly the entire landed area of its uninhabited northwestern counties was owned by private parties as late as 1865, and as the ordinary emigrant was not prepared or not satisfied to purchase, he went beyond these private tracts to select a home. As a result, there were large uncultivated wastes between the settlements to the great detriment of the country in the development of its highways, and its religious and educational work.

There were comparatively few quarter sections in these Northwest Iowa counties that the "land grabber" had not appropriated, and a small company of enterprising young men at Sioux City hit upon a plan for improving these unsettled counties at the expense of the large land owners, and make it to their pecuniary interest to offer their land for sale at a reasonable price. These young men emigrated to the unsettled regions and took up preemptions on the vacant quarters, and then under the law effected a county organization. Elections were called and county officers duly elected and installed and the machinery of county government set in motion. The county board of commissioners would order an assessment of the real and personal property of the county, which at a very moderate rate of taxation would yield a handsome revenue to be used in public improvements and the payment of the salaries of county officers. They would also proceed to open roads, build bridges, and in some instances erect a county courthouse. School districts were also organized, schoolhouses erected, and school taxes levied. The assessor was put to work, and the land held by private parties being subject to taxation, was duly assessed and notice given as is customary in such cases. Those who did not come forward and pay their tax found their lands advertised at tax sale at the proper time, and desiring to avoid the trouble involved in a clouded title, after freely criticising the extravagance of the county government, usually paid the tax. And as they were all non-residents, who complained by letter, their unfriendly criticisms were not seriously considered. The counties that resorted to this heroic mode of development and improvement issued county warrants in payment of county indebtedness, making reasonable allowance for the discount on such paper, and where all steps of organization had been properly and lawfully taken, and the proceedings regular, the holders of the warrants found a ready market for them at the banks or with investors in the neighboring towns, and could always exchange them for any kind of merchandise required in their pioneer homes, while the remittances from the non-resident land owners were sufficient to keep the floating debt within reasonable bounds.

This condition was well known to the early settlers of Dakota, some of whom had been engaged in this county organization business. They had only to look across the streams that separated them from the states to perceive the injurious effects of private land ownership of thousands of contiguous acres; and among the common people, who are always in the great majority and have no money to invest in lands, the sentiment in opposition to throwing any of the public lands upon the market was very strong, and no man or party who aspired to leadership in politics was reckless enough to venture an affirmative voice when this subject was under discussion.

With the advent of Mr. Lincoln as President, and the changes in the policy of the Government which followed, the private sale of the public lands was discontinued, but the homestead law was passed in 1862, which, together with the preemption law, afforded the homeseeker all that could be reasonably asked, and at the same time apparently insured the settlement of the public land districts in a compact manner, insuring with this close settlement the most rapid improvement of the country in roads and bridges, the establishment of churches and schools, and affording settlers the advantage and enjoyment of neighbors and the social benefits derived therefrom. In the face of the manifest disadvantages of the old system, and the undisputed benefits accruing to the actual settlers from the new policy, a strong sentiment had grown up in favor of a return, in part, to the private sale system, which was supported, chiefly, by the argument that it would speedily increase the amount of taxable property. Considerable difficulty had been met with in Dakota in the efforts of the lawmakers to devise a revenue system that would yield a sum sufficient to meet the expenses of county and territorial government. The territory had reached that period in its career when it had insane persons to be cared for, criminals to be imprisoned, other unfortunates to be supported at public expense, in addition to sundry expenses, such as salaries, rents, etc., for the officers who performed public duties, and under the comparatively slow process of the homestead and preemption law the amount of taxable lands subject to taxation made slight annual increase. Under these conditions some of the lawmakers of 1865-66 concluded that it would be advantageous to return to the old system of selling the public lands in open market, to promote which a joint convention of the Legislative Assembly was held on the 19th of December, 1865, at which the following resolution was presented:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this joint convention that sound policy would suggest the propriety of the passage of a memorial by this legislative assembly to the President of the United States, praying him to order into market certain townships and parts of townships of the public domain in this territory, as may be designated by this Legislature

A motion was made to adopt the resolution, and a division of the convention being called for on the motion to adopt, there were fifteen voting in the negative and fourteen in the affirmative, so the motion was lost.

This result had not been anticipated by the leaders of the movement, and to divert attention from the attempted but fortunately defeated proposition, which it was presumed would meet with little favor from the settlers, an adroit movement was resorted to that would serve to prove that the joint convention was assembled for a very necessary and commendable purpose; which was embodied in a resolution immediately presented by a prominent member of the Council, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that the revenue bill which is proposed to be introduced during the present session of the legislative assembly should contain a provision requiring every male person above the age of twenty-one to pay a poll tax yearly of one dollar for the benefit of common schools.

The motion was adopted, and the joint convention then dissolved.

There is no record kept of the members who voted on these questions. The purpose of the joint convention was to secure a majority vote on the private land sale resolution, and the absence of three or four members who were expected to support the measure fortunately prevented its adoption; not that there was the slightest prospect for the change to be adopted by the general Government, but fortunately for the political reputations of the gentlemen who promoted the measure, and fortunate for Dakota, because it would have added the term "land grabbers" to the other opprobrious epithets the outside world used quite liberally when speaking of this "drought-stricken and grasshopper ridden country."

This Legislature also passed two divorce bills, one from Bon Homme County entitled Georgiana H. Young vs. Lewis Young, regarding which the Committee on Judiciary say in their report, that after examining the written testimony they are forced to the conclusion that the conduct of Lewis Young has been of such a character as to render it impossible for his wife and child to live with him. The affidavits of Francis Rounds, George T. Rounds and the plaintiff are cited in support of the claim and the committee recommends the passage of the bill, which action was taken; but Governor Edmunds vetoed the measure, and the Legislature refused to pass it over his veto. The second case was that of Rachel J. Rowley vs. Charles S. Rowley, introduced by Councilman George Stickney, of Union County. In this case the judiciary committee cite the affidavits of Rachel J. Rowley, James W. Phillips, Phinneas Phillips and P. Darwin Phillips in support of the application, and made the statement that if Charles S. Rowley, the husband, is not already, he ought long since to have been an inmate of a state's prison, on the charge of counterfeiting; that he had abandoned his family for a period of over six years. The committee recommended the passage of the bill, and it was duly passed; but met with objections from the governor, who declined to approve it. In his veto message, the governor said:

Contracts of this character by enlightened communities are justly considered, in my opinion, of the most sacred and binding character. The higher the civilization the more sacred are such contracts held. This being the case, such contracts should not lightly be interfered with, and especially should this view of the case be taken where there are reasonable grounds to doubt the authority over the question, of the power proposing to annul such contracts. I have carefully considered this question in connection with this subject, and have been led to the conclusion that inasmuch as the legislative assembly of this territory has heretofore enacted a law (chapter 18, laws 1853-4) providing a mode by which divorces may be granted by the courts of the territory (by any act of Congress delegating powers to the legislative assembly thereof) and there being no question as to the power of the Legislature to provide by law a mode by which parties deserving it may obtain relief from such contracts through the properly conducted courts of this territory, I feel it my imperative duty to return this bill without my approval.

I am, sir, very respectfully your obedient servant,

NEWTON EDMUNDS, Governor.

A joint resolution was passed by the Council requesting G. C. Moody, superintendent of the Government Wagon Road from the Big Sioux River to Fort Randall, to furnish the Legislature with an itemized account of his disbursements on account of the construction of the Big Sioux bridge, and on the same day the resolution was transmitted to the House and concurred in, and a committee appointed to present the resolution to Mr. Moody, composed of Kellogg and McCarthy. Mr. Kellogg reported on the 23d day that he had presented Mr. Moody with the resolution, and that gentleman stated that he would furnish the Legislature any information calculated to assist them in the performance of their arduous duties which was in his power, and as soon as he could do so conveniently. The committee was then discharged. A similar report was made to the Council by Mr. La Breche, who reported a written communication to the same effect as Kellogg's report to the House. Mr. Moody evidently considered the action of the Legislature unwarranted, as he was employed by the Federal Government and reported to the Interior Department, and while he did not refuse to communicate the information desired, he was so tardy about it as to arouse considerable feeling among some of the Legislative members who were jealous of the dignity of their body and charged that Mr. Moody had not properly respected it.

Mr. Brookings introduced in the House a bill for an amendment to the territorial election law, striking the word "white" therefrom, which gave occasion for much debate before the Committee on Elections, to whom it was referred. Equal suffrage and negro suffrage were new issues and many men did not seem prepared to give a decisive vote or commit themselves on the issue. The House considered the bill in committee of the whole, but reported that the committee had reached no conclusion, and the bill was laid on the table. No vote had been taken by calling the roll, and therefore it could not be determined whether the sentiment was favorable to the proposition.

An effort was made early in the session to put through a bill authorizing the issue of territorial bonds bearing 10 per cent interest to be expended in the interest of immigration. It might have passed but for the belief that no authority existed under the organic act for such a measure, and its passage would prove detrimental to the territory as indicating a reckless disregard of the fundamental law on the part of the law-making body.

A memorial to the Secretary of War asking that a military post be located on the northern base of the Black Hills was passed. This post was finally constructed and became Fort Meade.

An act for the establishing of a fence law and the appointment of fence viewers was among the important legislation of this session. The law was afterwards repealed and a herd law substituted. It was the conviction of the farmers that it would be cheaper and better to dispense with fences and compel cattle owners to herd their live stock, instead of requiring the corn and wheat grower to guard his cultivated fields with a costly fence. Fencing material was not abundant and was so expensive as to be practically prohibitive.

A memorial to Congress for an appropriation to meet the expense of a geological survey of the Black Hills and Bad Lands was passed.

A new and much improved general election law was enacted.

An act to establish a public school law, to take the place of one then in force, was passed; also an act relating to territorial and county revenue; an act to prevent the firing of woods and prairies; an act for the admission of attorneys to the bar; an act prohibiting the furnishing of liquor to Indians; also an act authorizing a special election in Yankton County to vote a jail tax; an act authorizing the sheriff of Clay County to levy and collect taxes for the purpose of purchasing blank books in which to keep the county records; an act providing a bounty for wolf scalps, and an act prohibiting the harboring of Indians. A new civil and criminal code, called the "New York Codes" was enacted, and altogether this Legislature accomplished much that was commendable and improved the body of territorial laws in a marked degree.

Concerning these New York Codes, as they were called, it was stated on excellent authority that David Dudley Field, one of the eminent lawyers of the United States in that day, was the principal author of the codes. They were prepared under the authority of the Legislature of the State of New York, by a commission of which Mr. Field was chairman, and some seven years was given to that and other work of the commission. The codes were completed in February, 1865, but had not been passed upon by the Legislature of the Empire State, when a printed copy of the report of the commission containing the civil and penal codes, and also the maritime code, came into the possession of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Dakota, then composed of Ara Bartlett, chief justice; Jefferson P. Kidder and William E. Gleason, associate justices; all good lawyers, and all favorably impressed by the codes prepared by Mr. Field. The codes adopted by the Dakota Legislature in March at the first session, in 1862, had not proved satisfactory in every respect, and the bench and bar of the territory united upon recommending that they be repealed and the Field Codes substituted in their stead. This was done at this session, the Legislature of Dakota being the first legislative body to enact and put in operation these excellent laws. California adopted the same codes in 1872, six years later, and owing to the prominence of that state, the codes became popularly known as the California Codes. This error, however, was later corrected, and Dakota gave the tribute of authorship where it of right belonged.

A law was enacted establishing a bureau of immigration and authorizing the governor to appoint a board of immigration, who should select an immigrant agent.

A committee of one from each county represented in the Legislature was appointed to make a report on the mineral and agricultural resources of the territory.

A bill for an act to restrain swine from running at large engaged the earnest attention of the House for nearly one-half the session. It was an important measure of itself, and was opposed by those farmers who passed a herd law—the preponderating sentiment being in favor of compelling the live stock interest to herd all domestic animals and make it responsible for any damage done to growing crops by the depredations of live stock.

An act establishing the jurisdiction and defining the duties of justices of the peace was passed.

A memorial praying Congress to amend the Union Pacific Railroad bill, so as to require the building of the northern branch thereof from Sioux City on the north bank of the Missouri River to Niobrara, thence west along the valley of the Niobrara River to the 100th meridian, thence pursuing a general westerly direction to the mountains, crossing the divide through the South Pass, was passed.

A memorial to Congress asking for an appropriation for the construction of a capitol building, introduced by Representative A. M. English, was passed.

Mr. McCarthy gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill to create and empower the sheriff of Todd County to act as sheriff for the Third Judicial District of Dakota Territory.

It was a working body, and although the rupture in the national republican party had grown quite serious between President Johnson and Congress, and the adherents of each were strongly represented at this session, there was very little partisanship displayed. The resolution with reference to the seat held by W. W. Brookings, and the call for information regarding the Big Sioux and Fort Randall Wagon Road, of which Colonel Moody was superintendent, were not looked upon as instigated by partisan feeling. In the first case the inquiry, under the circumstances, of the eligibility of Mr. Brookings to a seat in the House while he held an appointment from the Interior Department as superintendent of the Big Cheyenne Wagon Road, was legitimate, and its decision by the court would have settled the important question of what constituted such a federal position in the meaning of the organic act as would disqualify a person from holding a seat in the House. That question was not determined.

In the case of Colonel Moody, there is little doubt that personal feeling and ill-founded public rumor had considerable to do with the proceedings in his affair.

The Congress-Johnson schism rendered the year memorable as one in which the political campaign continued unceasingly. Not only the male population but the fair dames were interested, and everyone seemed to have chosen a side, and was prepared to defend their choice. Personally, President Johnson was a popular man; highly esteemed by the northern people for his many private and public virtues, and more than all for his chivalrous, able and courageous course during the rebellion, when he so valiantly and successfully contested against the secession of Tennessee, frequently endangering his personal safety and at times his life. It was his past career and record that appealed more forcibly to the northern people than his position in the contest with Congress. And it was because of this heroic record that his friends found abundant material to enlist their own and others' sympathies in behalf of his political fortunes.

HON. GEORGE H. HAND

George H. Hand, of Portage City, Wisconsin, reached Yankton in November, 1865, having in view a location where he could establish a permanent home for himself and family, build up a law practice, and grow up with the country. He had been a Union soldier during the Civil war, which had then but recently ended, and a member of the Chicago Board of Trade Battery. He had been a faithful and efficient soldier and had earned and received moderate promotion. Mr. Hand was about twenty-eight years of age at this time, active, enthusiastic, and a most entertaining young man socially—an excellent companion. He brought with him letters from Wisconsin gentlemen that gave him ready entrance to the confidence of the Yankton people and he was not long in winning their esteem. It was then too late in the season for his wife and young children to make the journey to Dakota—something over two hundred and fifty miles of which would be through a country sparsely settled, while the so-called stage lines were not models of comfort, and winter was coming on apace. But he found Yankton suited to his favor, and this new land so promising of a glorious future that he concluded to cast in his lot with the others who had preceded him to the outpost of civilization on the northwestern border. Had he been inclined to remove his family at that time, he would have been unable to have found a suitable shelter for them in the embryo town. Every habitable structure was occupied, and two-thirds of the population were uncomfortably crowded during the fall and winter. There were not so many actual residents, but the sojourning class were numerous, and the most profitable tenants, for they were prepared to, and willing, to pay exorbitantly, if necessary, for accommodations. Expeditions were then fitting out at Yankton for the Black Hills, for Idaho, and the Montana gold fields, and Yankton was "booming."

Mr. Hand remained at Yankton, and announced to the people that he was prepared to give attention to their law suits.

At the opening of the Legislature, in December, he was appointed by Governor Edmunds his private secretary, and managed to keep himself quite busy during the winter. The following spring he formed a partnership with Hon. S. L. Spink, the secretary of the territory, and also a lawyer, and the firm of "Spink & Hand, Attorneys at Law" was one of the earliest professional firms in the territory. But Dakota had not reached that stage where the lawyer finds a profitable field for his professional labors. Clients, like good spirits we find mentioned, were few and far between. It is related of a physician who settled in Yankton about this time that he wrote back to his friends in Canada, after being in Dakota a few weeks, that he "had had but one case and that was in digging postholes." Mr. Hand kept busy, or kept up the appearance of being busy.

The following spring (1866) he removed his family to Yankton, making a trip to Portage for that purpose, and set up housekeeping in a comfortable hewn log residence that stood on Walnut Street, west side, between the river and Second Street, and here he resided a number of years, until he purchased the place in the northeast quarter of the town, where his numerous family of children were born, grew to manhood and womanhood, and where his esteemed widow still retains a residence.

In 1866 Mr. Hand was appointed United States attorney for Dakota, a much more important office at that time than the salary would indicate. This office had been held by Hon. W. E. Gleason, who had been promoted to associate justice of the Third District (Bon Homme, Charles Mix and Gregory counties and a number more unorganized), and the position of attorney had not been filled by a federal appointment until the selection was made of Mr. Hand, who became Dakota's second United States attorney, and discharged its duties ably and faithfully. A number of important cases originating in the Indian country gave him an abundance of employment at times, and also gave him a very thorough knowledge of the Indian intercourse laws.

THE TIMBER SUPPLY

There existed grave apprehension in the minds of the early settlers regarding Dakota's limited supply of timber. It was generally believed that the comparatively small forests that fringed the Missouri and the lower Big Sioux, Vermillion and James would disappear within a few years, and the loss of it and the lack of it would prove a great detriment to the settlement and development of the country. No doubt this apprehension did retard the progress of settlement to some extent. The early settlers on the highlands comparatively remote from the timbered streams were put to great inconvenience and doubtless considerable suffering, owing to the difficulty of procuring fuel. Resort was had to burning the prairie hay, which was twisted similar to a rope as compact as possible, and while it burned rapidly and required to be fed into the stove at very frequent intervals, it created warmth and fire, and enabled hundreds of the pioneer farmers to keep their families comfortable during many winters prior to the advent of railways and coal. To such an extent was hay used for fuel that stoves were made with special adaptation to its use. Experience, and the passing of years, has shown, however, that the territory was never destitute of timber in the sections where it was at first abundant. In fact, the people were never able to consume the original supply, although thousands of log cabins were built from it; it was drawn upon for much of the fuel used by the settlers during the first fifteen years of the territory's settlement; a dozen sawmills have been at work in it and an immense amount of lumber has been furnished from it, and yet in the face of this consumption, the quantity and the wooded area has increased much more rapidly than it has been consumed and there are probably a hundredfold more growing trees in the older counties now than when the first settler came in; and the same is true throughout the Dakotas, averages considered. There are many large groves of timber covering many acres in the southern counties of Dakota that were set out thirty and even thirty-five years ago.

These groves have been thinned out from time to time, furnishing a vast amount of fuel. In some instances the owners are cutting out trees that make excellent sawlogs and these with the aid of a portable sawmill are converted into building lumber and used in improving the farm. The timber grows much more rapidly than it is consumed, and farmers are compelled to thin it out every few years as an aid to the growth and symmetrical development of the younger trees. It is the uniform testimony of these farmers who have taken out large quantities of cordwood and sawlogs from their old groves that so far as the appearance shows, the grove does not suffer in the least; while on the other hand the remaining timber is vastly improved.

POLITICS—BLIZZARDS—INDIANS HOSTILE

A POLITICAL YEAR—PRESIDENT JOHNSON AND CONGRESS IN EMBROILMENT—NEW NATIONAL POLITICAL PARTY—DEMOCRATS CAPTURE REPUBLICAN ORGANIZATION IN DAKOTA—THE DELEGATE CAMPAIGN—DOCTOR BURLEIGH NOMINATED BY THE JOHNSON CONVENTION—NEW REPUBLICAN PARTY ORGANIZED—BROOKINGS NOMINATED FOR DELEGATE—BURLEIGH ELECTED—MASSACRE AT FORT PHIL KEARNEY—INDIAN ACCOUNT OF THE TRAGEDY—BLIZZARDS IN 1866—COLONEL MOODY AND SECRETARY SPINK HAVE AN EXPERIENCE—LYNCHING OF HOGAN AT VERMILLION—THE MISSOURI BOTTOMS SUBMERGED FOR SIX WEEKS BY THE SPRING FLOOD—IMMIGRATION; THE MINNESOTA COLONY—DAKOTA BAR ORGANIZED—ANDREW J. FAULK APPOINTED GOVERNOR—A THANKSGIVING PROCLAMATION.

Though not particularly germane to the history of Dakota, but as bearing upon political matters in the territory, it is deemed best to make mention of one of the most extraordinary political conventions ever held in the United States. It assembled at Philadelphia on the 10th of August, 1866. It was termed by its opponents, in derision, a national "love feast." It was a convention of prominent Union men, both democrats and republicans, civilians and military heroes, and many ex-Confederates, mostly military, who had foresworn secession for all time, and returned to their allegiance to the old flag of their fathers. It was a national convention in a geographical sense, and was convened by the adherents of President Johnson's reconstruction policy, for the purpose of arousing a sentiment favorable to that policy among the people of the North, and to bring together in harmony and good fellowship the former secession leaders of the South and the Union leaders of the North, with the view of forming a national political organization in opposition to the Congressional plan of reconstruction, which was termed the radical republican policy. Leading republicans of the North were in the movement. Gen. John A. Dix, author of the famous expression, "If any man attempts to haul down the American flag, shoot him on the spot," was president of the convention. Hon. Henry J. Raymond, editor of the New York Times, and one of the staunchest supporters of the war for the Union, was a conspicuous leader, and other equally celebrated Unionists were in the front ranks of the movement. The proceedings were conducted largely according to a prearranged program, and were very spectacular and interesting. A famous Union general and a famous Confederate general walked arm in arm down the long convention hall, signifying that the North and South were once more linked together in the bonds of amity and friendship. Other features were no less novel and significant, all emphasizing the restoration of the Union, and exoneration for all political offenses. This convention was the formal beginning of a serious breach in the political parties then existing and resulted in complete ruin of the political prospects and ambition of many prominent northern men, for although in its inception it seemed that it would sweep the country, the disposition of the people was mistrustful of it, and when they had an opportunity to be heard at the Presidential election in 1868, they defeated it by an overwhelming vote. At this convention Dakota was represented by Gov. A. J. Faulk, John W. Turner, D. T. Bramble, M. K. Armstrong and T. W. Miner. A national executive committee was appointed and a new political organization was launched, which became the rallying organization of the democratic party for 1868.

In the beginning of the difficulty between the republicans in Congress and the President, their differences were largely and intensely personal—a mutual personal dislike that forbid such an intercourse as might have resulted in some amicable arrangement of their differences, for before there was any clash or disagreement about reconstruction the personal estrangement had forbid any harmonious intercourse between Johnson and the Congressional leaders. The President was dictatorial, imperious, headstrong, and to differ with him seemed to incur his personal dislike, and he did not hesitate, in his public addresses, to name and denounce some of the leaders of the Congressional policy, preeminent among whom was Hon. Charles Sumner, senator from Massachusetts, and Hon. John W. Forney, a prominent journalist, whom the President stigmatized as a “dead duck.” While the President held the veto power, and could disapprove of the laws passed by Congress, the Congressional party had a two-thirds majority in each house and could override the veto, and did so frequently during Johnson’s term.

The political situation in Dakota was very much obscured by these developments in national affairs. There was no republican or democratic party under those titles. The republicans, following the name chosen by the national party in 1864, called themselves the national union party, and the democrats styled their party the union party. Hon. W. A. Burleigh had been elected delegate to Congress by the national union party in 1864. During the interval between Lincoln’s assassination in 1865 and the summer of 1866 the breach in the republican party had occurred, and new issues entirely were presented. Reconstruction had superseded all former questions. The President and his supporters now favored a liberal and lenient policy toward the ex-Confederates, and desired to restore the seceding states to the Union at the earliest day practicable, and also favored allowing many of those recently in arms against the Government to have a voice and vote in this work of rehabilitation. On the other hand, Congress was determined to “make treason odious” (which phrase had been the shibboleth of President Johnson in the early days of his administration), by excluding all who had borne arms against the Government from any participation in the first steps of reconstruction. Johnson desired only to rehabilitate; Congress was determined to reconstruct. As the former slaves of the South had been enfranchised, the policy of Congress placed the voting strength in the states to be restored largely with the black people, the great majority of whom could neither read nor write. There were comparatively few southern whites who had not borne arms against the Government, and could qualify as voters under the reconstruction acts, and also a number of northern men whom the fortunes of war had left in the South or who had gone there after hostilities ceased to engage in various industrial pursuits, and there were others who seem to have gone there to take advantage of the political situation and secure office under the new state governments. This last mentioned class the southerners called “carpet baggers.”

The democratic party sustained President Johnson and a large number of republicans supported his policy, and united with the democrats on the national issue. It was claimed with substantial reason that the influence of Hon. William H. Seward, who had been Lincoln’s secretary of state and held the same place under Johnson, and who has been called the father of the republican party, caused thousands of republicans to sustain the President; reasoning that Seward must have known the policy Lincoln had in view, and which he would have pursued had he lived, and inasmuch as Mr. Seward gave his cordial support to Johnson, it was inferred that the latter was following a plan devised by the great war President. Mr. Lincoln's famous Gettysburg dedication address; his second inaugural, and the terms given by General Grant to General Lee on the occasion of Lee's surrender, all indicated that Lincoln would have treated the southern people with magnanimity and with as much liberality as the changed conditions in the South would justify. But Mr. Johnson lacked that important element of strength which Lincoln had in full measure—the confidence of the people.

Dakota's delegate, Hon. Walter A. Burleigh, had sustained Mr. Johnson from the beginning. He had won the cordial friendship of the President, had become one of his confidential advisers and had gained sufficient influence to control all Dakota appointments and a number outside the territory. The appointments referred to within Dakota are given below:

Andrew J. Faulk, governor; William Tripp, surveyor general; Laban H. Litchfield, United States marshal; Nelson Miner, register United States Land Office, Vermillion; W. W. Brookings, superintendent Big Cheyenne Wagon Road; John W. Boyle, receiver United States Land Office, Vermillion; Joel A. Potter, United States Indian agent Ponca Indians; James M. Stone, United States Indian agent Santee Indians; Gideon C. Moody, superintendent Sioux City and Fort Randall Wagon Road; Joseph R. Hanson, United States Indian agent Upper Missouri Indians; E. C. Collins, assessor internal revenue; William Shriner, collector internal revenue; John W. Boyle, associate justice Supreme Court; Enos Stutsman, agent Treasury Department; George Stickney, receiver United States Land Office, Vermillion, in place of Boyle, appointed judge; George H. Hand, United States attorney for Dakota; and four sutlerships. These appointments, with the exception of Governor Faulk, were all given to residents of Dakota, and the governor had resided here in 1861-62, and were all republicans.

Assuming, as seems reasonable, that President Johnson, with the counsel and confidence of Mr. Seward, had adopted a policy substantially devised by his predecessor, which would have been conservative, so much so that, as it was developed under Mr. Johnson's administration, its opponents charged that it was a surrender of nearly all that the Government had contended for in the great civil strife; Mr. Johnson would have encouraged the white people of the South, with few notable exceptions, to resume their relations as citizens, rehabilitate their state and local governments, elect and convene their Legislatures, repudiate their ordinances of secession, ratify the constitutional amendments, and restore their governments to the position occupied prior to the Rebellion, except as to slavery. This policy refused to admit that there had been any actual secession, insisting that such a thing as the right of a state to secede from the Union could not be recognized, therefore the state governments of the South had been in a dormant condition during the Rebellion, and the disloyalists had attempted to create new state governments and a national government called the Confederate States of America, in which they had been unsuccessful, and with the triumph of the Union cause the former status was restored.

Congress took the ground that the rebellious states, while they had not and could not secede or withdraw from the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, had effectually destroyed their former state governments, and it now became necessary to begin at the foundation and rebuild the governmental fabric; that it was the duty of Congress to supervise this reconstruction, and see that these states were rebuilt on republican principles as required by the Constitution, and that this rebuilding should be carried out under the sanction and direction of the national Government; that all persons who had voluntarily borne arms against the United States had thereby disfranchised themselves, and would have to be newly clothed with the functions of citizenship before they could take any part in the formation of the new governments. The effect of this plan would debar practically all the whites, who were citizens of the rebellious states before the war, from any part in restoring those states to their places in the Union. They could neither vote or hold office, and as the negro had been enfranchised and had not voluntarily borne arms against the Government, and as they constituted the only class of citizens that could be recognized, the work of reconstruction in the beginning, so far as the exercise of the voting privilege entered into it, fell to the black people. The first step in reconstruction work had been the appointment of military governors in the states to be restored, placing them under martial law. Under proclamation issued by these military officials, elections were called and state officers and Legislatures chosen from among the qualified electors, and as a matter of course a large number of negroes were elected to office—the most intelligent class. The most important offices, however, were filled by white men, some of whom were adventurers, and others southern Union men who had not borne arms voluntarily against the Government. Some of these officials proved to be dishonest and lent their official positions to corrupt practices. Under the new state legislation bonds in large amounts were issued to provide funds for setting the machinery of government in motion, and the proceeds of these securities were in some instances misused in a scandalous manner, much to the discredit of the northern men who had taken a prominent part in the reconstruction work. The Legislatures annulled all secession ordinances, ratified the new amendments to the Federal Constitution, and elected United States senators. When this had been done satisfactorily, Congress began the work of restoring the former disfranchised whites to citizenship by relieving them of their political disabilities. First to receive this boon were all persons who had held no office, either civil or military, which included the private soldiers, under the so-called Confederate Government, and after a convenient season of waiting, the disabilities of a certain grade of civil and military officers were removed, and so on, until the leaders of the Rebellion and the influential persons connected with it were reached, when a new requirement was added, making it necessary for the party desiring amnesty and enfranchisement to make application by petition and a special act of Congress would be passed, removing their disabilities. A very few, who were regarded as the chief conspirators, or had been guilty of flagrant violations of the laws of war, were not offered amnesty on any terms, and there were a number in the class who were required to petition who refused to avail themselves of the privilege.

JOHNSON REPUBLICANS

In the Territory of Dakota, in 1866, the republican party was about equally divided between Johnsonism and radical republicanism, as it was termed, while the democrats to a man endorsed the President. This gave Johnsonism a decided majority and assured the election of a delegate and other officers from that party. The political campaign was formally opened about the middle of August by the calling of a territorial convention by the committee of the national union party appointed at the republican convention held in 1864, at which Mr. Burleigh was first nominated. The following is a copy of the official call:

There will be a territorial convention of the National Union Party of Dakota Territory held in the Town of Vermillion, County of Clay, on Thursday, September 6, 1866, at 2 o'clock P. M., for the purpose of placing in nomination, to be supported by the people, at our next general election, the following territorial officers, to-wit: One delegate to Congress, one territorial auditor, one territorial treasurer and three members of the Territorial Board of Education, and for the transaction of such other business as may properly come before it. The several counties will be entitled to as many delegates in the convention as such county may have of representatives in the Legislature. The Territorial Committee respectfully recommends to the legal voters of the territory who are disposed to cooperate with the National Union Party to meet at the county seats of their respective counties on the Saturday preceding the territorial convention and elect delegates to the same. By order of the Territorial Central Committee.

J. R. HANSON,
Chairman National Union Central Committee of Dakota.

Here follows a number of convention calls by the various counties; first, Yankton County:

A mass convention by the National Union Party of Yankton County will be held at the capitol building in the Town of Yankton, on Saturday, the 1st day of September next, for the purpose of electing delegates to the Territorial Union Convention to be held at Vermillion, the 6th day of September next, and to transact any other business that may come before the convention.

MANY CITIZENS.

The democrats had concluded to call no conventions of their party, but to join with the national union party on a Johnson platform in the conventions, and in the election of all territorial and county officers. This program was followed, and its effects will be observed in the proceedings following, where the old story of the lion and the lamb was affectionately illustrated—the republican lamb being largely concealed from view.

The following call was issued to the electors of Clay County:

The National Union Party of Clay County will meet in convention at the Town of Vermillion, on Saturday, the 1st day of September next, for the purpose of electing delegates to the Territorial National Union Convention to be held at Vermillion on the 6th day of September next. A full attendance is earnestly desired. By order of the committee,
C. N. TAYLOR, Chairman.

The mass convention in Yankton County was duly held at the time stated. The convention was called to order by A. G. Fuller, who read the call, after which Henry C. Ash was elected chairman, and Dr. Franklin Wixson, secretary. The business of the convention having been stated by the chair, the convention at once proceeded with the election of delegates with the following result: John Stanage, Thomas Frek, John Lawrence, M. K. Armstrong, L. W. Case, C. G. Irish, W. N. Collamer, L. Congleton and Dr. Franklin Wixson. After which the convention adjourned.

The national union party of Todd County was organized September 1st at a mass convention held at the residence of Charles McCarthy, in Spring Lake, Todd County, Dakota Territory. On motion of General Todd, Dr. Joel A. Potter was elected chairman, and Charles McCarthy, secretary. Doctor Potter, on taking the chair, addressed the convention in a brief and appropriate speech, alluding to the object of the meeting and urging the importance of harmony.

General Todd then stated the object of the meeting more fully, stating that it was proposed to organize the national union party of Todd County. The general then moved that the meeting endorse the platform of principles adopted by the national union party of the country at the Philadelphia convention, which motion carried. On motion of John Dillon, Esq., the convention proceeded to elect an executive committee of the party in Todd County, which resulted in the choice of J. B. S. Todd, Charles McCarthy and Luke Lavery. Delegates to the territorial convention to be held at Vermillion, September 6th, to-wit: Joel A. Potter, John Dillon and Jonathan A. Lewis, were then elected, when the convention adjourned.

Conventions were also held in Union, Clay, Bon Homme and Charles Mix counties, and delegates elected. The Philadelphia platform was uniformly endorsed.

THE TERRITORIAL CONVENTION

The territorial convention of the national union party was held at Vermillion September 6th. The convention assembled in the schoolhouse, and was called to order by Capt. Nelson Miner, of Clay County. Hon. John W. Turner, of Clay, was then elected chairman, and Charles E. Hedges, of Charles Mix, and O. F. Stevens, of Union County, secretaries. A committee on credentials was appointed, consisting of John Lawrence, Yankton; Nelson Miner, Clay; and

O. F. Stevens, Union, that later reported the following persons entitled to seats in the convention:

Todd County—Joel A. Potter, John Dillon, Jonathan A. Lewis. Charles Mix County—James Somers, John J. Thompson, Charles E. Hedges. Bon Homme County—Hugh Fraley, John Brown, Jacob Rufner. Yankton County—John Stanage, John Lawrence, Thomas Frick, Laban H. Litchfield, L. W. Case, W. N. Collamer, C. G. Irish, Leonidas Congleton, Dr. Franklin Wixson. Clay County—Capt. Nelson Miner, N. V. Ross, M. McCue, G. W. Pratt, W. Russell, C. Larson, John W. Turner, P. H. Jewell, A. A. Partridge. Union County—D. M. Mills, J. R. Wood, Michael Curry, William Gray, J. Broulette, D. Chaussee, O. F. Stevens, C. P. Heath, R. Mehan, William Walters.

This report was adopted.

A committee of nine was then appointed to draft and report resolutions, made up of the following delegates: Joel A. Potter, Charles E. Hedges, Hugh Fraley, Doctor Wixson, W. N. Collamer, P. H. Jewell, John W. Turner, D. M. Mills and C. P. Heath. The organized counties were all represented on this committee, who after a brief absence returned and reported the following:

Resolved, That our political creed is briefly and yet fully expressed in the declaration of principles adopted by the National Union Convention at Philadelphia on the 16th of August last, which resolutions we heartily endorse and declare to be the chief and corner stone of the National Union Party of Dakota.

Resolved, We hold that each state and territory has the right to prescribe the qualifications of its electors, and we are opposed to any alteration of our laws on the subject of suffrage.

Resolved, That the nation owes a lasting debt of gratitude to the soldiers and sailors of the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, and in the bestowal of public patronage, preference should be given them, and as a partial tribute for their services the Government should donate to each of those who have fallen in the service, or have been honorably discharged, or to their legal representatives, 160 acres of land, and justice to those who entered the service in the early part of the war demands that immediate provision should be made for a full and impartial equalization of bounty.

Resolved, That in behalf of the best interests of the citizens of Dakota Territory we are opposed to the bestowal of any political patronage belonging to the territory upon non-residents.

Resolved, That our delegate in Congress be requested to present no man's name for a federal appointment who does not cordially support the Philadelphia platform.

The resolutions were adopted as the platform of the national union party of Dakota.

On motion of L. H. Litchfield, the convention then proceeded to make nominations by acclamation.

John Lawrence moved that the convention nominate Hon. Walter A. Burleigh for delegate to Congress. Carried unanimously.

On motion of D. M. Mills, D. T. Gore, of Union County, was unanimously nominated for territorial auditor; and on motion of John Lawrence, M. K. Armstrong was unanimously nominated for territorial treasurer.

On motion of D. M. Mills, William Walter, S. A. Bentley and Hon. John W. Turner were unanimously nominated a territorial board of education. The following resolution was then unanimously adopted by the convention:

Resolved, That the unwavering course of our delegate in Congress, his firm adherence to the patriotic policy of the President of the United States, his hearty endorsement of the Philadelphia platform, and his earnest and untiring efforts in behalf of our territory, and in relation to the Indian affairs in the Northwest meet both our cordial and sincere approval, and we call upon the citizens of Dakota, who have its best interests at heart, to cooperate with us in securing his election.

On motion of L. H. Litchfield the following territorial central committee was then appointed: J. B. S. Todd, chairman; Chas. P. Heath, Union County, secretary; Laban H. Litchfield and Samuel Morrow, Yankton County; D. M. Mills, Union County; Hugh Fraley, Bon Homme County; P. H. Jewell, and A. A. Partridge, Clay County; and Charles E. Hedges, Charles Mix County.

On motion of John Lawrence, the proceedings were ordered published in the Union and Dakotian, at Yankton, D. T.; and then on motion of Charles E. Hedges, the convention adjourned.

The adjournment of the convention was followed by many demonstrations of enthusiasm, and the "dyed-in-the-wool" democrats and the "black republicans" greeted one another in the most cordial manner. It was a happy occasion, and the exuberance of good feeling found expression in an impromptu ratification meeting, held soon after adjournment in the open air. Doctor Burleigh gave expression to his appreciation of the action of the convention, and reviewed the political situation in a very able and interesting speech. He was followed by General Todd, the "wheel horse of the democracy," who, after extolling the wisdom and patriotism of the Philadelphia convention, referred to Dakota politics. He said he had fought and opposed Doctor Burleigh in the last campaign to the best of his ability; but now he proposed to stand by him and aid his election by every means in his power. Politics he knew made strange bed-fellows, but this was a time when the animosities of the past should be forgotten, and a cordial greeting extended to all who were willing to put their shoulders to the wheel and work for the great national cause.

THE CONGRESSIONAL REPUBLICAN PARTY

We now come to the action taken by those in Dakota who did not endorse the policy of President Johnson, but who supported the congressional plan of reconstruction. This sentiment, up to August, 1866, found expression through no party organization, as none existed, hence a new organization became necessary if Congress was to have any support in Dakota. This being the situation, Hon. W. W. Brookings, of Yankton, set to work during the summer for the purpose of bringing an organization into the field that would combat the national union party and show to the country that Congress had supporters in Dakota, and it was generally believed that Mr. Brookings was willing to accept from the new organization the nomination of delegate to Congress. It was not thought that Mr. Brookings anticipated a victory for his new party at that time, as the time intervening before election was too brief to permit of a thorough canvass of the territory, and an intelligent discussion of the differences between the contending parties, and these were not at this time well understood by the great mass of voters, and were regarded by a large number as simply a choice between two plans, either of which would satisfactorily accomplish the same end. Mr. Brookings, however, went forward with his work; his first move was the calling of a mass convention, at Yankton, of those who sustained the congressional plan of reconstruction. This convention was called to meet at the capitol building on the 14th of August, 1866, for the purpose of electing delegates to a territorial convention to be held at Vermillion, August 27th following. All who endorsed the congressional plan of reconstruction, were cordially invited to participate in the convention. In accordance with the call the mass convention assembled on Wednesday, the 14th of August, when Mr. Brookings called the convention to order, and Bucklin Wood was elected chairman, and Charles F. Rossteuscher, secretary; after which, on motion of Mr. Brookings, nine delegates were elected to represent Yankton County in the territorial convention, namely,—W. K. Brookings, Jacob Brauch, W. E. Root, A. L. Hinman, Cras. F. Rossteuscher, Bucklin Wood, P. H. Risling, Washington Reed, Ole Sampson.

The chairman then, on motion, appointed a county central committee consisting of Jacob Brauch, W. E. Root and A. L. Hinman, who were instructed to issue an appropriate call for a territorial convention.

An address was then made by Mr. Brookings, in which he took the ground that the rupture in the national union party was so serious and based on such irreconcilable differences, that any compromise was impossible. President John son had practically surrendered himself to the direction and control of the democratic party. He pointed out that the national union party of Dakota, heretofore substantially the republican organization, had through its committee surrendered the territorial democratic party; hence the true and straight republicans found but one course open to them, and that was to start anew and organize the republicans in a party of their own under their own proper name. That the delegate to Congress, Doctor Burleigh, elected two years previously by the republicans, had joined hands with the President in his crusade against the republicans in Congress, and could no longer be entrusted with the standard of republicanism. That Congress had provided the only safe policy and plan of reconstructing the states lately in rebellion, and upon the success of this policy the hope of future peace and the development and prosperity of the whole country, was based.

The convention then adjourned.

On the day following the Yankton County Convention the subjoined call was issued:

All republicans and others who endorse the reconstruction resolutions of Congress are invited to send delegates to a territorial convention to be held at Vermillion on the 27th day of August, at 12 o'clock M., to nominate a candidate for delegate to Congress, also territorial treasurer and territorial auditor. The ratio of representation to be one delegate for each member of the Territorial Legislature. This convention is called at the request of many republicans throughout the territory and by a resolution passed unanimously by a Republican Union Convention of Yankton County, held at Yankton on the 14th inst.

Yankton, D. T., August 15, 1866.

JACOB BRAUCH,
W. E. ROOT,
A. L. HINMAN,

Committee appointed by Yankton County Convention to issue a call for a territorial convention.

Mass conventions were held in the several legislative districts but their proceedings were not published and no record has been preserved.

The territorial convention was held at Vermillion, August 27, but the proceedings were not published, and no record thereof can be obtained, except the comments of the two newspapers then printed in the territory, both of which were unfriendly. W. W. Brookings was nominated for delegate to Congress; N. H. Schooler for territorial auditor and Aaron Carpenter for territorial treasurer, and a central committee appointed with Jacob Brauch as chairman.

During the same year it became necessary in compliance with law to elect members of the Legislature and county officers, and the ordinary course of holding nominating conventions in each organized county was pursued; in all the counties where the regular republican committees called conventions the democrats attended in such numbers as to outvote those republicans who favored the congressional party. One result was that the democrats nominated the legislative tickets, though giving a partial representation to what was termed the Johnson republicans; the conventions, however, acted under the title of the national union party.

The House of Representatives chosen was made up of a majority of the Johnson republicans and democrats. The title of the new party organized under the leadership of Mr. Brookings and Colonel Moody was "the republican party." The council members elected in 1865 held over.

The election was held on Tuesday, October 9th. There was but one voting precinct in Yankton County, and the polling place was the capitol building. The reader, who can call to memory the names and faces of the Yankton politicians of thirty-five and forty years ago, will find in the illustration of this event, on an adjoining page, a view of the first capitol building, and will be able to recognize about the thirty or more electioneers, a number of the pioneers. The Australian ballot had not been introduced at that time, and tickets were supplied by the party committees. Mr. Brookings is conspicuous; Mr. Bramble is easily distinguished; Mr. Ash can be identified; Hon. A. M. English is there—he was elected a member of the Legislature. It was a national union year and former democrats carried off most of the honors. L. W. Case is visible, as also is Judge Presho, who can be easily recognized.

The vote on delegate to Congress in the various precincts of the territory was very light, as will be seen from the figures following, giving Doctor Burleigh and the national union tickets for legislative and county offices, majorities ranging from a close vote to a clean sweep. In Union County there were four precincts, in Clay County two, and but one in each of the other counties:

Union County, Sioux Point Precinct, Burleigh received 41 votes, and Brookings 15; Reandeu's precinct, Burleigh 98, Brookings 22; Elk Point precinct, Burleigh 53, Brookings 37; Brule Creek precinct, Burleigh 21, Brookings 11; Clay County, East Vermillion precinct, Burleigh 67; Brookings 15; West Vermillion precinct, Burleigh 12; Brookings 37. Total for Burleigh 79; Brookings 52; Yankton County, Burleigh 95; Brookings 87; Bon Homme County, Burleigh 17, Brookings 14; Charles Mix County, Burleigh 59, Brookings 2; Todd County, Burleigh 25, Brookings none; Pembina County (Red River), St. Joseph precinct, Burleigh .96; Pembina precinct, Burleigh 7. There was no Brookings ticket.

Total vote cast for delegate in the organized counties on the Missouri slope was 743; Burleigh receiving 489, and Brookings 254. Adding Red River the total vote was 846.

The territorial officers elected were M. K. Armstrong, Yankton, treasurer; and I. T. Gore, Union County, Auditor.

Territorial Board of Education, John W. Turner, Clay County; Samuel A. Bentley, Bon Homme County; and William Walters, Union County.

A COMPANY OF SOLDIERS SLAIN NEAR FORT PHIL KEARNEY

Without warning, and when there was a general belief that the Indian troubles throughout the Northwest were pacified and settled, and the reign of peace restored, the Teton tribes west of the Missouri and north of the Cheyenne, broke out in open hostility early in the spring of 1867. Many Indians who had been parties as members of the tribes who had joined in the recent treaties, took to the war path, and all seemed animated by a fiendish desire to slaughter. And because of the hundreds and even thousands of emigrants that were then pressing forward to the auriferous gulches and streams of Montana and Idaho from this direction, there was abundant opportunity for the Indians to gratify their fiendish temper. The cause of this sudden outbreak and the apparent deep-seated hostility of the natives was attributed very largely to the invasion of their landed domain by the gold-seeking emigrants. The Indians claimed that they had agreed to permit travel through this country only by boats; that the land travel was a violation of the treaties and that it did them permanent and incalculable injury in destroying the game, robbing their fishing grounds and trapping parks, and sowing the seeds of immorality among their young people both men and women. Probably many of the emigrants conducted themselves in an imprudent, insolent, and in some cases, grossly immoral and dishonest manner, in their intercourse with the Indian people, engendering a feeling of enmity and a desire for revenge. Added to these indignities was the apprehension of the Indians that so large an influx of white people signified an early abandonment of their land to make way for the aggressors. They were fighting, as they reasoned, for self-preservation, and by their horrid atrocities expected to frighten the whites out of the country and put a stop to their coming. The building of the Union Pacific Railroad was in progress at this time, an enterprise that found no favor whatever with the untamed children of the forest and plain, who regarded it as an enemy that would drive them from their buffalo ranges east of the mountains and exterminate the animal that furnished them their principal support.

About this time the frightful and atrocious massacre near Fort Phil Kearney, one of the posts built on the headwaters of Powder River in 1865, under General Sully's military administration, had aroused public interest and awakened an intense feeling throughout the country. This sanguinary slaughter occurred on the 21st of December, 1866, and was about the first of the hostile acts of the Indians. Three officers, Lieutenant-Colonel Fetterman, Captain Brown, and Lieutenant Greenwood with ninety soldiers were slain. Not one escaped. All were killed and scalped, their bodies chopped with knives and tomahawks, stripped of every article of clothing, and shot through and through with arrows. There were about three thousand Sioux Indians in the vicinity of the fort, and about one-half were engaged in this atrocity. The troops had been decoyed from the fort, caught in ambush, and slain to the last man. The number of Indians killed was reported at 500, and 1,000 wounded; but this was not credited, as the troops were at a great disadvantage and must have been allowed little time for defence.

Fort Phil Kearney was in the Territory of Dakota (now Wyoming), situated at Pine Forks at the base of the Big Horn Mountains on the northeast, and 250 miles from Fort Laramie. The particulars of the slaughter were never told by white men, for the reason that none were left to tell the story. It was only from the Indians who did the killing, that an account of the affair, which was something of a battle, but in its details partook more of a massacre, could be obtained; and this came some months later. The following statement was made by a Sioux Indian chief, who participated in the tragedy, and confirms the partial account given by General Carrington, who was in command of the fort:

The Sioux had been hovering around the fort for some time, watching an opportunity to cut off the soldiers who came out for hay and fuel, and also for the purposes of capturing horses. They numbered about two thousand and were all warriors, with no women or children. The Indians finally hit upon a stratagem to draw the troops from the fort, expecting it would furnish an opportunity to capture the post and massacre the entire garrison. About two miles from the fort there was a deep coolie or ravine, and the main body of the Indians were stationed on opposite sides of this defile, lying close to the ground so as not to be seen; while a small number of their best riders were sent on a dash up near the fort where the Government horses were loose and stampeded them. The commander of the post sent out about ninety men and officers to pursue the Indians and recover the stock. The small band of marauders rode slowly enough to encourage the troops in pursuit as far as the narrow defile, where over twelve hundred Indians were concealed, prepared to destroy them. The trap was successful in every particular. After Colonel Fetterman and his men had fairly entered the defile, the Indians who lined its slopes on either side raised and fired a volley of arrows and bullets, killing on the spot all but seventeen of the soldiers and every officer. These seventeen, though a number of them were wounded, fought bravely and killed fifteen or twenty of the Indians, among them the three principal chiefs, before they were shot down. There was one soldier that neither arrows nor bullets would fell; he had received a number of wounds, but stood up and fought hand to hand till overwhelmed by the Indians closing in upon him, when they carried him off a prisoner and finally tortured him to death. The Indians claim that they had 600 picked young warriors near the fort so as to make sure of its capture in case the troops should be sent out to the relief of their comrades. This was not done, though the firing was plainly heard at the fort.

This was the Indian account. From military sources it was ascertained that Colonel Fetterman disobeyed orders in following the Indians into the ravine. He was instructed to go no farther than the hill which bordered the upper end of the ravine. Had he confined himself to this limit, the tragedy could not have occurred as it did, and some portion of the command might have escaped, though they would have been compelled to fight their way through the 100 who had been stationed near the post. When the battle was visited by the officers of the fort, a ghastly spectacle was presented to their vision. The Indians had mangled the remains of the dead in the most barbarous manner. The bodies had all been stripped of their clothing and were brutally cut to pieces.

One man was found with 256 arrows sticking in to his lifeless corpse, and nearly all the bodies were pierced with a score of arrows. These arrows had been shot into the dead bodies after the battle. It was the Indian way of emphasizing their hatred of the whites. The officers killed were Lieutenant-Colonel Fetterman, Fifteenth Infantry; Capt. W. Brown, eighteenth Infantry; 2nd Lieut. George Greenwood, eighteenth Infantry; and Lieutenant Bingham, 2d United States Cavalry. Colonel Carrington, commanding officer, engaged a scout to carry a dispatch with the fateful tidings to General Palmer, at Fort Laramie, 250 miles away, through a wilderness of mountain and plain, covered with a heavy snow. This scout made the journey and reached Laramie on New Year's evening, 1867, while a military ball was in progress. The music ceased, and there was no further sound of revelry. (The scout was paid $1200 for his trip.) Palmer immediately sent a detachment of troops and supplies to the relief of the fort, supposing the post was in imminent danger. The weather turned intensely cold, and the march to Fort Phil Kearney was made through two feet of snow frequently, and the last twelve miles occupied two days, the road being impassable because of the depth of snow; resort was had to the shovel to clear away the obstruction. About seventy of the command, including officers as well as private soldiers, were badly frozen, so that amputation was necessary in many cases.

The military people alleged that the Civil Peace commissioners had furnished the Indians with guns and ammunition to hunt with; and there followed for a time a great war of words between the military and those who defended the peace commission, waxing so heated that it was claimed the two factions were as hostile to one another as were the Indians toward the whites, and that a few scalps would be enjoyed by either side.

These Indian hostilities ceased during the summer, and in November General Sherman pronounced the Indian war ended. There had not, however, been an Indian war; but during the year '67, every month brought its crop of threatening rumors; the peace commission was kept busy making treaties; the control of the Indians had become a bone of contention between the Quakers and the Military, so that the public mind might have been impressed with a belief that a war was being or had been waged. Sherman's assurance of the termination of all hostile feeling referred to organized bodies of Indians prepared for war. It could not have been intended as an assurance that the frontiers were in no danger from marauding bands. These small war parties, whose purpose appears to have been plunder but who did not hesitate to kill, continued their predatory occupation, assailing the steamboats, capturing the emigrant trains, killing the emigrants and confiscating their goods and live stock; requiring the active efforts of the limited force of troops stationed at the various posts and agencies, to prevent their becoming more formidable.

A JANUARY BLIZZARD

An intense cold spell visited the settled portions of the territory in January, 1866, which was the cause of considerable suffering among the settlers, and many cases of freezing, but none fatal. Theophilus Brughier, who was engaged in the robe and fur trade along the upper river, had a train of fifty oxen engaged in hauling robes down the valley from his trading posts near Pierre, and every animal was frozen to death, and the train abandoned by the drivers, who were compelled to seek shelter at the fort.

A wind and snow storm of alarming proportions, visited the entire settled part of the territory in February. It was a genuine blizzard, of the dangerous character, and continued to rage, with terrible fury, for thirty-six hours. Colonel Moody, and his successor in office, Mr. Miller, were out on the Government wagon road, near James River, when the storm suddenly burst upon them, and in their efforts to find their way into town, became lost. By good fortune, they ran against a barn belonging to W. W. Benedict, in the eastern suburb of the thinly inhabited town, where they were compelled to remain all night, suffering painfully from cold, and would probably have perished had they ceased their exercise during the long night, for both were quite benumbed with cold, and compelled to resort to many expedients to keep from falling asleep. They escaped with frost-bitten feet, hands and faces. Similar experiences occurred to a number in all the settlements, the storm being widespread. This "blizzard" came up at a time when men were just preparing to quit their occupation for the day, and return home. Scores of people got lost, but fortunately stumbled upon an outbuilding or a neighbor's house, and spent the night safely—their families and friends, in the meantime, using every effort, through the night, to discover their whereabouts, and in some instances wailing bitterly under the belief that the worst had befallen them. People who were acquainted with the dangerous character of the "blizzard" remained in doors, and ventured out only when urged by the most pressing necessity. There was the class known as "Old Timers," who would take the precaution to fasten a strong cord to the door post, and then holding fast to this guide would make their way to a nearby neighbor's or to a barn, returning safely aided by the rope. It was the uniform testimony of these experienced ones that they lost all sense of direction as soon as the storm struck them.

Mr. Spink, the secretary of the territory, resided at Yankton, not far from the Missouri River. He was a man of unusual size and strength, and had heard the blizzard stories of the Dakota people, but was not inclined to give the blizzard credit for so much fury as the people had associated with it and having some reasonable excuse for a visit to a near-by store, concluded to test the stuff that blizzards are made of. The store was a block and a half distant; there were three buildings and a long strip of fence that guided him, and he reached the store somewhat exhausted, as he confessed. The storekeeper resided at his place of business, and was at home; and when his visitor prepared to depart, he cautioned him about clinging to the fence and buildings on his way back. The caution was of no value, for Mr. Spink was unable to find a vestige of fence or building after he left the store, and became so confused the first five minutes that he realized he was lost. The wind blew from all directions, and no matter which way he turned the wind struck him squarely in the face and took away his breath. He struggled and stumbled for two hours and finally concluded he had fallen over the river bank. While under this delusion, his outstretched hands came in contact with a structure of some sort, and through the snow he detected the glimmer of light; and keeping the light in view, a few struggles and steps brought him to the window through which the light beamed. He aroused the inmates and was admitted; his face had been exposed and was badly frozen. His refuge was near the corner of Third and Locust streets, not a quarter of a mile from his residence. He remained here until noon of the following day, and though the storm had only slightly abated, he made his way home in safety. In speaking of his blizzard experience later, he declared that the blizzard stories he had heard related, and could not credit, were so far from being an exaggeration, that they failed to convey any adequate idea of such a storm. No language could describe it, and to pass through one, exposed to its fury as he was, and come out alive, seemed little less than miraculous. The constant, furious, eddying wind, and blinding snow, simply deprived a person of all sense of direction, and left him a prey to doubtful chance.

These storms were of annual occurrence during the early years of Dakota's settlement, and two or three were not unusual during a winter season. They do not now appear to have been as furious and prolonged for the past twenty-five or thirty years, for what cause we can only conjecture. We believe a modifying influence has been exerted by the settlement of the country and the artificial groves that have become so numerous and widespread. One of the most dangerous features attending a blizzard was where it broke out abruptly during the day time, and caught the farmers on the road or in town with their produce to sell, and citizens of the sparsely settled towns at their places of business. The blizzard usually came on without much warning, and would continue, as a rule, until the third day without intermission or modification. The most serious and dangerous form of this storm occurred when there was a fair depth of snow on the ground; the wind would lift this snow into the air and whirl it about in its furious eddies, and it was these forceful eddies that made breathing so difficult in the teeth of the gale. The blizzard snow gets finely pulverized, and will find its way through any crevice the wind can penetrate. Cattle suffer intensely if exposed to a blizzard even if protected by sheds; the snow clouds the animal's face, and is inhaled, and finally the nostrils are filled and packed with it, and the mouth covered with an icy crust, while the snow covers their head and eyes, blinding them. The doomed brute becomes frantic, rears and plunges, maddened by the tortures of suffocation, from the effects of which it finally succumbs. In some instances farmers lost their entire herd where the cattle were bunched together in open sheds, all perishing from suffocation.

THE LYNCHING OF HOGAN

James Hogan was lynched at Vermillion on the night of February 26, 1866. It was one of those cases where the people of the community felt that their personal safety demanded that the desperado should be put out of the way of doing violence to others, but after he had been lynched, it was said that it was a most barbarous thing to do and not altogether necessary. Hogan appears to have been a terror to the law abiding people; fond of drinking to excess, and desperate and ungovernable when influenced by drink. Dakota communities were at that time emerging into orderly, law abiding communities, but public order had not become the settled rule, and men of the Hogan type were endured as a necessary evil until patience was worn out, and the gibbet called in as the only effectual remedy. There were no jails or places for confining vicious persons, though the courts were established. About four weeks before the lynching, a man named Hagan (not Hogan), had shot a hole through Herman Oleson's leg, with a revolver. This occurred at Vermillion, and created so much indignation that a number of the law-abiding citizens, without consultation, reached the conclusion that it would be necessary to make an example before they could put a stop to the disgraceful brawls and shooting scrapes which was injuring the fair name of the community. Hogan was drinking freely on the 26th, and in the afternoon, while in the land office, made a violent attack upon a young Norwegian, named Burgis, or Burgess, snapping a revolver at him several times while in McHenry's store, but the cap did not explode, or there may have been none. Hogan then walked out into the street, pointed his pistol at a number of parties and snapped it, but did no damage except to stir up a furious storm of indignation. He was playing the bully and seemed to have pleasure in terrorizing the people. Finally Patrick Hand grappled with him, secured his revolver and gave it to Captain Miner, who locked it up in the land office. Hogan entered the office in a perfect frenzy and demanded the weapon, declaring that he was going to shoot Burgess. Miner seized him and after a struggle got him into the street. About a dozen Iowa soldiers were quartered in the village, and Miner turned Hogan over to the detachment and requested them to tie him up and keep him until night. He was tied to a large tree in front of the quarters, with a rope wound several times around his body. While he was confined in this way, General Todd, who happened to be there, went out and talked with him. He told the general that Burgess and his father had burned his cabin, about five miles below Vermillion, and all he had in it, and he intended to shoot both of them. He said further that while his cabin was burning he caught a son of Burgess's, a small boy, and held him over the flames until he confessed that he thought his father might have fired the cabin. Hogan said that he "then chucked the boy's head against a log and left him insensible." About dark Hogan was removed, and it was said he had been taken inside the quarters. The cry of "murder" was heard several times about eight o'clock in the evening, and before ten o'clock several persons saw Hogan's lifeless body hanging to the limb of a tree a short distance from the mouth of the Vermillion River. No attempt was made to disturb the body that night. The next morning the place of execution was visited by a number, and Hogan was found hanging by a half inch rope, with his feet squarely on the ground—his hands were tied behind him; his face presented a most revolting and sickening appearance. The body was taken down, and the ladies of the village collected enough to purchase a coffin and shroud, and the body was buried under the tree whereon he was hung. While public sentiment condemned the lynching as unjustifiable because the man was in custody and the courts were open, it appeared that he could not have been legally restrained of his liberty for any offense he had actually committed for any length of time, and a partial justification was given by the statement that Hogan would have been hung finally anyway, and his lynching probably saved the life of one or two whom he had marked as targets for his revolver. A term of court was held in June, 1866, at which Judge Kidder charged the grand jury to thoroughly investigate the lynching. The jury took up the tragic affair, but were unable to secure the least evidence that would justify an indictment. Whoever were concerned in the crime kept the secret well, and it was never divulged. At the time the offense was committed public sentiment in the neighborhood of the occurrence was not inclined to look upon the tragic occurrence as an unmixed evil. This was the first appearance of public lynching in Dakota.

THE FLOOD OF 1866

There was a great flood in the spring of 1866, and the Missouri bottom lands between Yankton and the Big Sioux River were covered with from two to six feet of water. The winter had been unusually cold and the heavy ice did not float out of the river through its channel when the break up occurred in March, but gorged in the big bend below the mouth of James River, backing the water up stream fifteen miles, and inundating the low lands in Union, Clay and Yankton counties. For several weeks all travel between Yankton and Sioux City direct, except for small boats, was suspended. No great damage ensued, the farmers generally having been forewarned, and had removed their live stock, feed, and necessary supplies, to the highlands, before the flood came. During this overflow, the Government engineer, in charge of the Big Sioux and Fort Randall wagon road, discovered that the bottom lands were higher nearer the river than farther back toward the highland, and made some important and economical changes in the location of the road, because of this discovery. It was also discovered that where the bottom and bluff join there was a swift current and a depth of water sufficient to float a steamboat, from which it was concluded that the main current of the river had sought that as the route offering the least resistance, indicating that the land was the lowest next to the bluff. The Big Sioux Valley was inundated during this high water period, but it had no settlers except on Brush Creek and lower down, to be discommoded.

After the high water subsided there was considerable immigration during the late spring and early summer, and also during the fall. The City of Yankton made notable progress in improvement, but did not gain much in population. The church and the schoolhouse and a thousand shade trees planted, were the principal improvements accomplished. Both Union and Clay counties, and along up the Sioux Valley into Lincoln County, a large majority of the farmer class of immigrants located. It was apparent that the lands of Union and Clay were sufficiently attractive to arrest the immigrant, and until they were taken up there would be a very limited immigration to the counties west of them. Immigration was not active in 1866 in the direction of Dakota. Wide wastes of excellent land yet remained in Minnesota and Nebraska, and the pre-emptors and thousands of homesteaders found their locations in those states. During the summer a colony of Minnesotians visited Dakota, headed by Charles H. McIntyre, James F. Jones, Albert Lee, Daniel Morey and Warren Osborne. These gentlemen were on a prospecting tour from Albert Lea, Freeborn County, with the intention of locating at Sioux Falls. They learned on their trip that Sioux Falls was occupied by the military, and was unsafe, and unwilling to abandon their enterprise, came into Yankton and Bon Homme counties. As a result of their unpremeditated visit they each took upland, and McIntyre, Jones and Lee purchased a sawmill in Smutty Bear's Bottom, and then returned to Minnesota to arrange their business affairs. In the early spring of 1867, accompanied by their wives and children, they journeyed across the plains and reached the Missouri Valley in May, making a permanent settlement in Yankton and Bon Homme counties. These were accompanied, and also followed by other families, and though not as numerous as the New York colony of 1864, their numbers, intelligence and energy were sufficient to win for them the title of the Minnesota Colony, though nearly all could claim their native heath in the eastern states, having emigrated at an early day to Minnesota. Mr. McIntyre was a man of exceptional merit and enterprise, and left his mark in many commendable works during his residence in the territory. He, however, found greater inducements in Colorado, and in 1874 settled in that territory, where he still resides.

The general topics of greatest interest in the territory in 1866 were the subjects of railway transportation, and the feud between Congress and the President. It was manifest that the surplus products of the Dakota farms, which were expected to increase, would need to seek their market in the East, and a railroad convenient to the farming settlements would be necessary to render the productions of the soil at all profitable; and also necessary to encourage their production.

THE DAKOTA BAR ORGANIZED

The lawyers of Dakota Territory met at the office of S. L. Spink, the territorial secretary, at the capital, on the 5th of December, 1866, and organized an association called the "Bar of Dakota." There were present the venerable Hon. John W. Turner, of Clay County, who had sat in the legislative halls of the State of New York as a member; and George Stickney, of Union County; Hon. A. W. Burleigh, Bon Homme County; General J. B. S. Todd, of Todd County; and Enos Stutsman, Solomon L. Spink, William Tripp, George H. Hand, Gideon C. Moody and E. H. Brackett, of Yankton County representing the practicing attorneys; also Chief Justice Ara Bartlett; Associate Justices Jefferson P. Kidder and John W. Boyle, the United States Marshal Laban H. Litchfield. John W. Turner was the nestor of the gathering, and was elected president. The lawyers called him Father Turner. George H. Hand was elected secretary. A committee on permanent organization, composed of J. B. S. Todd, J. W. Turner and William Tripp were appointed. It was then decided to have a bar supper at the Ash Hotel, on the following evening, and G. C. Moody, George Stickney and E. H. Brackett, were appointed a committee to make arrangements for that gastronomic event; whereupon a recess was taken until the next evening, when the embryonic association would be perfected at the festive board. Thursday evening the lawyers again assembled, in accordance with the terms of the recess, at the Ash Hotel, when the committee on permanent organization reported recommending for permanent officers: J. W. Turner, for president; J. B. S. Todd, for vice president; and George H. Hand, for secretary. The report was adopted by a unanimous vote. The feast followed, and proved to be such a delicious repast that a resolution of appreciation and thanks was tendered the Ash Hotel, for the superior excellence of the viands furnished. Next in order were the toasts wherein the bar took occasion to appropriate to itself all the credit for supplying mankind with all the elements of material and intellectual progress, regardless of cost, and frequently gratuitously. The judges were extolled for their erudition, and the bench was declared to be the strong tower of constitutional liberty; the great mass of the people were not overlooked, as they furnished the field from which the profession drew its clients; vox populi drew out a unanimous commendation of "hear, hear," the welfare of the masses was reflected in those glowing orbs of progress and civilization, the church, the common school, and the temple of justice, and while peace, good will and prosperity were invoked for all mankind, it was advised that whenever in doubt they should employ a lawyer! The speeches were not all facetious, nor were any entirely devoted to that entertaining style of oratory, but abounded in excellent sentiment and sound principle. Delegate Burleigh concluded the formal speech-making exercises with a most excellent address, complimenting the fraternity warmly. He spoke touchingly of his leave-taking on the following day, when he was to start for Washington, to resume his official duties. Five counties were represented at this first meeting and organization of the bar of Dakota Territory, and all but three of the practicing attorneys of the territory were present, namely, Hon. W. W. Brookings, of Yankton, and Capt. Nelson Miner and John L. Jolley, of Clay. George P. Waldron, Samuel A. Bentley, Charles H. McCarthy and Gov. A. J. Faulk were subsequently admitted to practice and became members of the association.

The second annual bar meeting of the members of the Dakota bar was held at the office of Secretary Spink, in Yankton, on Wednesday, December 11, 1867. John W. Turner, of Clay County, presided. A resolution was adopted at this meeting requesting the judges of the Supreme Court to change the time of holding the annual term. A committee was appointed, consisting of Messrs. Moody, Brackett and Stutsman, to draft rules of practice for the Supreme Court, the report to be submitted to the judges for their approval. Officers of the association for the ensuing year were elected, namely: President, William Tripp; vice president, Nelson Miner; secretary, John L. Jolley; treasurer, S. L. Spink. There were present Judges Ara Bartlett, chief justice; Jefferson P. Kidder, associate justice, Vermillion; William E. Gleason, associate justice, Bon Homme; Attorneys William Tripp, G. C. Moody, George N. Propper, S. L. Spink and George P. Waldron, of Yankton County; Nelson Miner and John L. Jolley, of Clay County; Enos Stutsman, of Pembina County; John W. Turner, of Clay County, and John Currier, of Sioux City. Absent were Messrs. W. W. Brookings, George H. Hand and E. H. Brackett, of Yankton, and George Stickney, of Union. A number of brief addresses were made, and the banquet at the International Hotel (formerly the Ash Hotel) closed the annual exercises. The list of names given is supposed to include all the practicing lawyers in the territory.

A. J. FAULK, GOVERNOR

Andrew J. Faulk, of Kittanning, Pennsylvania, the newly appointed governor of Dakota Territory, reached the capital of the territory on Monday, September 3d, 1866, and took possession of the executive department, relieving Governor Edmunds. Mr. Faulk had been engaged for a number of years in the publication of the Armstrong County Democrat, a republican newspaper, however, which he relinquished on coming to Dakota. He was not a stranger to the territory, having removed here in 1861, with his son-in-law, Dr. Burleigh, and held the position of clerk at the Yankton agency during that and the following year. He had brought his family to the territory at that time, intending to make his home here; but the Indian troubles grew so threatening in 1862 as to excite his fears for their safety, and he returned with them to Pennsylvania in the autumn of 1862.

ANDREW J. FAULK

Governor of Dakota Territory from September, 1866, to May, 1869

At the time this change was made, the eruption between President Johnson and Congress had occasioned a serious and permanent split in the republican party, which was sufficiently shown in the convention held in Philadelphia, where the proposed new governor appeared as a delegate. Governor Edmunds was supposed to favor the congressional side, while his successor was an open advocate of the Johnson policy, which had been so earnestly espoused by Delegate Burleigh.

A Thanksgiving proclamation was issued by the governor, October 31, 1866, as follows:

Agreeably to established usage in this territory and also in accordance with the proclamation of the President of the United States, I, Andrew J. Faulk, governor of Dakota Territory, do hereby recommend that Thursday, the 29th day of November next, be set apart to be observed by the people of said territory as a day of thanksgiving and praise for the many and peculiar blessings which the Great Ruler of Nations has bestowed upon us in the year that is past. As a territory we should in solemn assemblies call to remembrance that we have in a great measure been relieved from the horrors of savage warfare, and have been favored in an unusual degree with the blessings of health and abundant crops, while signs of prosperity and increase are visible everywhere within our borders. As a part of the United States we have reason to remember the many blessings enjoyed by us as a nation during the same period, to offer up devout thanks and praise for the same, and also to implore the "Almighty" to grant to our national councils and to our whole people that divine wisdom which alone can lead any nation into the ways of all good.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the Territory of Dakota, at Yankton, the 31st day of October, A. D. 1866.

Attest:

A. J. FAULK, Governor.

S. L. SPINK, Secretary.

The sixth session of the Legislative Assembly of Dakota Territory convened at the capitol building at Yankton, on Monday, December 3, 1866. There had been a great political upheaval throughout the United States during the past year, brought about by the serious schism between President Johnson and Congress on the question of reconstruction, and while Congress was strongly sustained by a great majority of the northern states, Dakota had given a victory to the coalesced Johnson republicans and democrats, which was reflected in the democratic majority that composed this Legislature, or at least the lower house, as the Senate or Council had been chosen in 1865.

The newly organized republican party, headed by Mr. Brookings, nominated candidates in the various counties, but with the exception of M. U. Hoyt, of Yankton County, and four of the Clay County members—Messrs. Austin, Hodgins, Trumbo and Hanson—none of their nominees were chosen. As a matter of fact, the former national union organization that had supported Jayne in 1862 and elected Burleigh in 1864, had been taken over by the democratic party and the Johnson republicans, and afterwards became the democratic organization of the territory, brought about by the convention's selecting central committees composed largely of democrats.

The members of the House of Representatives were called to order by George I. Foster, chief clerk at the last session, who called the roll, when the following members answered to their names:

Union County, I. T. Gore, Eli B. Wixson, Michael Curry, William Gray, Vincent LaBelle, N. C. Stevens and George W. Kellogg; Clay County, H. J. Austin, Daniel Hodgins, John Trumbo, Amon Hanson and Hans Gunderson; Yankton County, H. C. Ash, W. N. Collamer, M. U. Hoyt, D. T. Bramble and Thomas Frick; Bon Homme County, Hugh S. Fraley and R. M. Johnson; Charles Mix County, William Stevens and Kerwin Wilson; Todd County, J. B. S. Todd and Charles H. McCarthy.

Judge Jefferson P. Kidder then administered the usual oath to the members; a prayer was offered by the Rev. C. W. Batchelder, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the House then organized by the election of the following officers: J. B. S. Todd, speaker; Franklin Wixson, Yankton, chief clerk; Daniel Mowery, assistant clerk; John Stanage, Yankton County, sergeant-at-arms; Christian Lewison, Union County, messenger; George Rounds, Bon Homme County, fireman, and Rev. C. W. Batchelder, Yankton, chaplain.

General Todd, the speaker-elect, upon taking the chair, spoke as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:—I return you my thanks for the honor you have done me in calling me to preside over the deliberations of this branch of the Legislature during its present session. Honors of this character are always gratifying, but when conferred by the unanimous voice of my colleagues, representing the various interests of our territory, I am more deeply impressed with the high and flattering compliment. In accepting the position of presiding officer of this house, I shall endeavor to discharge its duties with zeal, fidelity, kindness and impartiality. In a spirit of harmony, which I trust will animate each of us, I ask your forbearance and aid, which I feel so sensibly I shall require. I again return you my profound acknowledgments.

The customary special committees to draft rules, to notify the Council of the House organization, to notify the governor, were then appointed, and the House then, by request of the Council committee, fixed the hour of 2 o'clock P. M. the following day as the time for meeting in joint convention to receive the governor's message. The House then adjourned until that hour.

The members of the Council, having been elected in 1865 for two years, the body was mainly made up of the members of the previous session. Three seats had changed incumbents. Enos Stutsman had resigned from Yankton County, and A. G. Fuller had been elected his successor; George Stickney, of Union County, had resigned, and Charles LaBreche had been elected to fill the vacancy; and J. Shaw Gregory had resigned from Todd County, and Jonathan A. Lewis had been elected in his stead.

The roll of members was called by Hon. S. L. Spink, secretary, and the following councilmen responded:

First District (Union and Lincoln counties), Charles LaBreche, O. F. Stevens and D. M. Mills; Second District (Clay and Minnehaha), John W. Turner, Canute Weeks and N. V. Ross; Third District (Yankton and Jayne), M. K. Armstrong, A. G. Fuller, A. VanOsdel and George W. Kingsbury; Fourth District (Bon Homme and Hutchinson), Austin Cole; Fifth District (Charles Mix and Buffalo), John J. Thompson; Sixth District (Todd and Gregory), Jonathan A. Lewis.

Chief Justice Ara Bartlett administered the customary oath to the new members.

Councilman Ross was then elected temporary president, and Councilman Kingsbury temporary secretary, whereupon the Council permanently organized by electing the following officers: M. K. Armstrong, president; Byron M. Smith, Yankton, secretary; Henry Brooks, Bon Homme, assistant secretary; George W. Smith, Yankton, sergeant-at-arms; Patrick Brown, Union, fireman; Michael McGue, Charles Mix, messenger; Rev. Melancthon Hoyt, chaplain.

The president-elect, on taking his chair, spoke as follows:

Gentlemen of the Council:—It is proper that I should express to you my thanks for so unanimously appointing me to preside over the deliberations of this branch of the legislative assembly. I accept it, gentlemen, as an honor unsought and uncoveted on my own part, fully realizing the many difficulties and embarrassments that will beset me in the discharge of the delicate and responsible duties of the office. Relying upon your hearty cooperation and unprejudiced judgment, and hoping that our deliberations may be conducted with harm and fairness in all matters, local and political, for the public good, I am now ready to proceed with you to the transaction of the business of the council.

Mr. L. W. Case was then elected enrolling and engrossing clerk of the Council.

Committees were appointed on rules, to notify the House and governor of the organization, and asking the House to name a time for the joint convention, whereupon the Council adjourned to 2 o'clock P. M. the following day.

The second day of the legislative session was devoted to the appointment of standing committees in both houses, and the joint convention which was held in the hall of the House at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, when Governor Faulk delivered his first message to the Legislature, in person, as follows:

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE

Gentlemen of the Council and House of Representatives:—The duty of delivering my first annual message is devolved upon me at an auspicious period. After nearly four years of war I am able to announce an apparent and, I trust, more than temporary cessation of hostilities with the Indians of our northern frontier. After a war which has sadly retarded the prosperity of Dakota, and caused a heavy expenditure of public money, the hostile bands have been humbled, commissioners appointed by the Government have met them in council, and treaties of peace have been effected. But time alone can prove the efficacy of these treaties in the reestablishment of friendly relations. I confess I have not a great amount of confidence in these restless, ignorant and treacherous bands, whose cruelty and perfidy we have already experienced, and who have kept our territory in a state of continual alarm for so long a period. It is our duty to offer up thanks to Almighty God for the return of peace, for general health, and for the abundant crops which have rewarded the toils of the husbandman. If this favorable state of things should continue for a reasonable period, we may confidently look forward to a state of prosperity unexampled in our history.

IMMIGRATION.—It would be well if you could find time to mature and put into practical operation some such measures as, in your wisdom, may be best calculated to encourage and promote the rapid settlement of our territory. We claim to have inducements to immigration within our own borders not inferior to those of any other territory. We believe that Providence has lavished upon us natural advantages, which, if carefully improved by us, would in a short period lay the foundations of a great and flourishing commonwealth. Let us cooperate in this noble enterprise, and at an early day another star will be added to that galaxy which is now the wonder and admiration of foreign nations, and the hope of the oppressed throughout the whole earth. Too much cannot be said in favor of the salubrity of our climate or the fertility of our soil. With the great Missouri River and its ever increasing trade; with numberless streams flowing through wild but nutritious grasses; with the wonderful water power of the Big Sioux, it cannot be long until these natural advantages must attract the attention of capitalists, or until our territory is dotted over with farms groaning with their abundant crops—a garden of fruitfulness, and the abode of a large and growing population. The improvements in farming machinery which almost dispense with human aid could nowhere be more advantageously applied than here. Here, labor, capital and skill may safely be invested with a fair promise of ample remuneration. And the Black Hills, with their inexhaustible forests of pine timber, and their shining auriferous deposits, will yet attract thousands of adventurers and emigrants to cast their lot among us; thus eventually building up towns and cities where now the wild natives of the forest alone disturb the deep solitude of nature as they seek their precarious food. It would extend this message beyond a reasonable length were I to dwell more minutely on the various resources of the territory. If deemed of sufficient importance, this might possibly, with more propriety, come from some committee of the Council or House of Representatives. I would suggest, however, that strong efforts be made to secure ample military protection to emigrants who may wish to locate around the Black Hills. The Government is already committed to the construction of the Big Sioux and Fort Randall wagon road, the Sioux City and Big Cheyenne wagon road, which must necessarily be protected. And the only way to do it effectually, judging by past experience, is by establishing military posts along the route of this road; at least that portion of it now occupied by certain nomadic bands of Indians, who, it is well known, will dispute our right to occupy any portion of the country in the vicinity of the Black Hills. It is true the effort made by the Legislature of Dakota last year was not successful, not having met the approbation of General Sherman, who was then in command of this military district as will be seen by reference to his official correspondence dated St. Louis, January 13, 1866, a copy of which is on file in the executive office. His opposition was founded chiefly on grounds which do not operate now. One reason was that Congress had not determined and fixed the military establishment, and therefore he could not know what specific troops he was to have under his command. This objection being now removed out of the way, would it not be well to repeat the memorial, the probabilities of success being much increased since that time? Notwithstanding the general's refusal, he ventures the opinion in the same correspondence that the military arm of the Government "should encourage actual, bona fide, settlements westward as far as the land will yield corn and grasses." Now this is all we ask. The explorations of Lieut. G. K. Warren, Prof. F. V. Hayden and many others have already established the proof beyond cavil that the valleys adjacent to the Black Hills are admirably adapted, in soil and climate, to agricultural pursuits; that grass of luxuriant growth is found in abundance and of a good quality; while pine and other timber suitable for building materials, for lumber and fuel, together with stone and lime, abound without limit. If this be true, it meets the condition on which the military are willing to encourage the actual settlement and cultivation of the Government lands in the West, and the military establishment having been fixed by the last Congress, it would seem that no further obstruction is now in the way and that we have only to renew our efforts to obtain the object so much desired.

GOVERNMENT WAGON ROADS.—I am gratified to be able to inform you that the Government road known as the Sioux City and Big Cheyenne wagon road, under the management of the present economical and energetic superintendent, will soon be completed as far as Fort Randall, beyond which an additional appropriation will be necessary if the original project should be carried out. The chief outlay heretofore has been in bridging the Big Sioux, Vermillion and James rivers, which work is making encouraging progress. The superintendent informs me that the bridge over the Big Sioux will be completed before the close of December, that over the Vermillion in January and that over the James in the early part of the ensuing spring. That portion between Yankton and Sioux City is already completed so far as laying out, grading and bridging are concerned, with the exceptions I have named. The proper termination of this road is Virginia City, Montana, and all the information I have thus far obtained goes to show that the country through which it is to be located is highly favorable for its construction. When this road is once completed—having by this means shortened the distance to the gold mines of Montana and Idaho some 600 miles over the present most available route, viz., by way of Omaha, Fort Laramie and Salt Lake City, we may have every reason to expect that a rapid increase of travel through the settled portions of our territory will be the result. This improvement will, in my opinion have the effect of enlarging the avenues of trade and encouraging the settlement of a country rich in natural resources, which only needs to be properly known and protected from Indian depredations, to draw to that portion of the territory actual settlers, and induce the rapid investment of capital and labor among us. The act of Congress providing for the opening of this road also contemplates the opening of two other roads, but I apprehend of secondary importance to us as a territory. The one known as the Niobrara road commences at Niobrara, Nebraska Territory, thence up the valley of the Niobrara River and through the southern portion of this territory to Virginia City. Whether the almost interminable sands and other obstacles to be encountered on this route will not render this enterprise impracticable must be left to future explorations and developments to determine. The opinion of Doctor Hayden, an eminent and learned traveler, who has made repeated scientific researches of this territory, has been very emphatically given to the people of this territory against the practicability of this route.

The third route commences at the Minnesota state line, and is designed to intersect the Niobrara road at or near Fort Connor on the Powder River. The location of this road is represented as highly favorable, and it is believed it can be completed at a comparatively small cost. As to what condition the last two roads are now in, or how much it will require to complete them, I am not able to inform you. It is to be hoped, however, that you will not lose sight of the importance of this subject upon the future interests of the territory. That we may reasonably expect great benefits from the opening of these thoroughfares through our territory is manifest, and we cannot be too importunate in pressing the necessity of ample appropriations for their early completion.

ARMS AND AMMUNITION.—Having been informed that we are entitled to 2,000 stand of arms with the necessary fixed ammunition, from the general Government, it becomes a matter of importance that you should at once provide a suitable building for their reception and safe keeping. The arms already belonging to this territory should be collected and deposited in the same place so that in case of emergency arising from hostility with the Indians we would have at hand more effectual means of defense than appears to exist at the present time. If this suggestion does not seem practicable, in your opinion, then it would be well to consider whether you should not, as the next best remedy, encourage, in the several organized counties, military organizations, with a view to deposit these arms with them for safe keeping. Funds must be provided, if you decide upon erecting or purchasing a building as above suggested, and also to pay the immediate cost and charges of transportation.

FORT JAMES DISCONTINUED.—For some time past the people of the southern or settled portions of Dakota have enjoyed the protection of a small military post known as Fort James, located near Firesteel Creek on the James River. This, together with a similar post at Sioux Falls known as Fort Dakota, has done much, it is believed, to create a feeling of security among the white people of the territory, and has given increased encouragement to immigration from the states. Recently, however, and at total variance, as I apprehend, with the peace, security and best interests of these infant settlements, an order has been issued removing the soldiers from Fort James to Fort Randall, a point remote from the ordinary route of hostile Indians, and west of the Missouri River. I cannot help viewing the decision of the military authorities in this instance as a grave mistake and only calculated to impair confidence in the efficiency of the protection which we have the right to expect. It is well known that raids from hostile Indians have heretofore, almost invariably, been made by the valleys of the James and Big Sioux rivers and that since the chain of posts, recently existing (but by this latter arrangement now partially destroyed), was established, those raids have not been repeated. It is believed that the protection thus afforded not only allayed the fears of the people, but had the effect to overawe the hostile and thieving bands of Sioux Indians from the Upper Missouri, and incline them to embrace the recent opportunity afforded, by the presence of the peace commissioners, to secure favorable terms of peace from the Government. It is a fact also well understood by our citizens that Fort Randall, located as it is on the west bank of the Missouri River, is not in a position to afford the speediest and best possible protection to either the friendly Indians or the white settlers of the territory. Hostile parties from the north can invade the valley of the James, rob and murder, and again escape with perfect impunity before relief could be obtained from this source, owing to the distance of its location and the known difficulty of transferring cavalry across the river. But if a small force were retained at Fort James this protection would obviously be afforded and security would be vouchsafed to those hardy and enterprising pioneers who have established their homesteads among us. It would be well for you to consider this subject and take such steps as appear to you necessary to lay it fully before the general in command of the northwestern department.

OBJECT TO THE LOCATION OF THE SANTEES.—The present location of the Santees, or Mississippi Sioux, on our immediate border is also a subject which calls loudly for an energetic remonstrance on the part of the representatives of the people of Dakota. Placed as this reservation now is in immediate proximity to a portion of our most promising settlements, it can not fail to exercise a most damaging influence upon our future prospects by discouraging the enterprise of present inhabitants, by turning from us the tide of emigration which has recently been setting in this direction, and by causing the people to look elsewhere for homes where safety to person and property can be depended upon. It is believed that their removal from their recent reservation at Crow Creek was without the authority of law, on the principle that a power of this sort, once exercised, under the law conferring it, is exhausted and gone forever. Be this as it may, the act of Congress expressly limits the location to the "unoccupied lands outside the limits of any state." That the land recently set apart for them was and is yet occupied by white settlers, and that a large sum of money will be required to extinguish these titles is well known. Thus we see that in removing these Indians from Crow Creek, and from their prison at Davenport, and placing them upon the occupied lands in contact with our white settlements, an utter disregard of the law and the welfare of this community has been evinced, and we are compelled to anticipate a possible recurrence in Dakota of the horrors enacted by these savages in Minnesota in 1862. It is not too much to ask that the law under which the interior department has derived its authority, shall be strictly and fairly complied with, and that these Indians be placed upon the "unoccupied lands," away from our white settlements, plenty of which lands, as good as the law contemplates, can be found north of Fort Randall and the Yankton Sioux Reservation. This subject has been clearly and ably presented to the President, and also to Congress, by our delegate, and I have confidence that by proper cooperation on your part suitable action may be expected from the Government, and the evils to be dreaded under the present state of things may be averted before it is too late.

The Yankton and Ponca Indians continue to be the faithful friends of the Government, keeping their treaty stipulations unbroken and deserving at our hands kind consideration and encouragement. Owing to the favorable condition of their crops and the presence of faithful and acceptable agents their present condition is believed to be highly encouraging, affording grounds for the hope that they will in the future make rapid advancement at least in the more useful arts of civilization.

PUBLIC LANDS IN MARKET.—The subject of throwing the lands of this territory into market at this time might be worth your serious consideration. If once in the market, experience teaches us that much of the most desirable land would be absorbed by speculators and non-residents, who uniformly advance the nominal value for sordid purposes, or keep it for years from settlement or sale at any price. This result would operate oppressively upon the poor but worthy emigrant who might desire to make a permanent settlement among us and would have a pernicious effect upon the future growth and prosperity of the territory. Our interest lies in the opposite direction. We should encourage, by all the influence within our reach, the homestead and preemption laws, matured by the wisdom and patriotism of Congress. We should oppose the sale of these lands on any other terms than their permanent settlement and cultivation, and to this end should instruct our delegate in Congress, whose influence, I trust, would not be disregarded when brought to bear on so worthy and beneficent a measure as this. We should thus, in imitation of the policy evinced by the framers of the law, protect the actual settler, who may be willing under the humane laws above named to rear his humble cabin, cultivate the soil, and contribute to the strength, support and protection of the territory.

PROGRESS OF RAILROAD CONSTRUCTION IN DAKOTA.—It might be in place to mention that during the past summer and fall important progress has been made in the extension of railroads in this direction. The Chicago and Northwestern Road has already reached the Town of Dennison in Iowa and soon will be extended to Council Bluffs, where it will connect with and form part of the Great Pacific Railroad. A branch of this road is now projected to extend from St. John's to Sioux City, on our southeastern border, the nearest western point, which I am informed will be immediately put under contract and rapidly prosecuted to completion. It is estimated that this road will be in running order inside of twelve months, thus bringing these improvements within about sixty-five miles of Yankton. We may expect vast and important benefits to accrue to this territory in various ways, by the completion of these roads, especially by the reduction of the time and expense of delivering and forwarding freights, and by increasing the facilities for travel and communication with other parts of the United States. And we may have hopes that at no very distant day the increase of population and business within our borders will justify the extension of this road to our capital, if no farther. Other roads are in contemplation, directly calculated to benefit us when completed, and in the success of which we cannot fail to take a lively interest.
